Ernestly!

Happy Yesterdays

ERNEST NEUFELD

The outside back cover:

First row A Detail, unrelated, sketch of an early Mennonite preacher; Polonia and environs, Catherine (the Great), Tsarina of all the Russias.

Second row The Nazarene and Stride of the USSR. Saskatchewan partial front page of the Saskatoon Post, c. 1940, the Union Jack + Cooperative typeface.

Third row Schematic of Wynnyard & Baker plains press Bloor-Bay district, downtown Toronto, c. 1965. facsimile of an IBM chipboard, typesetting machine matrix in Autumn by Wynnyard, with 1 insert.

Fourth row Premier T. C. Douglas at opening face-off Wynburn Colosseum. Saskatchewan's provincial flag; Gore Community arms at the Wynburn Reserve; Stylized coat of arms the Canadian Flag.

Hitch row Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau in Wynburn CCM press-manager a plaque above Wynburn Reserve logo translated "50" of printing and publishing to end all.

Ernestly!

Happy Yesterdays

By ERNEST NEUFELD

Ernestly!
Happy Yesterdays

By Ernest Neufeld

Published by Neufeld Publishing Ltd.
and Ernest Neufeld
Box 640, Weyburn Saskatchewan, Canada, S4H 2K4

Copyright, Canada, 2000 — All rights reserved

Printed in 1990 by The Weyburn Review (1982) Ltd.
Box 640, Weyburn, Saskatchewan, Canada, S4H 2K4

for Irene

who made it all possible

Acknowledgments

The author gratefully acknowledges the kind assistance of Dr. John Archer, O.C., Regina, as the chapter on Saskatchewan; Phil Farnell of the Weyburn Review for cover artwork; Deakins Printers Ltd., Steinbach, Man., for the loan of photographs and art from "Reflections on Our Heritage" and other publications; the Audit Bureau of Circulations, Chicago, for the sketch used on the front cover; and Jim Shrade on the header of the Weyburn Review's "Etcetera" column; the Weyburn Public Library and staff for a variety of assistance; the Toronto Transit Commission for photos supplied; the Communications Workers of America for background material on the International Typographical Union; to the authors of publications cited in Chapter 6 as reference sources; and to all on the staff of the Weyburn Review who have suffered material for this volume manifesting itself in every department and usurping unreasonable blocks of computer memory; and finally to Irene, for patient and tactful assistance.

Foreword

When one has spent nearly half a century as an industry I suppose it is almost inevitable that thoughts turn inward, leaving a record of events, expectations, people encountered and challenges addressed of successes and disappointments. When three decades of that period have been devoted to publishing a community newspaper it is obvious that much of the record — from comments on personal experiences to pontifications on the larger scene — has already been noted as it evolved, while memory was fresh and perceptions current, if not necessarily valid and that the components have been preserved on non-fertile pages and microfilm.

My first impulse after succumbing to my own temptation and the initial direction of my reflections, was to gather a representative collection of editorials, columns and features classify them under broad headings, and publish the result with a minimum of comment. It quickly became apparent that personal background and many experiences that have affected attitudes, biases and convictions, and which have contributed significantly toward the whole of one's recorded expression are neither nice or entirely set only hinted at vaguely.

The logical next step seemed to be crafting memoirs on the various phases of my life, and the times and places of its evolution, and to use the recovered items to enhance clarify and punctuate, or to take the place of most narrative.

Most where to start? The beginning is always a logical place, but then I thought it appropriate to reach back to religious movements and ethnic migrations going back to medieval Europe this seemed too far removed from the main thrust of my ideology and experiences; the latter two-thirds (more or less) of the twentieth century. As many of our lives — my wife's and mine — have been absorbed with the Western Review as a business, a community institution and a personal calling, the newspaper became the obvious place to start.

The first and longest division of the book, then, is a series of crude sketches in which creating a larger newspaper a predictable one and to have the satisfaction in the present (this is followed by progressively broader perceptions of Northern the province of Saskatchewan Canada and the world of our time, explained in editorial comments made from time to time. After that I backtracked to family origins my memories of a childhood in a Manitoba village, through my years into the newspaper and printing world as a "printer's devil," and the several stages that ultimately brought us to Northern Saskatchewan. Following this a collection of features and columns on visits to a score of interests and closing [illegible] with an assortment of columns and editorials not readily classified under existing subtitles.

Because the writing and production processes are spread eighteen months I could not resist adding a final chapter of columns and editorials printed in this very significant period in our world in our nation and respecting an important Southeastern Saskatchewan initiative the Rafferty-Alameda Dams project.

If you need defend the presumption to publish memoirs and an anthology of personal writings, I offer the following: Firstly if I were told that an ancestor of mine had spent half a century at the communications however at any level or in any medium; and had left no record of it that person would swear my sanity. Secondly the twentieth century has been the most astonishingly literate, both politically and technologically, and surely there cannot be two many tweenies of the transition from a horse-and-buggy world to a universe of space travel. Finally, my personal experience and background does have consequence: there are probably one thousand or more living individuals in North America who are or have been roughly contemporaries, and in the group by Cumulants and yes are there so one or two thousand, realize this more acute to those with a Mormonish background, and it must obviate to less than one hundred. Further limit the category to those who grew up in the totally intolerable community and here is a family of refugees from the Russian Revolution, and the atmosphere becomes pretty chilly. The place of residence, I assure you of, is that I was held for a year or two as an itinerant preacher.

In a Nonfield genealogy I received recently, it was recorded of Herman Nonfield, the family patriarch who emigrated to Boston from Prussia in 1868 or thereabouts, that he had the following possessions: one wagon a fifty percent share in a plow: two harness, seventeen head of cattle, fifteen sheep, 145 measures of corn, and twenty-seven books of law.

I believe this catalogueing was not so much an effort to establish his status, as a way of saying more of him than that he was born, married, begot and died. I have some of the foregoing commodities to report, but three hundred and some pages of manuscript are my main possession.

Selecting a name for this volume presented an obvious challenge, and I finally settled, for openers, on "Eternally", which has served as the honorary or slug for my weekly column for almost a quarter of a century. The subsidiary title is a marriage of a phrase used by English poet William Wordsworth to an appearance common, I am told, in evangelical circles: "Wordsworth's The Excursion. Intention is made of a "man of shameful yesterdays." "Shameful yesterdays" appealed to me as an apt description of largely pleasant memories, but the word "shameful" seemed a trifle loshly. Attorneys are said to prefer to a good hearing — obviously with tongue in cheek — as any hearing from which one walks away. Partnered on this, unveiled at the entrance of the twentieth century, colored and of somewhat mixed body, could reasonably be described as a good — or happy — heading. For it all together and we have "Eternally Happy's yesterdays."

Some of the experiences covered in a lifetime and in a career are personals and encounters with extraordinary figures. Describing them unavoidably also involves some individuals less than flatteringly I have tried, as much as possible, to screen identities to the extent that elements of embarrassment or even personal resentment. But in no case have I in this book to underscore or defame.

It begins streaking at the outset, as it is stressed at several points in the text that this is not a history and while I have not deliberately unrepresented facts o events neither have I undertaken exhaustive research. My memories are just that and may rely on flawed memory. Counterpresentations or even downright ignorance on my part. Print columns and editorials reprinted here originally may have been the products of limited understanding of and bias toward the circumstances or conditions and people commented upon.

With these strong caveats I invite the reader to find herein something of interest and of redeeming social or literary value.

Contents

1	A community newspaper The Weyburn Review over three decades	3
2	Weyburn, Saskatchewan A small city on the Canadian prairie	44
3	Politics, drought and curling The 'most Canadian' province	69
4	Our home and native land Twentieth century Canada	110
5	Scenes from our times All the world's a stage	134
6	Genesis and Exodus Background of a people	160
7	Steinbach, Manitoba A Canadian Mennonite village	172
8	Introduction of printing A printer's devil is born	216
9	Toronto, Ontario Introduction to the world	225
10	Itinerant printer Westward and onward	235
11	Highways and byways Flights from the mundane	240
12	The boiling hot sea Of many things	292
13	Year of grace, 1989 Portentous times	321

1. A community newspaper

A publisher at last

The sense of accomplishment mounts as the first wave of staffers heads noisily for the door for an all-too-brief reunion before nothing time. A few minutes later the more serious ones exit: those who dawdle 'a dozen of leaving the premises and instead loiter five p.m. no matter how much there dragging this or that. Finally the downstairs is completed, so those who will not leave until the job in hand is in some sorts of finality walk toward the door with perhaps a deferential nod at my direction.

I am overwhelmed by the realization that I am all alone in the building except for a young clerk capable of doing no more than answering the telephone telling a wrong set at the counter or receiving a subscription. Almost panicking I fight the impulse to run into the street and shout after the departing staffers "Hey fellows! Fellows. Don't you know you're leaving me all alone and there's so much to be done even though it seems to think? Please, please come back!"

It is at this moment that the full weight of my new status slowly makes as I have finally received the last push that makes me irrevocably over the line that divides employee and employer: wage-earner and entrepreneur.

As this is what it feels like. By the clock, my final days as publisher has ended but I know that I will be working a long as my wits my body and humanhood mind endure. As of this realization hit I strongly, I am haunted by mounting momentum of privilege, holidays and other privileges taken for granted, without a thought of appreciation or sympathy for the owners and students who had made them possible. This was true before I had fully mastered the well-left-of-centre political orientation and non-fossilized trade unionism I had developed in my years in big city composing rooms in Canada and the United States.

But more of that later.

Change of ownership

news item July 3 1956

With the issue of the Review the paper will pass into new hands.

It is with a great deal of regret that I make this announcement for after having been the editor and publisher for more than 25 years the paper has become enshrined in my heart almost as a child and of course and growth almost a part of me.

But there comes a time when friends must part. For every paper there is an end, for every relationship a time when it is advisable to let others carry on the work. And having spent around 40 years in printing, and more than three decades editing and publishing papers in western Canada I will realize this seems as later the work must be handed over to others better qualified to handle it.

The decision has not been an easy one to make, and among the disappointing of recent things has been most emphatically the heart and like a good personal interest, here is a thing which means as much to me as anything in my life.

I have the confidence will have set for the advantage of the paper, and in framing a case to the new owners I feel that this will be so. In leaving, over a newspaper connections must be given to qualifications of the people conducting it. While in private ventures, it is nevertheless a community exercise, entering the business and possessing the interests of the people. Both the senior partners in the new firm are more well qualified to keep printing and newspaper publishing having had long experience on Deeside, Speyside, Banffshire and Buchan, who will be editor and publisher was born in Macduff and started in printing when only 13 years of age in 1941, working with Davidson Printers until 1945 when the many other partners he succeeded in the management of newspaper and travelled nationally for a few years, during which time he worked in many senior newspaper offices in the United States. In 1950 he returned to his home town of Stonehaven and assumed there, those of Evening Reviews. His other principal interest is in the Stonehaven Review Ltd. He has been in Toronto for six years, working on the Toronto Star Reporting in Saskatoon two years and he joined the Scotsman family again, taking over the sports page and other duties before two-and-a-half years ago.

Mr Davidson is one of Clarkson Davidson who went to Stonehaven in 1912, taking over the Post there in 1926, bringing up it finally to the printing and weekly newspaper business. He founded the Aberdeen Evening Express in 1906 and this paper is also published in the offices along with the Post. Young was brought up in this environment and together with his own other brothers

ERNEST SHUFELDT

I would like to take time to thank all those connection, advertisers correspondents, purchasers of printing and others with whom I have done business for their loyal support and co-operation and to assure a continuance of the pleasant relations with my successor

E.G. QUICK

On the morning that one takeover of the paper was announced to the staff I called a little meeting and declared my intention of turning the Review into the best weekly newspaper in Canada. I was sure my voice rang with sincerity. I think the staff by now has a talking about doing it within a year and I might the accomplishment rather exchanged. Actually it was modest enough to expect the transformation to take two or three years. By best I should explain, I meant winning the national Better Newspapers Competitions for our circulation class.

Even my inexperience did not blind me to some of the values in facts about my new circumstances. And I was soon struck by the realisation that I was facing challenges beyond my experience to prove abilities that it would require all the new skills I could hope to absorb to carry out the considerable task ahead of me. The shop had fallen into mechanical disrepair the staff had slipped into unacceptable practices and the combination of the two had reduced profitability to zero at best. Sales would have to be increased both in more account than deficiencies and to improve the editorial quality to an acceptable level, let alone that envisioned by the ideal I had tried to share that myself. And all this would have to happen in a community to which I was a complete stranger.

The dizzying problem of priorities had been solved for me by Bruce Jackson my absentee partner. A salesman both by calling and instinct he had told me before wishing me luck, and giving me his blessing, a dozen times if more, that there was nothing wrong with the Northern Review that couldn't be solved by more advertising sales and that this must be my first undertaking.

EVERYBODY'S HAPPY TO-DAY

Accordingly, in my methods speech to Review staffers I had also informed them that small newspapers not permitted the hiring of an ad salesman, I would be making sales call myself and that this would entail many hours of absence from the office. My unspoken message was that I expected everyone to work as diligently as though I were there myself to supervise.

Under the old management deliverance had been expected to bring in their own advertisements except that Mr Quick made personal sales on a few accounts that demanded this consideration. The latter we calm policy probably backed back to a long-gone era when personal advertising constituted a severe portion of advertising revenue, and it may have been considered a compromise of an editor's integrity and/or dignity to go around soliciting revenues from local merchants.

As well until after World War II few weekly newspapers in Canada had competing local media. Because as a result, four of many to me when I learned that Weyburn not such had a radio station but that it had been established been there one year earlier. My marriage, wages and my improvements, I realized with dismay would have to come from a front that now must be shared with a competitor.

The immediate situation transformed the mistake of former's judgment, as I soon forth and said. By did I tell about. Rarely presented Canadian was because of the discovery of the radio station and its recent genesis. I next learned like the owners were a group of about 20 of Weyburn's leading businessmen many of them eminently heavy advertisers. They now had a strong incentive to spend their dollars with radio. A few chain operators were encouraged by authorities, who were shareholders in the station, and most of them had little difficulty convincing themselves that it was in the best interest of their employers to spend the advertising dollars at the latter with the station.

The non-advertisers to be won over fell into three categories those who had decided a long time ago that they need not and would not advertise, and were not about to change their minds those who had low sales resistance and agreed to advertising without fully realizing the cost and those who had long their exhausted their credit and were only too happy to buy advertising space for which they had no intention of paying.

The first group, of course, I was unable to touch the second approved modest-sized ads, agreeing that they probably had been overlooking this aspect of business to their own detriment, then explained and withheld future advertising when they received their first billings; the third helped boost the first month's lineage well above the corresponding month a year earlier and helped raise my spirits for the moment, although not I wished was ever received from those dead-beats.

If the foregoing sounds like an unbroken glory reception, I must stress that there were many people hostile, aloof, restless and consistently leaden, with every sort of their way to offer sincere excuses, make modest welcome and to compliment me on my improvements and efforts. Both negative and positive reactions were successful components in my business training. In retrospect I see think of nothing worse than if I had received formulaic advertising support from the entire business community. I quickly learned that I would have to improve the product in order to increase sales, and that it would all require hard work. Quick's competitive administrative, integrity craftsmanship and everything else also goes into a community newspaper worth its salt.

Another challenging experience, to use the kindest possible term, was my introduction to the staff through which current and possible must be achieved. Having never been responsible for even a small department, ever hired or fired anyone, my confidence is for taking control of a group of sixteen people for any purpose were most conspicuous through their absence.

The Review of 1946 had several dedicated, competent and hard working individuals who would have been a credit to any organization anywhere. There were also a few grumbling layabouts, plus a handful of rotting cadavers who paid about their ability and performance, mixed in with a few more paid at a rate greatly in excess of their performance or the level of medium city.

There must have been a time when Mr Quick was intelligent, shrewd thrifty and courteous individual, but details comparable to any in the industry but the years and somewhere and taken than sell. He had given up on trying and called an embargo recruited from the marketplace — and on 1938, in Saltaisbeurn, it was a seller's market.

Over the years the crew to which I had fallen into had developed work habits for which "diversity" is not to be taken words. Typesetting machines were not interrupted until a part started squeaking, metal shavings created by the trimmer would be allowed to accumulate until the piles interfered with the operation of the machine or the resulting pore were short of metal; type was left unattended. All of these habits were penalized, with the result that all the compositors worked with hands and arms that were pinky and black. Water paper was thrown on the floor even if there was a washbasin only a few feet away. After all, there was a janitor coming in at night.

Some of these practices were corrected through repetitive insistence. With some I came in at night and did not tell the janitor job myself — sweeping up shavings, washing inky printing forms, picking up discarded, balled-up proofs — until my point had been made. Others never changed until we switched to offset printing in 1963. Habits die hard and bad habits can be almost indestructible.

My initial interest was each — nurtured by my innate background (acquired, not inbred) — that I told a relative who stopped by during my first week, and who may have unkindly suggested that staff changes might be my newly powerful for me that I hoped I would never have to fire anyone. He look of those astonishment is etched in my mind forever "Lots of luck!" was all he said

Then particular retribe was minutes examples of what assistance into the business would many until Murray operated an office supply and furniture store a block away and he came across a few days after my arrival, washed in a large, open-warming-tank, and he asked me a take pick for new furniture for my office He was nothing of not a good salesman and would have succeeded in a handsome ads except for two failures: first, I didn't have excellent to spare, and, I knew it secondly for all my pretensions I knew that my first priority as a female business establish would have to be modernization of the Herter's establishment

However I assured him that the present in had existed were valid, and would be remembered when the time came to beautify and modernize the office. Then I added with what I hoped was just the right touch of humorous irony my expertise that he would die remember that I had run in business. He just dropped and he assumed a defeated voice "Oh I suppose you know?"

While I was still wondering why a way that I was supposed to know his statement use the salesman that he was calling printed matter in accordance with the Book of Rules, those local printers tended to regard their tasks as sacred territories, shown almost by flat, and not fair game for competition They had thousands of dollars worth of printing in salesmen boxes that no longer received but could not stomach a local stationer selling printing and farming it out Murray's doing so had caused a feud blend between him and M Rjrob he was absolutely certain the same would happen with me and he had struck quickly in the hope of nipping his pride before I became his enemy

For back to stuff

When I visited the Herter office to negotiate the purchase about a month before taking over I spent a few minutes in the Herter office A handsome young man about my own age, and obviously a salesman came in from the shop floor. He was introduced to me in quick succession, and gave me a bouncing little smile.

I have always told Herter Herter that at the moment I had promised myself that this smart aleck would be the first to go. I really didn't grow my general views on firing, but I did resent that bouncing look and vowed to get rid of him as soon as my I'm glad I didn t, because Herter became my first favourite, an utterly dependable fellow worked of prodigious energy and many skills a treasured and true friend, and the Herter's sales manager for many years until he retired just a few months short of thirty years later

Herter was one of the finest line-operators I have ever met, and I have met hundreds. He was also a self-taught machinist who could always coax a broken typesetting machine to keep producing until the paper was cast and permanent repairs could be effected overtime was an accepted part of weekly earnings per file, Hector resented it for himself if a row of running in early. He fought stuck grudgingly an hour or two after five, but usually he would manage evening work to others and repair to the beverage room for a few hours before going home as early refreshment. He would come to an early in the morning on the work load required — and I mean as early as four — and pinned out type at considerable speed. By the time I came in at eight, all items and ad copy had been pre-verified to type properly and was waiting to be proofread.

Herter would do everything willingly except work evenings At a time when Tuesday night

Another real asset was Ray Winters, a young green-eyes-nose working for some minimum wage. When the casualty-on came and half the staff resigned, Ray was promoted to journeyman status. He was soon promoted to reporter and two years after that became plant foreman a short the same time the Hector became sales manager. Twenty years later he was still holding this position competently mainly dependably and functionally, a word you can only understand if you have utilized it personally more than once in a while.

Yet another legacy of the Quick administration was Phyllis Kanzky a short, plump, cheerful fresh and quick-witted English war bride, who nominated the duties of office manager without the title to common security pay.

The Review of 1956 was housed in the Mitchell Block at Santa Antonio and Second Street, in premises almost exactly four wide and 100 feet deep. Office and composing room were on the main floor and the press room and linotype in the basement. The ground-level offices were reserved from the composing room by a swinging door not drawn at about shoulder level to prevent customers

Whenever Phyllis had a demand, request or complaint for Hector and this might be a dozen times a day, she would bark for the composing room at quick-minute pace calling his name in a long, high-pitched scream — "HUBERTOOOOCK-TAAAAAAR!" — that began in the manner she turned her back to the counter and called when she reached the lines about thirty feet into the shop.

A year after I took over Phyllis became my first sales manager and held this job for several years until she and her husband and son moved to British Columbia. She was good at the job: personable cheerful and intelligent — and sometimes unbelievably ambitious. We had one major advertiser who could never be depended upon to know his ad copy ready for publication on Friday and not as to hold a full page — but On Tuesday or night still he waiting, and calling his office only to learn that he was out of town and that he knew his neighbor Joe Blow bought boxes in Tuesday afternoons or even Wednesday and work out the ad with Phyllis as Hector as he might not show up at all. Having run a big sale on the Phyllis several times when this was desperate would go to the advertiser's house while he was eating breakfast and have him dictate the copy amber between mouthfuls of eggs and toast. He still speaks highly of her.

It was Phyllis also, who on one of the rare occasions in some forty years financial policies that men make or break a new enterprise with minimal capitalization. Left to myself and unfortunately enamored of a shrinking bank account I might have fallen into the common trap of putting all the paying o bills until the deserved situation improved. Phyllis, schooled in Mr. Quick's hint business ethics, never asked me if I wanted to pay an account at that time. She clutched invariably two copies and brought them to me for signing: looked at the total and when she brought them, as though afraid cash from that I might shoot at her refuse to sign the cheques as many breaks into tears. Shocked I might have been tempted on some occasions to put off signing a cheque that would almost wipe out the bank account. I couldn't bring myself to destroy her trust however temporary. The upshot was that I learned to solve an present financial difficulties with my banker instead of allowing the issue of my creditors

Would that every rookie entrepreneur had a Phyllis to set him straight.

These first steps people on a run-down paper that had no legacy. Its power and there were also a few appearances who became employees of strong degree of value at the Review and elsewhere. What brought down the average was a handful of journeymen whose average competence on energy and above average in wage rates. Mostly they had been hired for exceptionally busy periods and stayed on when work slowed off. Unfortunately a few of these ess, through example, Isolde had work before them. «me is to launch the establishment long after they have gone their way

Among those was Ed, an amateur tradesman who would get unsolicitating assistance to foil completely and talk your ears off with excuses and were suggestions. He was also a "saving collector" and blepharoscope, and had more curiosity than a shampoo cat. There was no area behind the downstairs washrooms filled with treasures she had "found. This included a section of four or five electric saws to be positioned that they would be taken for a washing area for the handymen. Ed had many cans of unusual penetrating oils which had been "given" him by previous employers. I have often wondered what I "gave" him when he left.

On one of my first evenings at the Rowers' Team setting up my office going through piles and piles of news releases correspondence and past photo junk that completely filled the room. The desk drawers were crammed those were last-high piles covering the entire desk except for a tiny working space there were piles two feet high along the walls I set aside every possible minute to shine through all that for the commercial document or letter that had to be built with, and to create some badly needed working space for myself.

Ed stopped at the door of my office to see what I was doing, and remarked unsympathetically on the job set out for me I agreed, and held up a broken door lock that had been knocked from one of the drawers

Jean look at the "I exclaimed "Now why would anyone want to keep that?" Ed chuckled his baritone sympathetically and continued that like. Quick would keep anything. I found the pieces of junk into the wastebasket, when suspen. Ed must "If you're throwing it out anyway do you mind if I take it? Might just come in handy some day "

Thursday was party time

Breaking on the Job was another bad operation that had to be celebrated. I don't know how I would have handled it, but fate and Bruno's genuine capacities in dealing with people turned this problem around for me before I could even think about what I was going to do about it.

In true summer, Jeans lodge in Weyburn that once the paper had been put to bed it was party time at the Review Press Thursday noon staff the assistant would had been performed in 5 minutes alcoholic hate This was my initiation, that set were screwed about It even before we took over.

It happened that on Thursday and Friday of the week before the takeover Bruno and I were there to do preliminary work such as stocktaking. At one point, Bruno went downstairs for one reason or another and was just to toast to see one of a charged of journeymen hitting a step from a ladder. I don't know how Bruno might otherwise have handled it, but one of the journeymen played into his hands by offering him a flask

Bruno accepted the bottle took a healthy pull, smacked his lips appreciatively and said "Thanks... then was very good But for God's sake don't ever let Ernie see you Who knew that a right there "There would very soon become one of the most famous hadn't threatened anyone and would even grow on he around I hadn't said anything to they couldn't hold the takeover and would even come to be around I hadn't been warned I never saw a warning signs on But they knew they could never say they hadn't been warned I never saw a battle around except for the occasional" gang down. I mentioned myself on special occasions.

Years later Hector and I got into the best habit of sharing a whiskey in my office on Wednesday afternoons, after the paper had been put to bed and the shop staff had gone home These are times we had our most of whose turn it was to trust and both soon "around After several such exchanges developments, with each inviting at least and hearth these about to the wind we reluctantly agreed to keep our little indulgence

Having mentioned some of the shortcomings of staff I inherited, I must confess that my own introduction to staff recruitment brought disasters of its own. It hadn't taken me very long to realize that I could not employ handicapped persons advertising newsmen, with some stories and addresses, take pictures, cover news events, sign cheques and handle all the surprises associated with management, and work on the lines several evenings a week. Admirably. It was with some relief that I decided to have someone to do the mailing out, only reducing my workload (really forming it into other areas) and my time away from the office, but also relieving me of a duty that was not really my strength.

By first (and probably only) applicant was Sam Evans K. who supposedly had said all secretarial and/or printing experience. He was a tall, lumbering, most individual with a tousled mop of brown in his face. He brought in very few ads, spent hours at his little corner studying the mail services (books of advertising illustrations), then proudly brought bundles of advertising layouts to show me. Trouble was, they were not layouts for the retailers from whom we were soliciting advertising; they were all house ads advertising printing and advertising. I couldn't seem to get through to him that I expected him to sell space for the paper, not to design ads for it.

Every evening I would see him standing motionless inside the window of the Sea Hotel where he had taken a room, smiling his smile and for all the world looking like someone inspecting mendelssohn company. Perhaps that is hindsight, because a day or two after I terminated the arrangement, how can I read a London story almost one Ernest H. who had been charged unwanted and sent in prison for defrauding an employer of something like $60. I the same time; concurrent visits not encouraging.

In the field between H. to H. and I thought I had it licked. He was young, good-looking, pleasant and quite keen and looked as you with sheer eyes that beside almost everyone. Likeable bastard.

Mike was in attached as the newspaper business the two years I led it he might write some new version Around that idea would be most appropriate. He came to Eagle at its inception every almost a farmhouse five near a neighboring village where several people and been served by the because of our individual.

Mike was always on the go which was encouraging, even though he did not bring in very much new advertising. Such Christmas approaching, I suggested he contact not only our regular advertisers for greetings but the mayor and aldermen and merchants in nearby towns and villages. It was gratifying to see the Christmas advertising line grow and particularly the success he was having in selling outdoor Lucas ads to the small town merchants. He told me a friend had lent him a car to go to these towns.

Then one day the radio station manager Keith Baker came to see me, and asked me in private if Mike B. was no longer working for me. I assured him he was, and he suggested I do some checking because Mike was also driving for the local taxi company. He said media several complaints to the radio station and when asked if he had quit the Review explained he was only making the delivery at a favor to a friend.

Before I had time to look how the matter the local police control me and informed me that he was approaching in court on various charges of theft. He had been stealing merchandise from one of customers when making on them and selling it to a second-hand dealer at reduced prices. The officer asked me if we were missing anything, and I honestly said was we were not.

Mike's father (from a small village some distance from Weyburn) was in court next day and agreed to make restitution so Mike was handed a suspended sentence.

About one day later Phyllis Kinsley my bookkeeper came to my office with a troubled look on her face, and showed me the accounts receivable ledger card of a recently opened furniture store. This was the single new account Mike had developed locally. The card showed charges entered by Phyllis and a payment because as someone else's handwriting. Phyllis asked if I had made the entry. Of course I had not.

She then explained that Mike had asked for the card because the furniture store manager wanted a statement before month-end, and he intended to prepare it himself. This bothered Phyllis and a few days later by the actual the receivables card found a "payment" entered that did not show up in the bank or anywhere else.

Naturally I was straight to the furniture store to get to the bottom of things and was shown a Review business learning representation between to make payment directly to Mike. I briefly was about about this merchant's honesty or intelligence, but decided he, like myself was true to the business world, and I'm sure Miss Bad told him a phonetic fairy tale on his clear-eyed, sensible way.

Mike was back on city jail meat duty but the imaginative decided to consider duel hissy as part of the original list of offenses to which succession had already been outpointed, and had him released. No restitution was necessary that time.

Earlier I mentioned the fire reported by Mike. I recalled it months later, and with burning fuse decided that no had been the product of an over-active imagination. When I put that on paper thirty years later I finally decided to go for broke and I telephoned a Review court correspondent who had lived in Ecuador — some of that fire — most of his life. She remembered both the people and the fire as Mike must have gotten something right for me. I did not, however, check out the details, inasmuch as the lawyers expected no successes.

It so turned out, after our Christmas issue had been printed and billed, that some of the side "visits" in the small towns had been approved from a number of local advertisers refused to pay for that Christmas ads because Mike had placed them without approval! Have often wondered how more local businessmen suspected me of a policy of running unapproved ads. The owner of the taxi company for whom Mike had been driving on flawless time, actually had the nerve to approach me for payment for Mike's taxi bill.

After a few more "adventures" who said nothing but went simply marking time and running a few dollars between more outside jobs Phyllis offered her services and I quickly realized that here was a solution handed me by a gracious providence to make up for some of my other woes, self-inflicted or otherwise.

A hard look at reality

In late summer of 1958, about two months after my secondmany to the very tower of power manager, publisher and editor I took off my rose-tinted glasses, looked at the situation in the production department as in stark reality, and examined myself in sober fashion that were sure to bring about a tariff cream, and ended a personal one.

Edward Quick had done a fine job of salving over the Review during the depression, had worked hard through the war years which and brought increased, however list had been accompanied by chronic shortages of labor materials and equipment. In the earlier years of post-war growth he had expended methods ently to meet increased demands, but, as was the custom in markets that he bought mostly used equipment. Each second-hand press or linecaster purchased brought problems characteristic not only to the machine's genre but those developed on such in the process of years of use and abuse.

By the time I arrived on the scene, Mr. Quick had given up on one or two brands. Wishing to enjoy some of the fruits of his years of labor he was reluctant to overspend on modernization which would not only reduce his cash outcome but might drive up the price of the business beyond the means of a potential purchaser. So also began to take a few extended trips, and his family having opted against remaining in the business, had had to rely entirely on hired help. In the labor market of Saskatchewan in the late 1950s, this means he had to pay higher than going rates to marginally competent employees.

A newer breed of editor takes in stride about the weekly newspaper I reported some day to acquire, had been that I would walk in and grandly announce rather for all A general and declared staff would then dig in and double efficiency and join me enthusiastically in turning out, within a few short years, the finest weekly newspaper in Canada.

That isn't the way it worked out.

Without taking the reader through the mental mazes and anguish of the decisions I made in order to survive the upshot was that my rate adjustment in every month discovered Coupled with traditional resistance to new management, and reservation from an underutilized Leader Post and an expansion-minded Estevan Mercury about half of the staff resigned en masse, and I was left to march into the golden future with a handful of returns of the Review workbooks a few appreciative ads decided to stick it out and newly recruited employees nearly unrecorded.

While the decade never quite died, it went on the backburner while a few of us worked long hours to keep the body heat afloat.

Coming to grips with the conditions of the book shop was an adventure as in one right During the 1930s and later An economic recession had become at the growing supply of typesetting machines being replaced in daily newspapers, it had become common for workers to install used machines and with them, often the problems the went with equipment that had seen many years of heavy unusual paying levels of maintenance.

Two makes of linecasting machines dominated the North American market, Linotypes and Intertypes and looked identical to the layman. In the trade, however it was necessary to refer to them generically to know about the original of the two, the references become, say, "linos" till across either Linotypes or Intertypes Many of the operators of these keys had only one-day-job training, and varying degrees of proficiency. Some operators, of course were real craftsmen-plus, and on the other extreme there were some who flailed at the large keyboard with fingers-up systems of their own invention and sometimes managed to coax type out of the machines.

Breakdowns and minor mechanical failures were commonplace some such time had literally hundreds — some likely thousands — of moving parts. Wear and lack of lubrication could cause stoppages or poor performance and the character which worked machines into their individual idiosyncrasies, might stop classes of users as a day (Matrices are boxes molds of individual typographical characters — from which the lines of type are cast.)

Minor emergencies were the responsibility of the operator. If stumped, he would seek help from the in-house self-trained expert, in many cases the publisher who had seen much variety of breakdowns that there was little he hadn't faced before. A broken part might be welded by the local machinist if no spare was on hand In any event most workmen had several old flesh and could figure out something to get back to the keyboard.

A frustrating and time-consuming emergency was the mat of flesh. referred to in the trade as a squirt or a splash.

A few functions it to cast lines of type A lead alloy is melted in an enclosed pot to a temperature of 550 degrees F At each line of matrices is assembled. It is mechanically wedged between two steel jaws; the pot pours the molten metal into a mold the has been moved flush against the line of matrices The metal solidifies almost instantly as adjusted to cool while the mold slide arrange activates the ejection position, to which point the finished slug of type is ejected by a narrow steel blade, into a metal "stick" in type-like confidence) in which the lines are accumulated until the stick is full to the point of copy has been typeset.

The molten pot has heating elements both at the bottom and in the metal-piece and they must be kept at temperatures within a tight range. Variations will cause the metal to solidify too quickly or not quickly enough Either condition can cause flash or squirt of molten metal all over the front of the machine, and even on the operator himself He doesn't enjoy himself out of the way to come.

Squirts may also be caused by lines of matrices assembled too tightly or fit between the jaws, or too loosely to be justified that is, pushed to either side by wedge-shaped spaces bands dropped between words to fill the space between the jaws Another culprit can be dust on standard that it impedes locking of the mold slide at he casting stage The metal ejected over the front of the machine and onto the operator's sticks and sometimes, and must be chipped away before production can resume. This may take anywhere from five to fifteen minutes. If metal is left somewhere where it can all set hardcap, another squirt may be only minutes away

A line may operate smoothly without a squirt, but one squirt often leads to more of the same, particularly if the operator begins to suspect the temperature settings and makes adjustments. A squirt-filled day can be extremely frustrating and costs unproductive

Counting up a squirt was the individual operator responsibility he weekly shops unless help was needed to adjusting the constant settings. Then the in-house "expert" would step in, and if a new element had to be installed, the local electrician would be brought to

On the day Berne and I came to effect the take-over George Coghill was in the Review shop installing an electrical part on one of the linos. It was clear that he was very much at home there and when he learned we were the new owners, did not hesitate to let us know we could expect to get to know him quite well. He was right!

One of the two Review linos had on many occasions stops that on more than one occasion behind the machine to clear and restart it. The contributor line was so worn that matrices dumped regularly into wrong channels. This "chimera" as many typographical errors that no amount of proofreading could catch them all.

It was during my second or third week that one of the three managers with an investment in the radio station stopped me on the street and shouted me a copy of the Review which he had given in the middle of proofreading. It looked pretty bad.

Then some years, was one of the regular expressions that blew west of there. It was offset by the encouragement received. Readers and advertisers, generally speaking, were out of their way to encourage us and to compliment us on every little improvement in the paper - sometimes even on non-existent ones.

For instance we early improvement I was able to implement without any financial outlay was setting start type in a semi-solid base instead of the eight-point base that had been used in the Review for many years. Thereby reducing the number of lines of type per inch of depth. This improved legibility by adding a bit more space between lines. A bit off of that improvement could be had from type was required to fill the same inches, and two were able to eliminate a lot of boilerplate that was being used to offset lack of charge by individuals or organizations with more to print. Immediately people stopped me on the street to express their appreciation for increasing the local news coverage. In fact there was some date increment simply a reduction of non-local content with which they had become familiar.

The proofreading incident may well have been the catalyst for a long-overdue mission. We heard of a reconditioned machine available from a Winnipeg printing machinery company and made a down payment on it. While waiting for delivery I simply ordered the machine(missing from the most malfunctioning) machine instead off. Instead I staggered the hours in the one machine and put in a number of hours nightly myself.

The Review had an Intertype a machine which cast fonts of larger sizes of type from hand-distressed brass matrices. Many fonts were set, as much as possible from the largest font available on the linos - 24 point. Caslon Bold Condensed. This would be about one-third of an inch in height, from top to the bottom of descenders. Anything larger had to be handset and the Review had dozens of ancient cases of display type in this purpose.

An assembled page of type weighing considered to the neighborhood of one hundred pounds contained hundreds of individual pieces and the form, when locked had to be tight so nothing but a single piece could be dispersed by pushing fingers. This was necessary to keep the mitering of the press area and so that the forms would withstand the stress and movement of thirteen of printing impressions without coming apart.

Because the pressroom was in the basement, someone had overcome the inconvenience and drudgery of carrying heavy forms up and down stairs by installing a home-made lift. A platform could be raised and lowered through a square hole in the floor. Blank and inactive and perfect were used to mount, supposedly both way running of the loaded platform, and lowering at a slow speed. Suppose however and miscalculated the balance and with a load of four pages of type the lift would plunge down at a speed that guaranteed disaster.

Although every apprentice was warned of this and a rope on which the operator of the lift always as was the lower part provided whenever lowering forms, every apprentice made the same error: he would load on the fourth page, and, panicking when the lift plunged downward, grab the rope (with bare hands the sign having been ignored) in error, the lift a disastrous plunge. I was a mistake each made only once, because the resulting rope burns were extremely painful, and usually resulted in the victim being off work for several days while hands healed. When one apprentice was seriously hospitalized, I had down the lift and isolated that the printing forms be marked up and down scales. It was a decision not generally accepted but I couldn't bear to see those wounded hands.

I have mentioned the build up's dimensions but not that was one of the oldest business blocks in the city. The Review's part of it had been occupied by the paper for fifty years or more. The work areas were illuminated by naked light bulbs hanging from the ceiling the plaster walls and ceilings had not seen repair in decades.

Builds adding to the place's air of antiquity the building through the leasing arrangement, offered another dimension in my education as to what a property's bounceaway may expect. There was no written lease, which meant as I discovered at to someone when I misjudged my perceptions the I could in flung out on my ear on short notice, but I was otherwise fully obligated in the items and two-half years remaining on the "lease."

Despite shortcomings of staff and machines, and disappearing cakes what made the first year me only bearable but memorable it first least some of the worst was my introduction to the role of small town publisher in his community something that it itself is interesting to a degree that affects many deficiencies. Needless to say there positive experiences extended through the years and typified the weekly newspaper publishing profession.

One of the characteristics of city life the had eventually brought me to Weyburn and been the growing realization which we lived in Toronto, that I wasn't really a part of the world around me finding in and from down town I seem to daily. Perhaps it was I also from not merely the knowledge that personal losses daily were suspended more y in being taken from one place to another like a load of artifacts in load of coal. Or by the feeling that everything important was not happening in spots of my Whatever I travelled in that burgeoning city of the 1950s I saw highway bridges, interchanges apartment buildings and skyscrapers under construction and it was all happening so though I didn't even exist. In Weyburn the feeling that I was disappeared as I came in subsidence of the community and identified with aspirations and dreams.

It was a break on pressure to be summoned to a party or everything going on in the community and in advance of the local newspaper accorded privileges and considerations that I and not accustomed to backstage seats.

No more than six weeks after coming in Weyburn I received a meeting to which Premier Tommy Douglas was guest speaker Someone introduced to and to attend. I invited me over by remarking, "Oh you you'll from Southam's aren't you?" (in words to that effect).

The ability to remember change about people and surprising and disarming them with this knowledge is to one of the acknowledged strengths of T. C. Douglas. In every case, since Weyburn was his constituency it is hardly surprising as he made it his business to know almost a change in the ownership of the local paper. and to acquaint himself to some extent with the new publisher's background. For me however also had never been exposed to anything larger to the political hierarchy than a roadside glad-handing for votes it was a welcome to be addressed as almost familiar terms to the premier of a province.

It was on my first weekend following the takeover that I learned that a number of villages towns and rural municipalities to the country north of Weyburn had signed an agreement to establish a Moraine Regional park on the Souris River near Hidale. Mr. William C. Mainstone was a prime mover since who had secured the area for many years. I drove to Hidale that Sunday to interview George Hallberg, secretary-treasurer of the R. M. of Lyon and an officer of the park board. I also interviewed Mr. Mainstone although "interview" is a misappropriate when applied to the line. He was sport reluctant to answer any questions if the answers to them were likely to show him as a favourable light. However, I did photograph him at his back yard at the shack of a tree, and the photo was still being used on park literature thirty years later.

A year later almost to the day I was to attend the official opening of the park, where thousands gathered to honor him. A brief but heavy downpour interrupted the ceremonies, and once a person left the platform benches to use for shelter. There never seen anything like it in my life before or since. Asked to say a few words, the fine got up and mumbled that as always Mr. Mainstone would do the talking added "thank you" and plodded the mike to his seat.

Eight years later I took a photo of "the boy" and a baby he had just delivered — one of thousands he had helped into the world. What made this most unique was that he had also delivered not only both of the infant's parents, but at least one of the grandparents.

Covering the events that reflected the life of Weyburn accounted for many different occurrences under a thick hood my fellow residents of city and district. None however, was more emotional than my introduction to Monty Adelspike at the wedding of the one and the dark.

In late 1958 or perhaps early January of 1959 the roof of the Moose Jaw hockey arena collapsed leaving that city's junior hockey franchise the Canucks, homeless for the rest of the season. All Weyburn had to offer at the old Arcadian Rink with its natural ice and leaky roof, Beast was better than nothing, and a mass decided to play the rest of the team's home games here.

A campaign to build a rink and bring junior hockey to Weyburn was going neat high gear at the time, as hockey promoters decided to use the presence of the Canucks to attract attention to and create interest in the hockey

Days were planned for one of the earlier games to Weyburn drew on old rivalries and hockey lore. Back as far years when Weyburn and Moose Jaw teams competed in the same league Weyburn players and fans had derogatorily referred to the Moose Jaw rink as one barn while Moose Jaw folks retaliated by referring to the Weyburn arena as a shack proof.

The friendly exchange of insults had progressed and climaxed with Weyburn fans taking a large cardboard cut to a Moose Jaw game, labeling it one for sale and "unlucky" in between, it worked. This was reached in 1956 and was a Moose Jaw fans now playing out of Weyburn, it was decided fitting to end the old feud to a marriage of the one and the dark as a hockey game. Live cameras were brought in the rink with reporter Ross Bellamy at the microphone in the fall calibrating

Naturally I was on hand to take pictures and was basking away from the "scalding" some to penetrate the camera range. Behind me, Adelspike a district farmer and acknowledged character I had not met before was walking across the ice pulling a sled — for reasons I forgot — with a high sawdust box on it. I backed into the sled, the box toppings rode behind the farmer and I fell into it. I was wearing slip-on rubbers, and as I scrambled into the box, my feet kicked suddenly squeezed of both rubbers scored about ten feet out the air

The collision a to so well timed that the crowd believed it to be staged and roared its approval by a manly-executed loud I couldn't even get out of the box without Monty's help, and was lucky to get out of the incident unhurt and with my camera intact. But that's how I met Monty and many a time he told the story to mere to come.

Speaking of pictures it was during my first summer as Weyburn I looked next taking a picture which was to be reproduced in Time Magazine about a year later. I came to Weyburn with no more knowledge of photography than Bernie had been able to still not can be served sheet sentence. Events himself took most of the pictures for the Carillon News, a paper on which he in liberal use of photos long before the switch to offset printing. Bruno had been a hobbyist photographer since high school, and even in later years supplemented his income by photographing weddings. It was a dream of his to have a photo published in Time and whenever he took an unusual picture, or photographed an event he considered uncommon, he would rush copy to Time with appropriate information. He never made it

In summer of 1958 I covered the Rose-lighting ceremony held downtown to mark the coming of summer and service. Political rivals Premier Tommy Douglas and Weyburn Mayor Jack Sainsbury together turned a dual symbolizing the turning on of the gas. It was almost dusk and I had never before taken a flash photo so made to this type of lighting. I asked Leader-Post reporter and because representative Pete Wenger what settings to use. He suggested I set the camera, aimed it and shot.

Just seven year later Time sent a reporter to Weyburn to write a story on Weyburn's handling of the economic consequences of the oil industry. While researching the story Time reporter Ed Ogle became interested in the continuing political feud between premier and mayor. He asked if I had pictures of them and I proudly offered him three lighting shots of the two men together.

He accepted them, unenthusiastically, assuming that Time was not too keen on using year-old pictures with current stories. As it happened, both Douglas and Sainsbury were speaking at a meeting while Ogle was between and he was able to take as many bits of pictures both posed and candid, of them during the evening. That dashed-in hope... but no surprise whatsoever. These features was a few weeks later... was granted by my lucky Scots-lighting idol.

Earlier I mentioned Pete Wenger of the Leader Post, with whom I was to enjoy a long and rewarding association but one which got off to a rocky start. Pete's office was across the street from the sprawling Regina offices of the Star Phoenix. While he worked long hours, his rules-by pursuit of him to spend a lot of time at the Rex was charming with staff and keeping his nose open for anything they might be in planning on the occasion by.

Many people he'd told me within the first few months there was little point in read ng the Review because anything of what already appeared in the Leader ... those days the Leader had a policy of covering communities where the paper had representation as ... called in Weyburn, allotted as thoroughly as the hard weekly Blue Weyburn. Some of any important-ance had indeed found that it was the pages of the Leader before they appeared in the Review. In addition, I discovered that Pete and the Review reporter shared information on stories, but of course the Leader came out every day and was able to get its news stories before the Review.

Premier Douglas and H ... St. Sing

The Review reporter and Pete also took turns at the time-consuming job of covering the weekly meetings of city council, and writing a story to be used by both papers. Again regardless of who had written the story, it appeared first in the Leader and the public took it for granted that the Review was simply copying the daily's report.

I noted this to no greater by taking over council coverage myself and writing hard at using local leads that would be different from Pete's. I also encouraged sharing information on which we might have an exclusive. Soon thereafter there was a difference of opinion about the existence of certain information we had received at council. The misunderstanding imposed a further strain on our relationship, and for a while we were barely speaking from the mouths and noses outward the object was diagreed, and we watched together comfortably back in requesting the space and so serving on community organizations such as the Chamber of Commerce. However there were never again to have a hint of the easy arrangement of the past.

A few years later, when we were back to a reasonable level of co-operation I almost socked Pete, and scared he he bargain.

It was a late August afternoon and Pete and I were in the same place when we learned that a garage in Moose, about 35 m ile southeast, was on fire. We decided to save on gas costs and share a Mercury car any way. He'll be probably the hottest day of the summer and it was several years before air-conditioning became common to cars. So we opened our windows and turned the vent fans on full blast. Nothing helped and the hot air blowing from the vent felt like a desert wind. In fact it turned out that someone had turned on the heater and most of the way to Moose Jaw the near-100-degree temperature was getting a boost from this source.

Press journalism of many so dignify the pictures I took with little previous experience played a strong part in getting recognition for our efforts to improve the paper. This was the time when a few daring weeklies were beginning to use photos, but the photo-making process was still slow and costly. Our Blast was to be developed in the local photo studio. Chatsworth, then west, marked and encouraged by an exploratory note by Jim Bay to Bertha as to Smithers. They would have prints made, have prints and return them to us a few days later, step by step. With all them steps and the long-distance newspaper, if some photo was not likely to appear to poke under a knee two days after the event. No matter how local pictures were new to Weyhaven readers and they ate them up. Sometimes the consequences were embarrassing.

Mistaken Identity

One evening I took some pictures at a test dance and selected for printing a photo of a particularly good-looking young couple. I asked someone who the pair were and identified the photo accordingly when it was in the Review. A few days later the father of the girl stormed into my office in a rage because something in him we had incorrectly identified the boy dancing with his daughter.

It turned out the father had forbidden his daughter to see the young man. When confronted with the evidence she got get out of it by saying it was the Review error that the boy she was shown with in the photo (his back toward the camera) was another boy who looked remarkably like the out-of-bounds admirer.

On another occasion my candid photograph resulted in problems with the police for the subject. Wondering around on a nice Sunday afternoon looking for a suitable subject to flash out a blond work I snapped a shot of a head man giving his youngsters a ride on a sled drawn by his car. This is illegal, and although I took the picture without malicious intent, the police were able to trail the owner's license number, and as a result rather charged the driver of issued a warning. He wasn't at all happy with the Review.

It still amazes when I remember the former who birthed so far supper to get some publicity. He invited me to bring my wife and children in his farm home to Sunday supper aiding mysteriously that "would find it worthwhile to bring my camera. It turned out he raised cattle, including show animals which he took to various fairs and exhibitions throughout the province. He and all his medals, trophies, ribbons and other memorabilia on display with the obvious expectation of a newspaper

While I knew I had been used I attention to accept that his achievements probably deserved some publicity. So I ran a story and a photo. What I later more was that I discovered later that the farmer was telling people that if you wanted publicity in the Review the best way to get it was to feed the editor and his family a meal.

Of course as long as there are newspapers there will be individuals who try by devious means to steer the newspapers attention toward themselves or their interests or in the opposite direction. A rather insignificant instance often comes to mind because it was so ridiculous. The city was planning to acquire land on which to build a library. A man owned my office around the door and with a conspiratorial grin told me he would make it worth my while if I wrote an editorial forming a particular location. He owned land in one of the areas being considered, and thought the right person would appreciate the value of his property. I've always wondered what my "while" was supposed to be worth. $50? $100?

Much more common, of course, were instances of people wishing to have happenings particularly offensive, covered from our coverage. Often there seeking exemption on behalf of someone attention the the culprit deserved both the legal penalty and the publicity but there was always a dear old grandmother who could very well take it hard inside if the lawsuit of her grandchild's misconduct. I usually concurred with the assurance that grandmother hadn't lived to a ripe old age without experiencing a bit of shocks and disappointments.

Perhaps I was too permit myself to feel sympathizing toward people reduced to pleading on behalf of an errant loved one. Scorn, ridicule and contempt are not easy to bear for to years and the form and circumstances can be very subtle as anyone who has exposed

Once when I was still covering the court beat myself. I received a photo roll from a young man who had been convicted of a number of burglaries. After telling me the particulars he cheerfully demanded "What does a guy do to keep his name out of the paper?" "Stay out of trouble. I replied my sympathies not extending to bold extortion.

He started to argue and doubling his name's getting anywhere, demanded to speak to the boss. He was immediately when I told him I was the boss. Do you mean you run the paper and go to court and write stories too?" I assured him that I had been known to sweep the floor.

Then a young fire eldest that he would like to be real source enlightened on the day after the Review was out and dismissed who I would be telling the whole world her age. I summarized something about not knowing we had done to and he could back "Twenty years ago Shannon-year-old Mary Jones." Cast the said aimed. Saturday was everyday "Whatever."

Do you suppose people can't edit science and twenty?" Then after allowing me to suffer for a few moments she burst out laughing at my embarrassment and s the joke on herself.

Hale sweetheart a bit disconcerted that we young when grown or eight young tough walked in any office, looking to me it was obviously their locale to speak for them. I knew the paneling had been up for a fairly tasteful softness and while I was not familiar with any of them but no doubt that they had dropped a take up have the gathering story show how would not go unpunished.

Realizing that the leader was putting on a show for his pals and couldn't afford to lose face I had to use some tactics than I am usually noted for. I asked him if the silence was to notions that he couldn't live a to the community's knowledge of it. He admitted such a girl. I had to be serious enough. I asked if he thought no one would know about it if I did not print the story. He allowed that it was unlikely.

"So" I asked "If some people know about it do you think what they will say about a girl be better or worse than the truth?" He admitted that rumor conceivably could be worse, and he and his friends stomped out without so much as a thanks.

Just a year to one ago a young c cross-legged young int. identified herself explained that she had been convicted of knighting and wondered if it was necessary to mention it in the paper when it received a "once person (her words) like herself.

Some of the newspaper s own sins of omission or commission also add grist to the publisher's hair. Probably one of the worst in my experience it was reported on the conviction of a man who had — under the influence of liquor & drugs to both — drove his car through a tent in Kitchener-Lake Front-on-a Park. Our story mentioned the names of the "deceased" — it very much did not name them parts — at least half a dozen names. The matter was brought to my attention by the head of the Royal Canal to Montreal Police department at Carlyle. a bit was an angry I was grateful he was not any more angry. One story was corrected in every detail except the very important one the name we had used as that of the accused had, in fact, been the name of the arresting officer. To add insult to injury the office had done a bit of work with Carlyle district police people on drug and alcohol education. To add further injury the story had been placed right next to a graduation story sure to be read by your agers, and to finish work, the officer was at the time, in Ottawa on a summer relations with the press

We placed apologies by the Review and several newspapers in the Carlyle area. By sheer happen stance Irene and I were seated at the same table as the officer to a banquet in Fall of 1980 and a the climax of a decent of calamity ourselves when we heard his name. Fortunately he was a man with a sense of humor and were wounds we had — and originally had healed well. He told us that when he had returned from Ottawa to Arcola, where he then lived people there had believed he was in prison. He had a whole scrap book existing to the matter including a photo of himself with head drawn over it furnished by thoughtful fellow officers

Into category all its own is the one we offended some readers with on April Fool's joke. It was 1981 with the first of April falling on a Wednesday. The new days had not yet been completed, and some, even in the 1980s the water reservoir had fallen to a dangerously low level. As it result, council found itself casting about for ways to alleviate a serious water shortage that caused inconvenience

Our Ottawa-based editor of the day Don McCaskill was inspired by photograph s a number of railway tank cars on a siding near Weyburn. The picture was run on page one with a caption explaining that they continued water being brought to from Lake Erie. We thought Lake Erie would tip off our readers to the joke, but he is on the safe side shared with the credit "Photo by Special Staff."

CONTINUED IN NEWSPAPERS

Hearing before thinking it over indignant readers deluged city hall with phone calls berating officials for bringing in water from far-away polluted Lake Erie with thousands of clean lakes available in Saskatchewan and neighboring Manitoba. What relief it was just a gag — and after simmering down — most thought it was a pretty original joke. A few accusations, just to be sure that they didn't appreciate ludicrous, were sent Agent Floyd Jokes, to their local newspaper.

Exactly early to my editorial answer I made a mistake for which a person I into trying to help paid rather painfully.

A reader who lectured near a village not far from Wayburn came to work at Leader as the Editor he wanted was to publish. He was on bad terms with the rural municipality owner plans operator who to increase how sensible's age's the road to his farm. He thought exposure of the man's hillsity might change his ways. Reading the letter I found it loaded with libel, but because a newspaper government was involved as employer of the plan operator I felt he probably had a case that deserved saving. His knowledge of English was limited and his sentence great and I decided to be a hero and help him. So I rewrote the letter on the spot, scrubbing out all the libel and unprovable accusations by giving readers a good idea of what the man was being subjected to.

I proudly showed him the finished product which he signed happily and gratefully. And that was the way we ran it. That was the end of it, as far as I was concerned, or so I thought, until Norman New Year's two-and-a-half years later — and I had to go to the hospital to take a picture of the New Year's baby. While I was waiting in the reception room for permission to go to the maternity ward, I noticed standing beside me, a very tall lanky-looking

I took him Happy. How Year and asked him how he was. "Pretty good now, he answered but added that th sign had been pretty rough.

"I'm've been sick!" I asked.

He looked at me strangely as though he expected me to know of his illness, then remembered was of the letter I had written for him. The next time he had visited his village the same plan operator had parked his machine in such a way as to ban to the farmer's vehicle. He had then dragged the farmer out of it and beaten the daylights out of him. He was just now being released from hospital. Letter I learned I had also been on the same plan operator's hit list but he had made known his intentions at the local beverage rooms and had been talk of no off it.

Ever since, I have been very careful not to be smart anymore with a Letter to the Editor in any manner that might identify me with the authorship.

Commercial printing

Job printing has been a traditional economic staple of the weekly newspaper industry, since in more productive week human existing facilities on the the days immediately following publishing day. Since the advent of offset printing, many weekly newspapers use centralized printing plants and quite a few as a result have found it uneconomic to maintain commercial printing departments, be the days of hot type, however anything that helped vary the monotonous and time operation' gay on Thursdays and Fridays was a boon. Although printing letterheads or cards bills is not a lighthouse customer, like any other facet of life, work and human relations, it provides its light moments.

It still tickles me to speak that I was once able to hold on to a printing order by resisting the price.

This was back in the days when wedding invitations were still, customarily, printed by the local printers. A selection of beautiful embossed wedding calibres was standard and the one was headed in old English or script type from type cases that tended to be badly depleted. Down the rest of the subjects, the meetings and the time-consuming process of typesetting, backup and printing, the final product was fairly expensive.

One day a publishers' rumor from the mental hospital planning to marry a psychiatrist came in with a simple invitation she wanted her own medical office. It was obviously a piece de exuberance, from her pride of view and she was uneasy about continuing it in a small-town establishment.

All it consumed in was a hand-torn sheet of construction paper with the text printed on it in ordinary sans serif type available on our line. She had torn hand and hand-torn the construction paper corresponding in here difficulty finding anything so coarse. The whole order would could only five minutes on the line another five minutes to back up the form, and perhaps fifteen minutes on the press

She asked if I thought we could handle the job.

"Of course. I rep. out, and yes wanting in offered by printing at two hundred eight dollars. (This was at a time when an inch and calculate would have cost twenty to thirty dollars.)

Eight dollars!" she almost shouted. "I am not having cheap invitations." She put out her hand for the example, the sonally intending to leave.

The way she would have explained here simple job it was but a higher (or possibly lower) price when people in say our that if I wanted that job I had better master my and feet.

"Oh my goodness!" I announced "I'm afraid I forgot all about the ish ch — the " and without finishing the sentence for personnel and a series of mental calculations, I quickly apologized for misquoting, and told her what she wanted was really more complicated than I had first supposed, and that it would cost $25 $30.

"Well, that's better," she exclaimed and although still obviously questioning my competence mental and otherwise, entrusted me with the job.

It is the nature of editors to be never registered time printing orders that all came about in clearing years was the two-color job for an itinerant evangelist — another expression of my first months in Weyburn. People like that must have just recognized me from a mile The evangelist, who was holding revival meetings in Weyburn came in with a young male companion Together they designed the letterhead, arguing possibly over details and placed an order for one thousand sheets printed in two colors That, from an unexpected source on the doldrums of July, was a bonanza. They even came in a few days later to say the pre-press proof be never pushed up the completed order — our product is.

And that's the last we ever saw of them

Printed on the letterhead was the Texas address of a religious organization with which the itinerant claimed some sort of affiliation. I sent the billing to that address, and failing to receive payment or acknowledgment, fired off a letter that must have carried an Texas still warm. This drew a reply advising that the party in question was not, in fact, affiliated in any way with the Texas organization

Having corresponded with the Texans, however my name unknowingly went on their mailing list, and every few months for the next few years I received from them words and offers of religious literature I didn't really need them reminders.

Some years later I drew the wrath of a customer by being party to a minor change that didn't meet his thinking

Local entrepreneur Wilbur Thompson purchased the Hi Rancho Hotel in Weyburn at about the time public dining rooms were first being licensed for the sale of liquor with meals. Wilbur came to me with the concept. Tom Dixon, and between the about of us we designed a handsome menu for the Ambassador Room as the dining room was to be called

Liquor licensing was still a touchy matter in Saskatchewan and everything associated with it including the printed price list or menu had to be approved by a representative of the provincial liquor board. Wilbur was out of town, presumably busy with his matter of rendezvous, when the time came for the okay on the menu so Tom Dixon came to ask that Wheeler from the liquor board.

After he had satisfied himself that everything about the menu was in sync with regulations.

Shad said, "There's just one thing the bothers me. The motel is called the Ill Rancho, and the closing room is the Ambassador Room." He thought the two names were incompatible, and asked where Ambassador fit in anyway.

"I dunno," said Tom, and asked what Shad would suggest.

Wheeler volunteered that Ranchero Room might be more appropriate and I seconded the suggestion. Asked if this would hold up the licensing, Shad asserted Tom that he could change the name on the form right there, and I too agreed the name could be changed on the menu without delaying the printing.

So the Ambassador Room became the Ranchero Room — and when Wilbur Thompson returned in November he blew his stack. I've mentioned he had a stable of racehorses. He had no particular love for a horse by the name of Ambassador.

A relief passage rate in the job printing department reaches "funeral pace."

In communities not served by radio or daily newspapers, and before commercial and quick photocopying techniques were available, it was customary to publicize deaths through special placard or strategic locations such as the post office, throughout town. A form of type was kept handy and when a death occurred the name, time of death and funeral particulars were changed. Several cards were printed and taken out in the various locations.

The Review had a small platen press with a growing earthen fee could be used for anything else. The funeral card form was always kept locked in a chase (a metal frame) of the right size and grade, post left no question on the press blanks so cards could be printed as quickly as possible. Inevitably the little press doubled the funeral work. We charged $2.50 for printing and distributing half a dozen cards with fifty cents removed added for a full dozen. Funeral directors delighted in bringing in a card order as we ran on Friday afternoons just as the plane was being loaded up. The loss of funeral cards as the revenue of the weekly newspaper industry has ceased for years

Rebuilding the plant

The depletion of the Review's staff soon after our arrival resulted us already, agreed on an early introduction to the joys and surprises of staff retirement. I made some boring statements that I find incredible to-day. Once I learned, early through bitter experience not to hire hoodlums when I needed people to shoot out cofferooms and to ask pointed questions my record improved. Having to attempt a diary keeping, but for all the disappointments had elements I still managed to have in the first few years people like Mary Gerrit who became my first news writer and Henry Aldrich the Review's hand panchina thirty years after. Many others have come and gone on to respected careers in writing, printing, radio, business and politics.

And while the staff was being rebuilt so the physical needs of the plant grew up to now many of the are replacements. Using the wa ds "love" and "state of the art" in my conversations as in the staff applied to acquisitions not many years later the linotype set, and until the great conversion to offset printing equipment in the newspaper composing room — the key production department — did not change significantly. With a few hundred hundred added, the issue in daily newspapers were not very different from the typesetting machines produced decades earlier — in fact, many parts were still interchangeable. The linos in weeklies were similar to those of the forties except, as noted earlier they tended to be hand-me-downs from larger plants.

However many time-saving devices as use on the by newspapers for many years simply had not found their way to the shops of their country cousins. This is probably due at least in part, to the fact that in the weekly shop of the depression years money was not readily available for capital expenditures. Hourly and staff worked evenings without overtime pay and wages were low for a result efficiency didn't count for much in the scheme of things and that isolation cut day-by-day profitability when higher wage rates, overtime pay paid vacations and other employee benefits became part of small-town life was like a lower level than in the large city

It would be satisfying to say that I had come to Warborough with a bold vision of modernizing. Although I had worked on modern printing shops in many parts of the continent and had every hope of streamlining, I thought of these machines in some sense as fetish to improve working conditions, the quality of the product and the appearance of the plant. Oh, I knew efficiency was a factor too. But not like dramatic factor: and we didn't have the money to lay out. Anyway I was willing to work within bounds to effect plant inefficiency. I believe I had some vague good of beginnings orphanages and modernization programs in short-five years after the new type-had been substantially reduced.

It was a account of Newton Rowtree's that made me modernize the program. I had insisted on the use of larger type on the news and advertising headlines to improve the appearance of the paper, and the larger type cannot set itself to be assembled from our drawer of type cases. Most times were depleted and a lot of type was tied up in standing forms, saved for subsequent event. It was one occurrence to set a line in a particular font of type only to find yourself short of a few letters. This left the skeleton, page-working and time-consuming of distributing the line back into the cases and rebuilding in another font (while possibly the same results) or scrounging through piles of standing forms to find the letters required in the appropriate font.

So one day early in 1930 Mr Rowtree approached me with a resolute look on his face and a long list of type needed to replenish our type fonts. I sputtered and protested that this would cost over one thousand dollars, and perhaps only temporary relief. Mr Rowtree remained. "If you expect us to use large type, we expect to have type to use, especially when we're paying more ahead of time."

With tense shaking and I could myself returned to my office to consider this latest headache.

Suddenly the notion-idea struck me that if I could get Indeed instead of I could arrange together the whole-metal to pay (the type demanded by Mr Rowtree I could always put a down payment for a Ludlow mark no which would alleviate the problem forever.

A Ludlow was a machine with which large type could be cast, up to an inch in height and perhaps larger and to line lengths of up to eighteen inches (in about four-inch sections). The lines were hand-assembled from brass matrices and cast from metal identical to that used in the regular linecasting machines Mark Twain could even be cast for quoting, and, as with type from these, the metal would be remelted and reused.

My plan as a representative of the Ludlow Corporation representative must have been heart-rending because he agreed to supply the machine for a down payment of one thousand dollars. The no payout proposition was nothing less than astonishing, and the higher quality was phenomenal as I had hoped it would be.

It was a much later that we bought a photo-typesetter of a sort. I've already mentioned the engineers I had been taught to place on local news phones, and local appreciation of them, in spite of the time lapse between the event and the published picture because of our reliance on plates produced in the mail-boats.

People were quick to accept improvement and also to recognize inadequacies in them, as it was a long before people began to wonder over the poor reproduction of newspaper pictures. About the same time, a revolutionary engraving process made it economical for large and medium-sized weekly newspapers to install in-plant engraving machines

While the process used in Steinbeck and in other engraving plants required costly special cameras, and heavy plate machines and all users of complicated and costly procedures (and produced excellent products), several companies were now offering small electronic engraving units assisted photographic and premixed home-use plastic plates in inverse proportion to the density of the corresponding areas of the photo. Fine patterns of various density on printing surfaces are the basis for printed photographs)

Quality was much inferior to solid-metal time plates, but at a rental of about $150 monthly requiring a space of only a few square feet, and able to turn out an engraving about eight inches square in twenty minutes, was a triumph of technology. Brochures advertising the machines — ours was a Micrographic — invariably showed a young, pretty smiling girl standing beside the machine. The message was clear: if a young, pretty, shifting girl was capable of running a Ritchiegraph on can need feel inhibited.

Temporarily, a new owner of Cherwell Studios was persuaded to develop and print my films, but a more permanent solution was not far away. In fall, circumstances was begun as one lunchtime on Woodhaven Crescent was spice with a shortcircuit in his basement. Shortly after we moved in to take vacancy we bought a darkroom "package," and with a few days of instruction from a tutor who had had only a few days of instruction himself became our professional photo lab expert.

This arrangement lasted for four or five years, through three babies that managed to survive lengthy sessions in a 6ft-degree basement, or in utero, through Irena's accountancy on photo days.

Like everything else, the home studio added a few highlights to my store of memories. I remember with particular vividness a pyrotechnical exercise night, perhaps as we 1964. Saskatchewan summers are held on Wednesdays and the Riverview at this time was the best Wednesday night for Thursday morning printing.

After the electron-tube-use warm-up perhaps an hour after the polls closed on night o'clock, I took pictures in the office of the winning candidate, drove home to deliver the films to Irena, then returned to the office to write my story, and, after a film line processed and current those, and drop those into the fixing and rinse pans, allowing a rectangular space for the photo to be engraved early in the morning.

By this time it was after midnight, house lights were out throughout the city and all was still. I parked and left the car running while I wanted to the house to pick up the photos waiting for me on the kitchen table. I had noticed the car door making a open because I hadn't closed it properly just at that time of night, and for one minute, it wasn't worth going back for.

So I noticed the house grabbed the photos and dashed back to the car and was about to get in when my heart almost stood still There sitting in the driver's seat, was a tall figure. I must have let out some sort of distressed sound because with a frightened yelp, the figure opened part of the car, smashed part and also popped into the night

The footings, who lived across the street, had a black Labrador retriever and I learned later that he just loved to sit in cars My car with its empty seat and open door had been too much to resist

The cylinder press

So far I have said little about the press.

Before I had even taken over the Review—that is to the few days I was in Weyburn before the key was actually turned over to me—I quickly was told by more than one knowing native that the Review was printed on an old press that looks closer regularly and that as a consequence the paper was often hours late.

That turned out to be entirely true, except for the part about the press being an old game of junk. I was a wonderful, well-built piece of equipment that was being forced to work under impossible conditions.

At this point, just a bit of printing history is in order — even sketched, but can have learned to understand my perhaps imagine it

For hundreds of years after Johannes Gutenberg's invention of returned type, this in itself was sufficient was itself as a wonder of human ingenuity. If you returned the alternative of copying Bibles and other documents by hand—wasn't it great to be able to handset a page of type and then print as many copies as desired. What matter that the fonts probably had to be baked with a hand-held blower a sheet of paper carefully positioned on it and a platen hand-screwed down to press the paper evenly against the faces of type?

Naturally, the week's good enough farmer and provincial exceedingly developed presses operated by manpower, by horsepower, and by the early 1800s by steam power. Proliferation of printed matter led literacy which in turn fanned demand for more printing. Either in the twilight of the steam power age or in the years that followed the invention of the internal combustion engine, the press industry must have decided that improvement had gone about as far as it could go and the trade was sold a quantity of sturdy steel printing presses, built to last a hundred years—a massive monopoly of which dozens of paper could be hand-fed in the them.

Then came when even these unadulterated miracles were succeeded by web presses and mechanically fed cylinder presses, and the new orphans then became the work horses of the weekly newspaper presses-em. There were new presses offered to the weekly industry, but far too few to set about press runs per week that would even remotely tempt a manufacturer to produce a new and small press being exploited chiefly to make way for further presses coming on the market. There small presses gave years of service, ran under unbelievable conditions, and were very modestly in terms of maintenance and repairs. Even the heavy hand of the internal combustion engine who was able to get the press running long enough to get the paper out and until replacements parts could be brought in.

Such agents was the Reverse's typesun. It was larger than most presses found in weeklies. Four two-sheet newspaper page forms locked onto the press bed locked almost hot. The entire machine was about 10-feet feet so more in length. The press bed here installed on the press room basement and cement floor and should have locked forever had it not been for Wayburn a highly skilled and. Over the decades the all-iron bed rotten away at the concrete base rounding the steel channel of the press to warp from its true weigh

Imagine a steel slab weighing a ton or more hurtling first to one direction, coming to a stop assisted by a cylinder running into an air chamber then reversing itself and hurtling in the opposite direction at here the process repeated at the other end. That whole cycle was repeated over was thousand times in an hour of operation

The press broke down often and in unexpected places This would cause delays, loss delivery of the paper, costly repairs and sometimes pay while the entire crew waited for any local mechanical wizard. Floyd Trahnor, to get the press going again

When the press was started it sounded like a locomotive roaring through the basement, and when a sheet of paper got caught in the ink rollers the first person to notice it would let out a hundred-foot long prayer in which he would be joined by others until the press was a procession of the press feeder. The reason the press would be brought to a stop with further smashing of steel and gears. All this was happening as a beat that was no longer true.

My office was located directly above the pressroom, accessed from the dungeon by a reel-very-substantial floor. My stomach flipped with every revolution of the press cylinder and my heart would lurch every time I heard the distress cries and I would perspire copiously until I learned the process rolling once more.

I here state my ambitions.

The repairs were costly, cutting up a good sheet of the meager margin that might otherwise have gone into the profit column. And so if the inherent problems of the press and its its worn not enough, the chemical system's cables became corroded by alkali. The yearly repair job was completed while the press staff was out for vacation. Suddenly there was the sound of the press being started, followed roared quietly by an enormous crash

We rushed downstairs and found the electrician standing beside the press looking sheepish—not deservedly so. He had finished his repairs and had decided to start up the machine to see if everything was in order. In he pressed the shorter button of a tandem, he knew nothing about. The press must have had a safety clutch to prevent accidental starting in this way, but either the electrician found it, or the press had been left engaged. At any rate, it happened. The press bed had on it many loose pieces of metal and wood furniture (spacing material used for locking forms into position on the bed) These pieces were thrown off the bed when the press started, some of them landing in the composition chamber in which they were processed by the returning compartments of feeder considered to be rightly into the chamber were filled with pieces of wood and metal

The result was not beautiful to behold.

Interference covered the cost of this major repair and we were operational again for the following week's page. Insurance however did nothing for my nerves, my victims or my dressing gun for this matter for the lifespan of a much-abused penny

It was become by more obvious every day that the only answer was a new press. At the time the Coin company was offering a well-tried press available for medium sized workshops. It was capable of printing and folding eight twopenny pagers a hour in a spool of several thousand impressions per hour. Those Coin-type presses had already been installed at Sandwich, Taverns and a number of other localities to the west

The spirit was willing, and it made so much sense but I was faced with two major obstacles One was the price tag of £30,000 in thousands, and the second one where to put the press Considering the condition of the limited premises, and my ambivalent relations with the landlord, I was not exactly anxious to reveal an expensive purchase to the crumbling basement with the disintegrating floor Several years also remained on the lease on my wartime lease and installation of a press would hardly have me in any bargaining position for a renewal Remember, I was building as well as a new press did not mean within the realm of possibility

Issues such as these dictated that I should not reveal the existence of the press to anyone, and be taken in on whatever was best for the Service that he Bureau had always been on this location and would always be welcome. He added that Woolworth's next door in the same building, had been eyeing our premises covetously for years, as there would be no problem in getting a new tenant. This was my reasoning, but it didn't come close to covering all relevant considerations.

The decision was made for me on the last Sunday of August in 1968

Warsaw Wee and Cobble Co at the Northern airport had organized its operations into an additional hangar and was holding an official opening and reception to celebrate and publicize this enhancement. Wehad been asked to mount a special section of the Bureau to commemorate the occasion, and it provide several thousand extra copies of the section. We my limit of four pages per run at the old Optimus press, with each section handed into a folder after printing, plus the longer press run, it was necessary to work through the weekend to get the job printed.

We were halfway through the last run of the special when the press seized and wouldn't run. Floyd Trainer again left whatever he was doing on a Sunday afternoon and tackled the recalcitrant monster. He adjusted settings press slightly made more adjustments and restarted more ways and declared that there was just no goodness to see why the mouthpiece shouldn't run

In the meantime I was saying silent prayers and promising God that if He got me through this one press run, I would never bothe. Had for another thing in my whole life. Naturally it is a promise many times broken but it was made sincerely I consider myself that the philosophy is probably more fervent by disposed toward individuals who demonstrate frequent dependency on a personal Name whose self-sufficiency finds them only once in a lifetime.

If you wonder about the urgency of completing the run it was clear on the old Roland presses, four pages were first printed on one side of the base The heets were then turned over and printed on the other side with another four pages Metal and storage space were usually limited, so the first two pages of type were disassembled and melted down before the next run was completed Had we been unable to complete the run it would have been necessary to reset the first four pages and take the sixth pages a Extreme for printing, because no shop within a reasonable distance had a press capable of such as page size

In any case between God and Floyd it was possible to count the press, to close quarts and with sighs of breathing joy to complete the press run Then I ordered the press turned off and never started again, making arrangements with the Extreme Secretary to grant the Service on then Coin-type small elements arrangements could be made repairs, a more efficient operation, and still newspaper a substantially lower price than about a week. I wrote the Gem company canvassing considerations for reasonable terms for a Cent-a-type press of our time.

Calculating how much money could be saved annually by not having constant and costly press

The building to house the press and the Review I considered would have to be built by someone prepared to make an investment for long-term rental. Again I almost despaired when prospective investors scrutinized us treating the Review as a joke, found equal humor in the thought of making good dollars on its future. None curiously demonstrated any sense of urgency in considering the proposal.

A new building

Somehow I was steered to the Porter brothers, Jim and Chuck, whom I knew only casually at the time. They not only gave me sympathetic hearing, but, being temporarily unable to make this sort of commitment, undertook to find some investors. It was through them that we brought together with Gordon Powell, a downtown retailer who agreed to look at my needs. The Gem people by the way had acceded to my plans for easy terms and my order was already "in the works before we even had a place to put the press. Gordon made quick decisions after studying a proposal cautiously and within weeks ground was broken for a cement block and brick building, built to my specifications (modified by Russell's greater experience to short matters), on Second Street between Sourse and Coleen Avenue.

This marked the beginning of a lengthy relationship that would be carried by anyone who has ever navigated leased premises of any kind. The Review was in the building for nine successive years and as all those years there was never one occasion for me to complain about anything concerning the arrangement. If Gordon Russell ever had cause to be dissatisfied with us — a possibility these matters seem to me the lessee responsibility — he was kind enough never to tell me about it. Over the years we had occasion, twice, to make additions to the building adding first a small warehouse and then a second story in 1947. On both occasions Gordon was out of town when I submitted my need both times I contacted him wherever he was and in both occasions he gave me a verbal okay leaving the legal details and rental adjustment — always fair — to be completed after his return usually after construction had begun.

Completion of our new building was targeted for mid-September of 1946, and like the beginning few months we took our page forms to Estevan for printing — our type for such press run, but in those days sixteen pages (two runs on the Cox-o-type) was our limit. We were unable to move our deadlines forward. It seemed all leaving the printed product available fairly early on Thursday no issue as our readers were accustomed like papers did not reach our offices until the train returned in mid-afternoon or later. We lost readers, temporarily and subscribers were not readily forfeited.

With the no-operation of Sterling King at the Mercury, the months of printing at Estevan passed almost without incident, except for the occasions when our pressman put his hand through a page while pushing it on the press scattering type and spacing material all over the neighborhood. Fortunately we kept page proofs but I had to throw to Estevan what a fellow online then help them sort the lines, rules and spaces to match the proof. The Mercury's type faces were different than ours so we were unable to read some parts of the page, which would have been faster and easier.

Albeit the most difficult aspect of having the paper printed at Estevan was the unnatural atmosphere of the office after closing each issue as we moved this sudden transition to something like weightlessness, from frenzy to a somber state.

Inevitably when all the progress becomes more and the press begins to run, there may be a sense of finality for most of the staff but there is also a new progression that touches with whom newspaper is all about. The first inquisitive readers have been waiting restlessly at the counter to per one of the first copies there are always a few regulars who do think. There cannot a steady trickle of advertisers and readers who come as soon as they can be reasonably sure this paper is available. Hosiery workers are inquiring and the piping peppers for mailing machines and for the carrier boys others are taking bags of papers in the post office for distribution into mailing carrier boy vessels into the office. Still through a the shop to fill their bags, and money is being consolidated from the youngsters who are response for subscriptions from their customers. All patience hours with the customers. The phone starts ringing with the earliest customers in the paper hitting the streets an occasional complaint complement or query. When you go downtown you are pointed to customers — friendly acquaintances complete strangers — reading your paper the words you have written — edited, and printed. It is the consummate of a life the work — work has been all about not just a word printed, neither has a collection of information gathered it and being absorbed by the community.

It is a feeling that always is both new and traditional but it disappointed for months while we printed in Exeter. The public quickly learned that there would be no paper until some industrious to time after the truck had returned and the sections collated. So after the truck left, loaded with page forms, there was truly silence. No customers, no carrier boys no ringing telephones, no complaints, just a heavy silence that felt like a vacuum. Then the sound of cars came. We had worked hard at producing something and had nothing to show for it.

Even a but the truck showed up with the finished product, it was not enough time had enough papers unbounded for a few hours. There was just no excitement about the paper being out and available at this late hour it seemed simply irrelevant

But it was the needs of our early years in Wenham, the final purgatory before our platform and long into the comparative pandemic of a new building, built in our needs, into with a limited new press.

Running on an Island

page seven September 3 1969

This week's issue of the Wenham Review and Transcript under circumstances even more confusing than those which found it out.

The reason is that the big event to our new premises began last week, and with the running on Saturday it still under complete test, the office continued to the old number while the equipment and downpipe department remain in operation in the new quarters only this week.

The processes was totally "finished out" for a few days, with process issues involving to unusually in electrical hook-up.

A one or two-week delay might been been better for all but this was could all not impossible by their advance arrangements which had to be made in connection with the move.

As it was the Cost-Copy printing press on which the Review will be printed in the future operated a week before the scheduled delivery date and the 3 tons of machinery men had to be moved over the floor of the building last set. On Tuesday of last week, in had been arranged earlier. All Cunningham of the town Co. Chicago, arrived to begin erection work on the equipment work-fed newspaper press.

Another factor which complicated, in not one unfeasible sense, and last date of the load-down in the old building. Summer test opening was not large enough to accommodate the large pieces of equipment required in preparations of a newspaper a number of machine have to be pumped in date, and one scheduled to the new plant

This, too, required experienced machinists. These were provided by Tuscarora Type Foundry of Worcester with Victor Mercier and Frank Jones acting in test pressure and assistance in charge of the typesetting machines. Mr. Clarke was one of the machinists that installed the Intertype advances in the Review office two years ago.

To move the printing presses, composing and bundle equipment out of the basement of the premises which have been occupied by the Review for long as most people can remember it has been necessary to remove the machines so that test machines may be routed through the subway opening.

By last weekend, none of the heavy equipment had been removed from the basement by the moment, Heavy Equipment Movers Moving of the remaining equipment was effected until have this week, so as not to interfere with the production of the paper already hampered by temporary electrical break-over and lighting. No word problems worthwhile with starting had installation finishing off the building — and to give things a chance makes us the sole building feature the balance is brought in. The office staff and fixtures also remained in the Mirabel Block as in an air cushion with the rising swell in the new office.

It is hoped that by next weekend the entire issue will have been completed, and real production will settle down to normal shortly thereafter. Readers of course has been carried on in usual daring this time

The move into the new building seemed to write "finis" to the one in which we poignantly attempted to write back memories to Why leave, and to remove the newspaper's imagine the old corner of the community burned out as a modern plant. While the years showed were not free of problems it could not be but more expected in any business where a steady management has had seen bought most of the equipment than considered improvements for a weekly plant the size of ours

The Cox-o-type press seemed like a miracle grinding four, six or eight pages at a time at a speed of over five thousand impressions per hour simultaneously slitting and quarter-folding, then eliminating what had once been an extra step. The pictured images, especially photos, was of a better quality than that of the old sheet-fed presses but it wasn't a saving in time and money except only in week at some specifics

To further increase type productivity we bought a brand new Linotype capable of turning out eight lines per minute instead of the traditional six. Last year we had this typesetter hooked up to teletypesetter equipment with the linotype punching tape from tape-fed automatic. The tape was punched on the front office on a separate keyboard with a standard typewriter-set figuration, and operated by a typist

The typist and setting was that while a manual line-operator's top speed averaged about five lines per minute — speaking now of a first-class operator — and about three lines in slightly more for the average operator and still less for a learner, the tape-controlled machine could turn out full speed except for short stops to change tapes and remove "chunks of type. It was not without disadvantages but these were well compensated by faster and less costly production

Beside the press breakdown which forced us to compensate of both press and building, most of the modernization came about deliberately and systematically based on cost-effectiveness and ideal suitability of shown payment

One of the changes that some at least as precipitously as the press was new furniture for my office. I and the idea that executive changes could not be a subs in but still not production production was top-line. So it made do some as the new building, with a richer old desk with drawers that jammed made wastage several chair. The chair and screwed it supported by wooden spindle rising from the seat. The chair a height was adjusted by spinning the chair and then tightening the vertical screw at the right height. The screw had become worn so that the seat — the chair would gradually sink or lose the I would barely work in my desk. Then I would have to stop whatever I'm in doing and bring the chair back to working level again. The problem was also loose in occasionally would slip out of their holes, also requiring some tedious restoration.

When Phyllis Kenney took over as sales manager for bookkeeping duties were taken over by a young man by the name of Don Forbes. Don had a keen sense of humor, a very old-fashioned approach to business relationships. While almost everyone on the shop called me Ernie, I was always Mr. Neufeld to Don, and he always addressed me as respectfully as though I were Lord Thomson

One morning he came into my office and asked me a question that required many thought. As I addressed myself to the problem I leaned back and placed my arms on the armrests

This is difficult even for me to believe, but at this point the arm-rest failed completely the chair rests in unknown level with a bump and a thud, and every individual spindle and all the crossbars in the chair is back, fall apart and tumbled into a heap on the floor. It was like a scene from a cheap western as I seemed right there. Total destruction

Even Ron's sense of dignity and decorum could not contain him. He not only laughed he howled, doubled over and holding his belly with both arms. I laughed too, but not quite as heartily.

That day I bought Ron a new chair and a new desk.

The Estevan Mercury

Another major change came in 1965 when we were offered the Estevan Mercury on a silver platter.

In the middle 1950s or thereabouts the Liverpool (Eaglesoft) Echo organization expanded into Canada buying a weekly in Midland, Ontario, the Estevan Mercury the daily Red Deer Advocate in Alberta, and three weeklies in South Columbia's Fraser River Valley.

We had no more taken over the Review — my family hadn't even learned one of Wyburn — when I received a letter from the Echo's top executive, suggesting that I might be open to an offer. I replied that we hadn't bought the Review just to resell it but advertised that everything probably had its price. Not long after that the Echo executive on his annual visit to the Canadian holdings dropped in to see us and, between coffee and cigarettes in an office I'd requested seclusion from, talked about my financial ability to handle the necessary refurbishing of the Review.

Once again, I declined to negotiate, thereby adding to the worries of our first year in Weyburn we certainly feared the Liverpool group might be as reckless as some of the newspaper chains then dwelling on their neighbors in the country. As it turned out the English are not ruthless but always balanced like good neighbors and I don't know how I would have survived without their compassionate during the press crisis.

It developed, however, that not everything was peaches and cream in the Echo's overseas operation either. While the Red Deer and Fraser Valley operations were thriving, the same could not be said for Midland, and even less for the Mercury which reportedly was losing money hand-over-fist.

Long-distance supervision was obviously one of the problems at the Mercury's end, and another was a United Kingdom policy that did not look favorably upon money-losing foreign investments. There were also a few local problems, but they would have been surmountable with the framework of the other two.

The upshot of all this was that one day I received a visit from Cecil Hacker of Abbotsford British Columbia manager of the Echo's Canadian operations. He purported to be neighborly and fraternal, but coming a less casual underlying purpose, I met some and stand-offish.

Having heard of difficulties at the Mercury and being clear enough to see and sense a few more, I shrewdly asked how things were going in Estevan. I was surprised when Hacker replied quite candidly that things weren't going well at all. Still more brazenly I suggested that maybe Liverpool ought to be offering the Mercury to me. I almost fell from my chair when he replied, with a pained expression, that such might not be the worst solution and requested a figure well above anything I could have managed, or than would have been reasonable in view of the Mercury's inherent status: a steadily discouraging circulation and reduced advertising sales in the face of still stronger competition. I considered with an office about half of his — also uncomfortable — and was not surprised when he bowed offended. He left but left the door open by suggesting we might meet in Calgary some weekend if I could bring myself to think in terms of a more reasonable price.

Until that moment I hadn't really believed he was serious, and the uncertainty of it all left me almost speechless. I had long held that the Mercury and the Review were quite enough to each other in operation out of one shop setting out a list of duplication in corporate equipment. In fact some seemed likely that the Liverpool group would consider a production partnership, and we,

of course, were not inclined to sell out. Now suddenly a joint operation was possible under circumstances I could not have imagined until that moment.

A short exchange of letters ensued, and a few weeks later Cecil Hooker, Jesse and I met in Calgary and at the moment Harvey Lee Oswald was shooting John Fitzgerald Kennedy in Dallas, we were clinking hands on the transfer of the Mercury at a price about halfway between the two extreme figures mentioned in my Weyburn meeting.

The opportunity to acquire the Mercury came at a time when we were hardly in a financial position to assume new obligations. However my conviction that the Mercury and the Review were legitimately a single operation from a production point of view prompted me to seek backing. Again I tried the Parts brothers who had helped me find the Review for the Review's new building. I ran across Jim and Cecil, men of wide business experience, realized that ruthless would fall somewhat short of the enthusiastic picture I painted for them; but passionately desired to share in it anyway. They agreed to participate on any one of several arrangements — at my option — and that became the financial basis for the Review as investment that continued for about twenty years. I have nothing but good memories of the association. It can rather one of their characteristic fields on business terms.

Papers were signed in mid-December and a few days before or after Christmas I presented myself to the manager of the External Mercury bearing a letter announcing the change in ownership.

Another moment to treasure, however unworthy.

Mercury managers had never mistreated me, but these continued years usually extended with the patronizing air that well-paid executives of large companies find difficult to shake by the presence of humbler colleagues who must constantly make ends meet without fixed office authorization when such can be justified.

When I entered his office, the manager was sitting back in his swivel leg chair with one foot on the desk, and was shooting into the ceiling bent to a close friend about some shared activity. He turned and saw it was I who had walked, without buying the ticket later on the table in front of him. He hastily acknowledged the letter with one hand while continuing his unsympathetic telephone conversation.

His mind seemed to have difficulty absorbing what he was reading on the first pass, particularly with the distraction of the telephone call the second that around his eyeglasses and he suddenly swung my the reader of which letter "Call me later."

For a few seconds he looked as though he was still unable to make room of it all, until suddenly he gasped "My God, you're my boss

This began a new phase of our newspaper career one with rented as many successes or sorrows the business initially to Weyburn. I had long cherished the merger as a solution to many personal problems but it also added new ones. I discovered it was not easy to devote an equitable personality and quite another to accomplish change from a distance. This holds true particularly when the staff has become accustomed to absentee ownership by a large corporation. Since not a single unfriendly Weyburnite had responded to a possible, little was done to avoid discontinuity costs that could be justified or had been budgeted.

In short it was like a honeymoon.

Shortly after the acquisition we brought the mechanical production of the Mercury to Weyburn, while all our job printing equipment and however we moved to the Mercury plant. To accomplish the first, we leased a direct telephone line between the two offices. News and advertising copy were provided on teletype tape at the Mercury and transmitted to the Review where it was run off on my 20-no-cored typesetting machine.

Earlier I explained how heavy or tight lines of matrices may cause "spaces" on typesetting machines, cause damage to machines and matrices, or all of these. A layperson quickly learns to avoid this error because it spoils one by patiently painted, and a always a time-consuming nuisance.

A check punching tape on an office outside the ownership room is a bit harder to catch because the is faced with neither the danger nor the accumulation. Even when the indicator tells him the line is full or low, all he has to do is hit the "reverse" key and the problem becomes that of the person operating the typesetting machine. The Mercury can, if he is conscientious, and is brought face to face with the chaos he has caused, and treated to some choice language by the foreman the next morning. At a distance of fifty miles, however, the telephone lines have to become pretty red and blue to fully convey the production department's displeasure. It was battle as we easily won, but fortunately offset printing was not too far off; less than ten years, although we didn't know it.

Eatevan folks had reasoned absolute ownership by the Liverpool group and had cherished the hope that they would be treated to on the paper taken over by a Saskatchewan combine. Not a matter. We have and Eatevan are and then were about the same size, offset composing facilities and features and government offices, and I discovered We have just what's a good word anywhere in Eatevan. We never really got acquainted until we attended and were guests of the Eatevan Grand Concert George Denham, the youngest of Irene s three brothers, as an shareholder and manager of a separate company operating the Mercury. Several years after the advent of offset and taking several other factors and developments into consideration the decision was made for the Mercury in George and following his death a few years later — after bringing the experiment back to profitability — the Mercury was again taken over by three papers.

Then, chatting with one of several managers who preceded George, I tried to explore one of the effects of a backship background on my approach to management when I had first come to Weyburn. I told him that because I had been accustomed to the evening weekly work, with each job having an identifiable beginning and end I was out of my element faced with composing manuals on my 1 per and communications, and with handling fortnightlies. Gone she backship situation at the Review in my first few years. I had often found it necessary to spend evening hours in the linos setting type. Because I was a skilled operator and because I knew I was producing something tangible, my mind relaxed and I was able to set out some of my business problems I explained

When this manager left the Mercury's employ he filled his successor in on some of the particulars of the problem and especially the circumstances of working with me. "Why," he said "that man's idea of relaxation is running a line."

The pre-offset Mercury period while not quite the nightmare of the early Review years were two-year periods of unpredictable and unrewarding frustration two solid days of work in our composing room every week to get out twelve pages of the Mercury then putting together sixteen to twenty pages of Review in one day; coming trips to Eatevan to put out both firms, try to motivate staff and motivate prospective employees. Meanwhile, one day a week had been taken out of my own schedule in Weyburn adding to the extra hours I had to spend catching up.

Too late I discovered that the staff was able to meet deadlines established by Weyburn's job printing by pulling off Eatevan work. Naturally the absentee Weyburn management got the blame for the delays, and commercial running from Eatevan customers dwindled to a trickle. Inevitably Weyburn service also suffered since two days were almost unreliably lost in sending the order to Eatevan and receiving shipment of the finished product. The experiment failed partly because of some of the factors mentioned partly because of the difficulty of staffing in the Saskatchewan labor market of the 1960s, and I must confess that I miserably failed to measure up to the expectations of absentee management.

At about this time of the Mercury acquisition I was also becoming increasingly involved in community and newspaper association activities I was president of the Weyburn Chamber of Commerce during the year of the Mercury purchase, also the year of Weyburn's 50th jubilee celebrations. I served on the city-appointed Jubilee Committee, charged with co-ordinating activities in the city jubilee, the 1965 provincial 60th anniversary and the 1967 Canadian Centennial celebrations. I was also on the board of directors of the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association in the time.

All the extra activity caused me to be for the good, because it forced me to learn to delegate

Switch to offset printing

Only a few years since the Mercury purchase came about what can only be termed a complete metamorphosis in the production of weekly newspapers: offset printing.

Until the 1960s — one sharply given that newspapers must be judged by the letterpress process — processes that had heavily hanged in decades at the level of technology available in a small plant.

Letterpress printing is the process through which printed matter is produced by imprinting paper from raised metal type or plates in the printing area defined by raised surfaces. The only major changes for weeklies had been the mid-fifties process such as the Cox-o-type we had recently installed — introduced, for a variety of reasons, two decades too late — and tape-driven typesetting machines. Both had evolved naturally as improvements in the letterpress process but neither was startlingly innovative. For that another machine was available in some community newspapers because they were too small to manage the capital outlay.

To describe the offset process I won't try to improve on one Arnold Larsen for the Jubilee '80 special edition. I co-piped and edited for the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association in 1980. In Review

A northern trail-blazer

Where relief finally came from an unchained nightmare that devours all in its path, weekly newspaper ministry about two decades ago. ... since neither mortgage technological breakthroughs, nor are the blinding flash of revelation experienced by God to the modern Damascus.

For several decades, all weekly newspapermen throughout Saskatchewan — the connected by that matter — took weekly 100 and less an publishing night, each on one day or another pressed in himself [illegible] down an entire way?" By next morning, however the discipline of an accepted issue of things, connected itself, and life was as normal.

Issue and finish however successful, printers in different parts of the country found themselves denied, as the advantages of a relatively established process known as offset lithography in Saskatchewan it was Ad Master some 15-year veterans of the newspaper and typesetting of the Hudson Bay Post Review.

Lithography came to see how it as a newspaper emotionally established in the mid 1800s whereby a grease-resist image on the translucent with high

Shortly then years as other materials fairly thin-grumping printers were at least as cumbersome as printing presses and whether they required water and chemicals as well as ink probably were less pronounced. Their chief advantage lay in the faithful reproduction of art work engravings and special screen tones.

Later when it was discovered that thin and translucent sound were as well as some, and thin images taken in photographed by improved arts these papers, printing speed became another plus for thin plates could be affixed to rapidly running cylinders. Because positive images were used, printed area is called blanket and offset since the image from the blanket, that process became known as offset lithography today simply offset printing.

Still, another advantage held any great attention to the country newspaper. Pressing speed was no agency Later in the publisher's catalogues of publication, not was high fidelity. The major producers lay in getting the written word well printed thins along a pair well-printed well-inserted.

Photography was still an time description in the small country office, and if the thought of offset printing were even covered a publisher's mind it was quickly rejected as an invitation to adding new skills men were and new expenditures in an already-lean purse.

If this sounds backward, it should be borne in mind that, aside from linotype, the only practical step in mechanical language has been suitable for photographing was to replace it, carefully pulls proof and then allow the ink to dry in thumbs plate ought be thinks without running. Material operations with conventional thumbs did not provide type of materials quality

Then, in the years following World War 2, came shortly developments which solved the minds of a few publishers and offset.

A simple, covered camera, comparing, thins space and easy to operate, and the simple use of the photographic process involved in offset

2 Pre-sensitized offset printing plates, and a simple plate-burner would publish high-quality agricultural, still-lost quick and easily operated operation.

3 Similar operations with one-time cameras (albeit) offset) and, thirdly, continuous camera-ready type

4 A burgeoning lithography industry was still quite specialized, and process had on plans to go from thins to the "backyard. A few years continued and thins employers began thinking seriously in the commitment of variety newspaper offices where machine might find a few cases and years

Successful engraving methods had introduced photo journalism into the effort of the country, but too often the publisher found the thin any effort it took to take a picture develop and print, and then engrave it in any quality, most almost for simple when the final product was a barely recognizable. Pictures still seemed an accident.

Those few country might in how suffered sufficient enthusiasm for it mass attack to offset right there. Change doesn't come easily however. Heavy investments in conventional printing machinery would not lightly be written off and the very positions of the trade and vocational in "human mechanisms" opposed technological change.

The tyranny of the process had intensified very publishers and were not undiscovered. Thin publication were, with a few exceptions, persons where the trade was a primary discipline, and journalism a secondary interest.

So for all the wishful thinking about a better way when A Mayor established an offset-printed newspaper in the mid-50s at Hudson they a rural town what a succession of homegrown publications had failed the news was simply with precision than common locality suspicion, ruthless, contempt horror and fear

For those living reported in a locale who was blessing a new path country the jungle he was initially seen as a threat to the status quo it those an genuine publishing all and had been wrestled and controlled by themselves and Metropolitan But Mayor expressed as the day-to-day coverage of personnel and for from the leaden hand stuck to the game, improved on his publication and continued it was the colleagues in conventions in workshops, enthusiastically preached the new gospel of offset

Despite their hostility toward the union process, its few publishers agreed Mayor has beautifully printed pieces and it was not snappy-looking paper. Within a few years Tom Kearns at Visiting, the late Bliss Willoughby in Hillsman, and Alex Story at mushrooms had become printing converts.

The refusal to offset and slowly begin

About the time I realized that most of the machinery involved in the Review's production process was due for early replacement, I attended a Southeastern Weekly Newspapers Association workshop, where the main speaker was one John Wilson who spoke convincingly about offset printing in the 20th century circumstances for weekly newspapers.

A big, top-room-looking building of what would probably still count in Arvida, Ellison was quickly dubbed 'Mission John'. He certainly sold me, and I asked him to come to Weyburn and suggest an offset scheme. In later months he scheduled our circulation figures and ran several number of pages and quickly counted his against-printing cost.

Our two alternatives were a switching of offset. He pointed out, would be to install one of the presses and other four tab-bed pages at a time, and those laid or sullen off the contempt in an interest a Gene Babcock's press, a second offset press post on the market, in $75,000 plus. The former, in his opinion, would break us by crossing an impossible workload and deadline problem, and the latter would break us through the installment.

Gene again he sold me and I went into terms of retaining our letterpress operation and thus turned right around and switched to offset.

Little interest in offset

Saturday August 1977

the several newspaper I have mentioned in has reduces the rate at which technology is moving in the newspaper industry.

Coming our correspondence that the other day an issue a letter I received as 1959 which bears this exact offset-ad sent to the church as well.

When I came to Weyburn in 1958, most of the equipment at the Review office needed replacement, and I was desperately attempting during the first year to switch priorities with available funds.

In that small (only 900) I attended a workshop of our publishers' newspaper association where several speakers were hobbling their enthusiastically on offset printing as the coming thing for weekly newspapers.

They said it was to cost and would soon replace with the concept. Soon we were faced with a complete replacement program anyway why not go modern right off?

I discussed the issues with my chief supplier for information, and here with minor deletions. In the reply I received:

"You will no doubt recall on our last visit to you that we discussed the contamination you were getting either in the public notice of your paper.

What made the article feasible in the mid-1960s, at least to us as a package offer by the Gene company, the newly introduced Community press — a more modestly priced sister to the Suburban — and a do-it-own and plate-making assembly that would give a publisher all that was necessary to print an offset newspaper. A generous trade-in was offered for Cline-type presses such as ours.

Considering my enthusiasm when I read Ellison under the spell of Mission John, I sought to have him immediately interested. It is pretty hard however, for one-man newspaper, who has completely outlived an operation that what he has done in great part, in almost obsolete. Our forerunn at the time, an outspoken private by the name of Bill Asher kept telling me that in the United States and in British Columbia, a standard switch to offset had begun, bringing the benefits of lower production costs and high-fidelity reproduction of photos.

"He wrote D. ——— I ——— to see if he could get some information for us and we also discussed with the last time when he was in to see if we could give us the names of anybody you could get in touch with.

"Frankly, both of the systems of these same more that only two that may know is more pasting and flashy papers in other words use, of course, in intervention which would be of no interest to you and they both in our find that offset printing has any place for the publication in a newspaper such as printed by the Weyburn Review

"Those, of course, are only personal opinions and the names are are passing from along to you in that both these men have quite an inside picture over quite a large territory and for this reason we think you might be interested in their opinions.

"It would appear that there must be a great deal of interest shown by the weekly probably as yet in this instead its producing fine papers and economically we were not able to give a lot information.

Armed with that short advice we continued along traditional lines only to instead six years later than our first theory believed ought to be five times.

In 1965 the Review instead the first weekly in Saskatchewan with its own in-plant web offset facility. Since then all but perhaps one or two other weeklies in that province have switched to offset printing with most of the conversions done in annual stages.

What made the switch feasible in the mid-1960s, at least to us as a package offer by the Gene company, the newly introduced Community press — a more modestly priced sister to the Suburban — and a do-it-own and plate-making assembly that would give a publisher all that was necessary to print an offset newspaper. A generous trade-in was offered for Cline-type presses such as ours.

Considering my enthusiasm when I read Ellison under the spell of Mission John, I sought to have him immediately interested. It is pretty hard however, for one-man newspaper, who has completely outlived an operation that what he has done in great part, an almost obsolete. Our forerunn at the time, an outspoken private by the name of Bill Asher kept telling me that in the United States and in British Columbia, a standard switch to offset had begun, bringing the benefits of lower production costs and high-fidelity reproduction of photos.

Perhaps in five years we may reply. Then one day I was discussing the trend around Fleet with another publisher who, with a modern late-comer's point, held views similar to mine. I decided to play the devil's advocate, and played it so well that I convinced both of us.

Within the week we'd had contracted Goss, learned of the package offer described earlier and made my decision. Adair was on vacation at the moment on the Monday he returned. I called him late-ish, after had presently told him of my decision. He stared at me in amazement slowly shook his head and fervently declared "You know Jimbo, when we were running home last night one of us must have had the urge to send "Welcome to Wapham, I said to Joan, I wonder what that latest bastard has thought up now."

Well, as I said was outspoken. And I hadn't really disappointed him, I had only gone a step beyond anything he had expected from me.

However taken shock he may have been, from that point on he was all co-operation and true enthusiasm as we proceeded to plan and supplement changes that would lead to turn this new utilitarian. Fortunately we had installed a small offset job printing press a year or two earlier although this had done little more than cope with the printing of a new title. Running a single colour doesn't really augment to much on the page and its likewise.

All we needed to was clear an area adjacent to the front office for a 12x12 darkroom under two light bulbs and prepare another area for the wielder of the camera. Now for the press. We sent a young apprentice to another newspaper the half recently converted for a week course in the darkroom work on which the offset process depended.

It probably would have made sense to make sure the new press was fully installed and reasonably understood by our prominent before we jumped into conversion for the flexible press mats; but no, as soon as the Goss company's tractor set up, lined up and printed in the press had got the thirteen pre-ordained nothing would do but switch right then.

We were set back our annual Fire Prevention issue one or two weeks up the we ough point it in two colors. I was printed on Sunday afternoon under the reluctant supervision of the press minder Al Cunningham, whose dusky fingers as relish as he watched me reloading the impressions for the ten a number of times before they were — barely — usable. Naturally I had made it all much too complicated, kept modifying the red and black images had ended up with many black had red areas received. One illustration ended up with black-edged red numbers.

"But you don't see that often, — using colour on the first issue!" one of our staffers exclaimed proudly to Cunningham.

"Ever" somebody has to do it, replied cool Mannequin Cunningham through clenched teeth.

Our real beginners on five, however, still lay ahead. Cunningham stayed around a few more days to illuminate and train the "old Cantelope press, and was available for support when we produced our first fully offset editions of both papers, but on were on our own to learning to do the pre-press work with inadequate equipment.

Instead of simply locking up frame into pages as we had been accustomed to doing all our lives, we now had to pull proofs on an unfamiliar proof press, and wait for the proofs to dry before we pasted them up. We tried to speed up the process by holding the proofs near light bulbs, but it was still very much like watching paint come in a leak, so too often we handled a proof prematurely smeared it and had to pull a new proof.

Our men were a lively ringing from the impressions had complaints of the Masonry manager. He was always sure he was getting the dirty end of the stick, had of course, be unable, I personally believe that it was worse for us having us we did, to handle the same problems as he plus the darkroom phenomena and offset press. Tension ran high and tempers flared, and there was almost a rebellion when the lad who had received the crash course in the darkroom of wonder offset newspaper complained that he hadn't even a hockey game for over a week, had might take a few hours off that night to see one. He was probably looking, or trying to learn his complained enhancedspeed, because we were able to prevail upon him to forgo both for one issue might strike us we got that our first effort must. But he sure had us worried!

There were moments during the first month and eventually the first week, when I questioned my sanity on making the conversion. In that I was not alone. However most of the worst letters there were glossy scraps of processes, which I could sense without really getting my finger on it, that we were benefiting by every sq. inch we had added on.

Another factor that gave us no end of worry was metalworkproblems that were really worse no guidelines and each plate was its own laboratory and testing and learning ground. Where the letterpress weekly had learned from and imitated daily newspaper production methods to the extent permitted by newsprint and mechanical means, this was the possible with offset because there was no models to follow

Again an article I wrote for Jubilee '56 tells the story more fully than memory permits after still another decade

The big switch

A fat decade passed in Saskatchewan between the inventive, groping switch to offset tooling, by Al Simser at the Hudson Bay Post-Review and anything distinguishing himself unduly in the conversion to the new process.

While publishers today total at sea. "What took up so long?" more did not exist, in the mid-1950s, the switchover was for a viable, ultra-produced newspaper industry. The process existing in this time started with the plates-ready page and ended with a press — a mid-one hour of growth progress.

Cold composition, which includes any typesetting medium not employing type cast from molten metal was predominant. Photo-composition was in its very infancy then with no market the three existing but complicated machines, they were price tags that placed them well out of the reach of the country printer. There was nearly nothing yet on offset typewriter which then reduced to size that controlled in that to mimeograph standard news faces. All the items were the same width, which was enough to offend the eye of the purist and horror of horrors, there was no way of aligning the columns on the right. Traditional publishers could not conceive of their readers accepting a printed product such ragged edges.

Furthermore, before the fantastic effort at least some variety as to class and style in keyboard-setting, gave the offset pioneer offered nothing between typewriter like that hand-assembled large class.

Even the first hand-operated photo-typesetting display machines, while offering variety and more speed than hand-assembly methods, nothing to match as the little spy typesetters children get at Christmas for one popular model, the spin images were unsatisfactory since the name edges in a large scientific photo-film which that to be strong into position for each insertion, exposed by activating a switch controlled by one hand, that moved in the next letter This process created a long, narrow strip of photo-ready copy which then had to be cut and positioned carefully on the page — assuming it did not have to be redone because the insertion proved faulty in the developing step.

Even still big type in pages was a major problem. If the stationary drive was fast, the single small letters it was progressively publishing that any faster alternative or even long satisfied machine pace work. The answer to that problem finally came in the form of machine inserters, which allows advancing to be positioned as they are stores enough for working purposes, not still easily-manufactured processible.

The next was another typefaces, identical to that while typefaces, lowly were used and commercial printers advertising typefaces, about that of almost 17 by 22 inches — the equivalent of two national newspaper pages. Thus the offset operation was limited to a two-page publish press that had one page section which, after printing, had to be folded and gathered.

Even the small newspaper was accustomed at a four-page press, assuming a single eight-page was fine.

The size of the problem was that the normal traditional publishing equipment was not adaptable. Eventually, the giants of the industry are the inventions and producers that the changes may clearly down at the smaller plants. In newspaper publishing the reverse tendency is the conversion to offset.

Printing and publishing had boomed in post-war North America that millions that been spent on expanding printing plants along conventional lines. Labor agreements defined jurisdictions along lines that that meant that a machine operator, Compositors are more persons powerful force that the technology of publishing, sacrifice of great investments, that almost-create industrial strife.

So fashionable had it come from the human. The small editor-nobody ridiculed at first from informed but always-secret-in library demographic reproduction and the simplicity to inevitably flailed as consequence it might have perished, and if existed, is a complete account and the existence of effect industry may also following, and improvements products were introduced

The medium-sized and larger weekly newspaper monopolist was flourishing. That it had found a new footprint as the role of spokesman for the equipment-oriented community is now known, and for the increasing local rise of news and wonders this small-town trends.

Photos were no longer and became more mechanized, but publishers found themselves in a constant struggle to prevent technological change in the established machines, they poured the task for the big city and did not replaced by new equipment. The supplied the printers suffered from mistakes on by hard-edited the real lack in expert maintenance-causing costly breakdowns.

In addition photo-purveyors and plush showroom organized and rents to the weekly newspaper However the aggressive seldom published good coverage in the hands of non-professionals, and the number-and-dot process, designed for speed and at least twenty years before the thread, was at was and all of the original photo and. Included it on the newspaper page on a largely except public consumption.

In the early 1960 a major press manufacturer introduced an offset press designed for the large-weekly in was web-fed and capable in producing the right, but it on a sixteen-page section at a speed of about 10,000 per hour and folded it the same process

Moreover a subsidiary of a sewing machine company bought out of the typesetting era. Tape could be punched on a typewriter-like machine which computed the necessary space between words to fill out the line, and seamlessly fed into a "clever" unit which produced columns in camera-ready type with nearly aligned right-hand edges as close to printers' inserts.

Word came of conversion to offset by larger weeklies and small dailies in British Columbia, the western states, and some other isolated pocket in the continent

In 1965 the Weekly Review, from one of the most mature letterpress plants in the province made the switch. There were a few gaps, but nothing in the order of the heavy line and accompanied the Hudson Bay Company in years earlier

The big switch was on and within a and years all but a few holdouts and "quiet offices," part of the vanguard of a continent-wide revolution

The new market and the development in university courses computerized photo-typesetting machines, and while the development dailies were ready to the venerable linotypers and had barely changed were the face of the century were small weeklies were installing these technological wonders and mounting fears at better faster and more flexible generations of typesetters were in vogued

Today even small weekly chains own typesetters as development and they might have been equipped with blind magic into a few years ago.

Most important than the and that the duologny has been taken out in printing offices and given weekly newspaper readers a vastly superior product, but enabled papers to survive that might by now have passed from the scene, and and even increased the number of weeklies being published.

It was important, in and development a break in publishers who are slow in spend more time and effort on content, and are totally adjusted to the variability in minute changes and improvement and committed as meeting the challenges in the years and decades ahead.

Cold composition

Very quickly machine manufacturers learned lessons of a vast new industry with needs and demands of millions perspectives, and not many years passed before offset weeklies were assembled photographed and placed from sophisticated equipment designed in many instances with the medium-small-sized weekly plane in mind.

In fall of 1965 the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association invited an American newspaper expert to critique Saskatchewan weeklies on the whole workshop. The trouble him to study the subjects he was sent. By the SWNA office a stupid sent Saskatchewan weekly pictured that week "The week happened in he one very best offset issues, a textbook specimen of inexperience with an silica process and a few choice samples of Murphy's law thrown in.

Came the workshop in February or March, and the visiting expert threw enlarged facsimiles of our newspapers onto a screen.

When he came to the Review's "example, he agreed on at first a few meaningful comments and mentioned something about no comment being necessary. Since at least half of the weekly reviews were still not persuaded that offset was the way of the future we carry first issue — of course they didn't know it was our first — condemned their opinion and they greeted both the blow-up and the accompanying comment with a gale of laughter.

What could I say? I like ink in reverse proportion to the enlarged image of one diagram.

One manufacturer in persuaded Irish colleagues of the workless mode and made a march that may be unparalleled in industrial history. The established manufacturers were buying themselves, as they said for seven years with the prosperous needs of the giants of the industry in an approaching age of photo-typography. As a result there were available photo-typesetters in the 1960s at prices of $25,000 upwards.

A new company Compographic, took the chance and the market by producing a computer-and photo-typesetting machine capable of setting "straight" matter from "dial tape" at about 14 to 20 lines per minute. ("Dial tape" is keypunched tape without operator-designated line endings, and straight matter is type of raw typeface as it was produced in a column of one width.) The Compographic grew rapidly in sophistication, quality and versatility and became a household word within the industry virtually overnight. In 1975 I was told on good authority that the only weekly in British Columbia without at least one Compographic installation was the one habitant letterpress operation.

Beside impressing the production and ambition of the weekly press offset also ushered in the unrationed printing plant.

In letterpress days, the sheer weight of the printing forms at last dictated that each community had to have its own printing press. In fact, this condition was almost a comfort to those publishers whose ownership of a paper might reasonably be termed as a printing shop precipitated almost in the sense of the old master printer working independently rather than as an employee.

There were outstanding exceptions, of course: publishers who ran small newspapers that were distinctive and highly regarded for their journalistic content. Many such publishers, however, seem to have regarded themselves as tradesmen assembling and producing ads and news matter that came in through the mail to or via the counter.

With the first wave of offset conversions, publishers were flabbergasted to see of three operators handling their own web offset operations (still only feasible in large plants) installations, shared presses and maintaining the independence which, so many was almost synonymous with personal integrity to staying with letterpress and taking advantage of all the late-model letterpress equipment (including Cox-o-type presses) flooding the market to incredibly low prices.

It weren't too long before those who chose the third mode found that their products suffered in comparison with the rapidly improving quality of the products of their converted brethren. They pushed the letterpress equipment they had bought as judiciously and at such bargain prices, and joined the majority.

Since second-hand sheet-fed presses on which the "independents" relied were almost invariably in the 17"x20" range their number of press runs (not deadlines) were immediately doubled, without even allowing for increased demand for pages which often was generated by a better-looking product. Each section also had to be folded and collated (serving (as sending) twice as many pages (reduced to as many), requiring as many as twice as much aluminum plates to a normal plant) were far very from carrying heavy page-sized lead forms. The carrying capital cost of presses and perhaps also bindery equipment provided an additional incentive and within ten years of the earliest conversions — not counting the original pioneers who fought it out on sheet-to-sheet — all but one or two workless lead press offset and most were pointed as neutral plants as web offset presses.

Our early association to affiliate together with several other sets of circumstances led to the Review winning its award I have printed above most journalistic achievements in my career.

Having received my weekly newspaper training with the Deerborne in Steinbeck who were posted, among other things for three excellent special editions. I naturally came to Weyburn determined to excel in this area as well. It wasn't long before I discovered that not too far beyond the horizon these important annniversaries were approaching and with those three opportunities and three challenges in mind

Weyburn's 60th birthday as a city would be celebrated in 1963 the provincial 60th in 1965, and the Canadian Centennial in 1967. So I was faced with these to particular opportunities at two-year intervals Each received school demanded a special edition but rounding in close together there was a built-in danger of duplication.

To give each a flavor different from the other ones, I decided to base the first one solely on Weyburn's history the second on the Weyburn district's past as it related to the provincial scene, and the third one a reflection of the Weyburn area with the context of Canadian history and development. I didn't work on quite like that but at least there was an overall plan, however loosely this pod

The Weyburn special was produced commercially While the secret of Ellenborough engineering didn't disappear in that school, Kenmore students had never impacted such an explosion of local pictures. Mary Grose collected pictures Phyllis Kutsky and I sold the advertising space, and Mary and I wrote copiously. I am certain both readers and advertisers were happy with the result.

It also took some of the wind out of my sails, when with the provincial special only twenty-four hours away on the calendar I'm then we left it to Mary together pictures and written articles we had stories and pictures (where possible of every member of the Legislative Assembly who had served the constituencies in our reading area since Saskatchewan became a province. Advertising sales was delegated completely to the salesmen of the day Phyllis having left for Scottish Columbia — as I am deeply concerned on the years of the Estevan Mystery Mary did her usual herculean job and our readers were well served by the resulting publication. The response certainly did not let us be without or conviction required to sell a special and it was a successful financial

A special issue is neither a boon nor a labor of love. At least it shouldn't be. The week and month in a hole it is filled usually look good in the financial statement, but that is because many of the costs, normally spread all the labor have found their a by-line to points of several earlier months A good special ought to reflect enough work effort and imaginative material in the readers a house advertisers the opportunity to take advantage of the extra interest and to identify with an important milestone, and the editor and writers to take to the authorship of material of lasting value But unless there are enough ads to pay for it, the special isn't carrying its weight and inhibits future underwriting of this nature.

That was probably where I stood when the provincial jubilee flopped as a revenue-generator in summer of 1965 I looked forward the approaching Centennial year without too much optimism and wondered just how much effort that special would be worth. Any thought of not producing a Centennial special would have been dismissed as unprofessional and unpatriotic, but my heart wasn't in it

That fate stepped in

A Centennial Constitution had been set up by the Canadian government and a lot of hopes were building up about the events and its observance across the nation Through the efforts of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, the commission was persuaded to sponsor a contest for the best Centennial edition published by a Canadian weekly newspaper

To encourage participation by members papers a certain was reserved on the agenda of the 1966 convention, held in Saint John, New Brunswick on the production of a Centennial edition and how to approach it

In those days conventions as other boards at Canada's extremities tended not to draw large turnouts from and I had decided early to go, and made our room volumes early in spring, to assist no registration forms were available. The conversation shortcame faced with filling panel and moderator slots for the various programs from a limited list of publishers committed to attending, prompted an early registrants and prevailed upon them to participate. That is the only reason I can think of for having been asked to conduct the Centennial session.

Reluctantly I accepted and, having done so, disinterred the ideas I had earlier developed about a Centennial issue and spent some hours developing them into a presentation including for my distinguished peers who really were, for the most part, my elders and more prestigious than I. Particularly I stressed the need for starting early six months and preferably longer before the publication date.

The session drew mild interest, and a number of the publishers, who to that point probably had given little though to their Centennial issues complimented me on my early start.

That's when yeats ee it and sometimes it seems that's the last I've heard of it.

Vanity I confess to, and also boastfulness, and all associated evils. But they have to have some basis in fact, even if that basis tends to become exaggerated in my mind. I have never claimed to be a great athlete, discover raspberry patches in the woods and I cannot draw or sing worth a hoot. But having vastly expressed myself as something of an authority on the subject I went home from Grand Falls with the hazy knowledge that I was now produce that early a good Centennial edition but one that would make a publisher proud the industry sit up and take notice. We would either win that prize or come mighty close — and cost would be of work be damned.

That's the way I was raised. We were beginning to feel at home with the province and our readers were still appreciative of local photos of good quality. This Mary Grace and I decided would be a special edition relying almost totally on pictures to celebrate Canada's 100th birthday and the participation of Weyburn and district in the nation's first century.

We doubled early on five picture-page tabloid sections pages to be sponsored by advertisers individually or jointly with myself to fix the selling.

The first section was titled "Weyburn and Canadian History" and dealt with such subjects as the building of the railroads, settlement of the area, two world wars, the drought and the depression and participation of national or international prominence — such as I.C. Douglas and Ernest Lapointe — with Weyburn backgrounds.

"Canada's People — the only section with a lot of "words" was devoted to pictures and stories of families representing the two major national and ethnic groups that settled the area, individually or in groups.

"Weyburn Today" was a pictorial representation of Weyburn as it was in 1967

"Remember When ..." was a photographic potpourri of nostalgia and historic scenes of the early and even near-the-years the period visit, animated street police-scouting exhibits teams and so on, as well as spreads on a few areas towns which may be included

The "Centennial Company" commissioned me to write copy and the institutions and activities dedicated to their achievement and position and failed.

I assumes were offered a small section of the page for photos and stories relating to them and business. The whole must would be outlined in a personal cover in jacket with a Weyburn, centennial page and again with a smaller color picture on each of the four pages relating to the sponsor of the page.

We started gathering photos and information in fall of 1966 (one of Mary Grace's undertakings) and the stories on the settlers were written over the winter months. I don't know how many months in of pictures we received, but over 500 were used in the special. Also over the winter months I sold sponsorships and wrote the stories and captions associated with the sponsors. By early spring, I started to assemble the pages and sections completing those pages as best according to a schedule, rehearing one section weekly to the pressroom as publication week approached. I personally wrote all the captions and did all the typesetting on the Intertypes that and replaced the hot metal linecasting machines. I did this, in part, to eliminate errors by mistrally. I outlined the issues of Alderman Gordon Hiles from the city-sponsored front cover, and made another conspicuous error on the first page of the first section

So much for perfection

The color-corner was printed in Manitoba.

The special was sent east with the May 4, 1962, issue of the Review and on early September after we had all but given up hope for that we had indeed won the uniform competition. A few weeks later at the CEMA convention in Ottawa I was presented with a handsome cash award, 500 books by Canadian authors. The presentation was made by Mr. Commercial — John Fisher-chairman of the Canada Centennial Commission.

We were a pretty proud outfit suddenly.

Quite a place

WESTERN September 31 1967

Two weeks ago in Ottawa, the publisher of the Review was presented by Centennial Commissioner John Fisher with a library of one hundred Canadian books — complete with trimmings — as a reward for publishing what has been chosen as Canada's best Centennial edition at a competition open to all weekly newspapers throughout the nation.

Pictured as we were with receiving such a valuable

It was a great period in weekly newspaper publishing. Other printers gave us respectability and prestige that had been lacking, and this was reflected in issues of ever-rising revenue more pages, more subscribers had ever, to our surprise and gratification, greater profitability. At about the time that we were producing the Centennial issue under increasingly crowded conditions, we decided to add a second storey to our building. George Davison had come over from Hamilton to take over the Eastern Mercury as a partner in what became a separate company.

Power at the growth

REVIEWS September 2, 1976

The past two years that we installed our three-unit Community web newspaper press have been most much growth — our newspaper circumference has almost doubled — that we are adding a fourth unit which but just been shipped out of Chicago.

What we'll use for?

Each unit stands possible the simultaneous printing of three pages in an additional color or four pages being printed on another side.

Thus we will have the capability of printing 6 pages simultaneously a black and white, or 7 pages with four of them in one color, or eight pages in one color, or four pages in four colors.

A full color photo will still be out by the Review but if further circumstances do grow at but a few past decade, she knows what the next five or 10 years will bring?

When I came to Weyburn, the newspaper was to be hand-fed in four-page sheets, through a vintage cylinder press then turned around and fed through again for the back pressure, and finally hand-fed through a folding machine. Our maximum capability then was 2,500 printed and folded pages per hour compared to 24,000 printed and folded pages per hour after the fourth unit is operational

George was doing an excellent job of rebuilding the Mercury when he suffered his first heart attack on last 1962 of early 1963. He was just recovering when, following the visit to Weyburn of the travelling tuberculosis van. I was summoned to Fort Sco or Fort Qu'Appelle to check out an x-ray that wasn't satisfactory.

How I remember that day

I had gone to Estevan for a conference with George, had had expected to stay an that city all day. Instead I found myself back in Weyburn at noon and half-reading the Fort Sas newspapers. With an unexpected half-day on my hands and a beautiful late spring day to spend it on. I decided to drive to Fort Qu'Appelle and satisfy the incompetence who obviously didn't know how to operate an x-ray camera

The elderly Scotsman who received me took me had the job about me a number of essays printed a month and smiling that meant nothing to me, and said as tactfully as possible, that these essaysthey were when had caused them to suspect that I might be over 70. He must have been his tactful euphemism even then I noticed with a touch of impatience. I'm sure, just a bit, they expected to make up their minds

He looked me in the eye as it pronounced that "as of this moment I am diagnosing inflammatory medullary perrymoon aneurysm."

This was on Thursday and on Monday morning I was delivered with extreme full of books, a typewriter and other management paraphernalia to the flat maintained to consult there for a period to be determined by my program.

But having kept up with the medical advances in the field of tuberculosis, and remembering only the meaningful looks exchanged by adults in my youth when talking of someone being sent to the San with "consumption" I believed at first that I had removed an almost certain death sentence. Dr Macpherson quickly informed me that I was very far from out with conventional medications they might well have one out in two months or less than twenty years earlier in said it is not uncommon to select a patient with only the smallest spot — like mine — and still have him there six months later with a hole the size of a half-dollar in his lung — and recovering.

As it turned out my TB turned out recovered — I was not a carrier — and to good health whatever as I was discharged with several months (literally) of pills and spent my promise to readjust my work hours and pressures.

Just before entering the San I had accepted the vice-presidency of the Riverboro Rotary Club, the strategic chairmanship of the Westford and District United Appeal, and the northeastern zone membership for Saskatchewan Homecoming '71. I was also a director of the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association. Something had to give. Mary Grant had by this time moved on to British Columbia as Lieutenant-Governor and I left the same staff to be with myself all the irregular hours and evening obligations of the news beat. Hector Bourne became sales manager a position in was even more suited for than he had been for the Intermediate. Roy Winters, whom I had upgraded from apprentice to journeyman when we acquired the Review became foreman

Master had left the sales position until his retirement early in 1968, and Roy was still competently managing the shop when this was written. From December by the last ten years or so had been Harry Aldrich, hired as a bright-eyed apprentice fall of 1959. Without in any way disparaging numerous others who, over the years, helped us build a newspaper respected, I believe both in the community and the industry that much of it was made possible through the dependable stewardship of those three men

In the early 1970s when it seemed prosperity would last forever we found ourselves again outgrowing our factory and with no room for personnel expansion. Has been still had several years to run but when the building of a downtown shopping mall was announced, I contacted our landlord Gordon Russell, then living in London Ontario and explained the circumstances. He decided to terminate our lease without penalty knowing it was to build a new building at the edge of the city. We turned into it in May of 1978.

Print shop "takes society"
THURSDAY, November 9 1978

Offset printing, a more correct phrase-comparison has come away with many of the "disasters" that used to long annual printing edition.

No doubt expressions of today when they turned additional still have made even talks of way to more nice object, when technology removes more of the problems which today we simply attain the general as part and moral of the operation

But at the grandeur that has disappeared from the words is the "type basis"

The type letter was the mysterious malleable little creature back in the hand-setting days that placed upon that the wrong cases (commercial-small document used for strong type), or into the wrong compartment

Then the typesetter trying to assemble a "stick" of type in the hurry might find himself printing upside-down the wrong size anywhere on a line and it's immediately obvious. It was, incidentally, the apprentice's job to distribute used type back into the proper cases and even passionate and I was no secret that they sometimes had difficulty telling one typeface from another – especially diminishing 10-point type at a glance, and differentiating between p's and q's, or b's and d's and upside-downs.

It was suspected, but seldom proven, that the apprentice had pooled in "dirt jug" the type, but as an apprentice was ever thrown on strike in the art the hostility here was directed at no type face.

In the newspaper's parlance the wrong face became the accounts of the poor press, particularly on publishing day when time counted so dire to get out.

The floor case type from individual routine distributing into the assembles. From a magazine containing about 1,000 ruts to a font. Matter removed from the assembles became the wrong type and hence, would were injured into a type container called the "hell box." ("If you don't mind your comments, a journalist pun.") Rather the type became hell for certain if the compositor changed to another type font, the type was back into the magazine. It was not unknown for an apprentice to run into the magazine's racks of the wrong font.

The year was say in 1909 was not much different, but some subtle the equipment had come for to most many if not for each manager. Thus, if the word went was "a" and you didn't catch it, you might typeset a column or two with every 21st "a" in the wrong typeface or like letter. the six was discovered by the office girls cleaning up proofs.

In the day I was told that you can give a former linotype operator nightmares by swapping into his one which he's sleeping that he's got a wrong face "a" in his machine.

I recall it came on an ex-operator in our office when he was wide awake, and even then it brought a recorded shudder through me of his pain and horror.

Gone also from the scene is the hellbox.

Since printing ceased to be from fixed forms, cemented items or forms no longer needed were cast down anyway because of the hellbox.

Why was it called the hellbox?

Because of the fact that every copy for its common was a marking spelt based on 250 slugs per 'column inch or higher, the correct size is obvious.

Slugs, shorts" but also discovered, although with a notice like this it wasn't often discovered.

Many compositors never looked for the name of the first type cast of linotype keys, and to fill up a "cast" "pi," the apprentice would be sent to the hellbox for more type.

Sometimes he would forget to throw away the hellbox full of type and when it was opened by the pages, the first thing that he got was said he good and "Hell" broke loose. Along with the swearing, there was also much gnashing.

Still above and doing well, however – the fortified '30s. And it all started in the end.

Changes continued in the trade, but probably our great last challenge in the 1960s from a technical point of view, has been the extensive leap into computer technology. We were launched in the late 1970s' century with the two brands – typesetting and accounting – in the late 1980s and early 1970s.

Mechanical surface was Compugraphic, which except the typesetting machine with a couple – that is to say, simple or fundamental in terms of the products produced — typesetter to produce short-copy columns of type. A computer calculated the width of each letter, decided where to break words, and so on. Personal typefaces were also originally supported by the time, and later at a time from a rapidly revolving film strip. This may sound slow but at almost ten characters a second, it was still faster than anything that had ever been in the weekly newspaper industry.

Godsend that it was it was still compared to what they only a decade or two away, what the Spirit of St. Louis was to the supersonic supersonic in aviation. Like linotypes and hot-leading could not be changed without stopping the machine and setting it cold, so changing typefaces on typeface and sizes required changes in film strips. Type size range was limited in the five to fourteen point (one point is 1/72nd of an inch newspaper can usually runs from eight to ten points). Improvements to this machine came faster than we could cope with them and phototypesetting machines as accepted part of newspaper progress. By the mid-1970s, area composition — typesetting in varying measures, type faces and sizes, with keyboard controlled spacing, entered on cathode ray screens — came into standard use, and by the early 1980s this technology had advanced to include management of editorial material.

Out of date, relatively was hunt-and-peck typewritten copy handed to translate typesetters, with much clear-the-fort confusion about typographical errors and poor proofreading. Suddenly reporters became authors in every sense, of the product that found its way into the pages of the newspaper. They didn't always appreciate the status, but before long they became used to keyboarding their stories directly from their notes on typewriter into a screen resembling if for owners, thus storing it in the memory of a computer disk. The editor then called it onto his or her own screen edited and refiled it, assigned typesetter parameter codes to the computer (mostly the number and size of the story (electronically) to the typesetter; which (without so much as a flimsy) photographed the story through our lenses into sensational paper on any one of dozens of type faces and line-leads ordered thousands of size and line length configurations to incredible speed

Complex as the application may be in its totality it was relatively easy to master once the typesetting aspect proceeded to manageable manifolds from the earliest Composographics, through the various improved models, to the latest—featured systems now in use. Adjusting to the routines and memory banks provided instant retraining for the news department, but because the programs are tailored for and confined to editorial and typesetting needs the system does not have the computer mystery as a challenge the general office encounters.

By the late 1960s everyone knew about computers, although the art had not yet reached the state where the technological miracle affected almost every aspect of our lives. Somewhere in the ivory towers of industry and government huge business, banking, utilities and military electronic tasks were held to be impossible and minds across the world believed to be beyond the gift of the most imaginative incompetent. Human intelligence down to its performance of the most traditional ways and forms, from together work promises of how the technology would change our lives and simplify our work.

Why I began to wonder my mind, especially as the pressures of ever accumulation of computers were changing everything, was we still doing most office chores as they had been done since typewriters and adding machines appeared upon the scene. The Review had an old postage machine on which rate changes and payments could be printed in accounts receivable cards but monthly statements were created by typing this information to the statements. Invoices were typewritten as instant by hand, newspapers were imprinted with multiple addresses from metal stencils, instant route lists were hand-corrected on dog-eared sheets that had been originally typewritten, procedures that were the 1900s earlier.

It should be possible I proposed, to take batches of debits and credit items coded to ledger accounts, deliver them to a central computer-equipped depot, enter the data and have the office sort performed in seconds as even minutes. I made inquiries and found that such services were available as some large accounting offices but at costs far exceeding our budget.

Then in early 1970, our old posting machine showed unmistakable signs of giving up the ghost and bidding into replacement costs. I was shocked at the new machine devices. Again I looked into centralized data processing, again was discouraged by prices, and was about to give in and pay big dollars for a function yet directly related to the printing process — a cardinal sin in my eyes in those days.

By sheer coincidence a customer mentioned that a local garage was using datamatron services offered by IBM at Regina. A visit to the garage revealed details, and the dealer's satisfaction with both the service and the cost. I contacted IBM, a representative called on us soon, and I was quickly convinced that this was my solution.

So also so fast as we could restructure our ledger classifications to suit standard general ledger and accounts read aids packages offered by IBM and print new office forms to accommodate computable data entry we were on datamatron services. This happened late summer of 1970. Every month-end we would hand our completed documents — cheques, revenue cash sheets and journal entries — to the IBM datamatron in Regina, and a few days later we would get back the documents plus updated monthly customer statements an aged accounts receivable report, and a general ledger journal from which we might compile balance sheets and statements of profit and loss. The transition to this system we certainly painless thanks to careful and thoughtful supervision by our IBM rep. And the cost was unbelievably low more than we as customer charge and we had managed, through a few departures from IBM recommendations to cut the number of transactions by almost half of what had been initially estimated. One transaction as almost everyone knows nowadays, as a single debit in credit entry

A new word: turnaround

BARRISTER, December 2 1976

I learned a new word a few weeks ago and now is doing as much for me as my apparel is, a wonderful positive, liberal help-me, mentally.

"Turnaround."

Our printers when a computer matter were late getting back to us, or I finally telephoned to find out when was the problem.

"Well explained a hesitant voice at the other end of the line, "we had a turnaround problem."

I didn't want to sound like dumb, till something, my subconscious I admit: "What is turnaround?"

The party on the other end hesitated and hemmed a bit, as the message of person trying to explain one of those questions coming from a youngster too young to be given the answer. Finally he said something about work loads, sum factors and sum-factors.

still didn't understand and said so.

He was quiet for a moment such a long-time that I got it, as in simple language that even I could understand.

"We were busy and didn't get it done.

That's "turnaround."

So I pass the tip on! Find an item your printing setter not ready when it's supposed to be, or your mail order doesn't get to you until after Christmas, and someone tells you it's a hang-up-ition or "turnaround" you'll know what it means.

As time went on notes went up and a milestone change came into place. I am guessing that this happened because computer prices were coming down, as the up-dated costs were making their own installations. Rolled only few small businesses were, at that point using the electronic or making their own installations.

There is no telling how long we might have missed for this arrangement. It was not without its little problems and allowed some of the little home-made programs and short-cuts made possible by in-plant computers. But it was comfortable, reasonably reliable and required no much investment.

After about late years of this arrangement, changes in the computer world almost which if speculated earlier began to step down in the classic way. First we were told that there was difficulty in getting keyboard operators in Regina and it was suggested that we buy a key-punch and send punched cards to IBM.

By way of emphasizing the desirability of in-plant keypunching, there began to be delays in returning our processed material. Naturally we soon acquired a keypunch. This reduced our processing costs only slightly and added the nuisance of a new operation to our office. However it was still not hard to live with.

The next step was the closing of the Regina data centres, making it necessary for us to ship documents to the Calgary businesses for processing. This caused the personal touch, since over the years, we in it often found it necessary or convenient to hand-deliver our documents to Regina Conveyancing the documents people and we were and strangers to each other. This may seem a minor consideration but someone who knows you or more inclined to push you up when you make an obvious error rather than letting you stew in the juice of your own mistake.

The second disadvantage was that communication were frequently missed in Regina — sending going or back — adding another day or two to what I have come known as called "turn-around time. Calendar services were put coming into their own and did not make regular stops in small centres, so leaving was still necessary. Hence the missed connections. Then Saskatchewan, either for the courier to drop our documents in Saskatoon instead of Regina, and occasionally even to Winnipeg or Toronto.

The loss of a day or two may seem trivial, but it is very unsettling to set aside a day to wrap up the investment, and then find yourself empty-handed. Many customers also found to cumbersome to receive statements and invoices late after having become accustomed to getting them promptly.

All the time, of course, computer technology was making giant strides, and a few seminars and demonstrations at IBM in Regina convinced us the day was not far off when we would have to make our own installation. We were given another powerful nudge in that direction when in 1979 or 1980, we were notified that after a certain date about two years ahead, all data processing for western Canada would in then to Vancouver. We pondered this on the proverbial hand-wringing on the wall.

DATA BANK LIBRARY TEXT RESEARCH

At this time Irene and I began to take a serious interest in the IBM computer simulators, and to try and understand what we were getting into. Our arm's length acquaintance with computers helped us, probably more than we realised, and we were saved from accepting in computerism lines that not have the moving capacity we knew we needed

Mission accomplished

extracted December 16, 1980

If the building seemed a bit either a vague threat or an equally vague promise, it is probably a bit of both

It is an impression used in computer programming, a word that is equally alluring in or everyone in business, industry, government, organisations forming bandwagons and you name it

The power with which computer technology is advancing has been expressed in a number of interesting ways, but one of my favorites are comparisons with the motor car

One expert has figured out that if the flight seats and efficiency and improved as rapidly as computer costs and efficiency in the past two decades, it would be possible to fly overseas now for a fare of 25 cents.

A first issue raised by the University of Saskatchewan when two years ago expressed it that, "It is only one of the technology of personal flight and advanced under these men in the technology of computing, the first renewed landing on the moon would have taken place eight, perhaps other the Wright brothers flew the first plane.

Why that investment of computers affecting any day-to-day lives about 15 years ago were almost received mainstream and attention from some of the larger suppliers then grappling, with little the bath and communication to speak there, with computer automation.

Considering attention up which important events and research change 100 years in terms of the value of the goods or services used in an instant of purchase, the Western Autocare business was slight in the customer himself and been relegated of, hardly inspired great confidence in the company as an efficient business tool.

Those computer keys in computers not however and many years were by before the idea of storage control computer began to have greater appeal.

Alfred Hargrave Haigh, half-computer pioneer, second for the man services but found the control logic, and for instance as complicated and slow, that it was prepared to leave for profits to the next generation.

Then along came one of the acknowledged world leaders in the computer field with a package that are suitable, and at an affordable price that was none the

One system, too, has computer to mainframe a few changes and interested in jobs or ability to make stupid errors, the world about the dangers of getting back on manual entries into budgets

The computer problematic doesn't make stupid errors. It makes terribly easy ones stuff. The computer problem the the computer being stupid, computer confusion that would not easily caught if human being.

A general check for example, is not likely to pay an employee 10 times the weekly rate or make a bank statement of $63.06 instead of $6.33. Or even a statistical decimal point or input that the increment volume and the computer will make some use to-date-to-date up under powerful deficiencies without being an eye

Since going on the accounting system, we have the studied caricature of the bank's payroll system and computerised typesetting systems both bulging solutions and sure sign of problems.

With computers coming down in price becoming in size increasing in speed and allegedly improving in reliability of programming, we are seriously considering a computer of our own within the next year or two.

Then I find myself attending conferences, listening to sales pitches, reading texts and brochures to further acquaint myself with the wonderful and frightening world of computers. Just when I retain my beginning to understand it, some term is bandied at me, or a new problem is posed

So, make sense with him and have processors, CRT's intelligent terminals, front-end-other's and parallel's during through my head instead of the mainframes more appropriate in the access.

Then, just as you're no wiser yet, you will be bombarded by PROS.

P.R.O.S. Hi-tech-other is a random whereby a function is performed on long as a certain conditions such and-system function when the minimum comes to-date.)

(P.P.S. Hi-tech.)

Computer salesmen began walking on us regularly - watching breathless assistance with such advancements. The gap between obviously affordable but inadequate hardware, and the needs of our configurations continued to shrink, until we were introduced to the IBM System 23 model, by the very that was considered a dinosaur in only a few years later

In the have the advantage of using diskettes (floppies) with 2.1 cartoon bits with two slots in the computer and another two on a flight boot sidekicked the "master" kernel of its rumbidance to the kitchen appliance. Also available were "off-the-shelf" general ledger and accounts receivable programs developed especially for the computer and a program called SELLING — Business Report Applications Development System — with which a computer illiterate like myself might write job-oriented programs. This was important because I still had not been able to find an industry program for advertising breaking or circulation control. IBM also had a hotline in Toronto to give assistance for the telephone-responsible in mastering the program.

What

As I write these lines, over eight years later the System 38 printer is still rattling away in the next office and giving pressure sores. Although slated for accepting its several months' 24 on Canada's chartered lookout with its have developed many programs on my own as the shift is offered with custom programming.

There we got over our horror at discovering that both the training and familiarization with hardware and custom software were dash-pyramid resistant we found the system to be user-friendly with dictation taking us step by step through the daily, weekly monthly and annual cycles of Accounts Receivable and General Ledger programs.

Although it all worked out for pass-generation of newer computers ought to have been said to the pre-owning Soviet Union for installation at Lad-yanka Prison to extreme punishment and torture devices.

We had hoped — we stated really — that our second computer item Intrinsic somewhere in the future would be a piece of cake, with all the software needed for our business available "on the shelf." In fact we signed a contract in April of 1987, received the hardware in June or so, and after giving up on a company that was unable to have a single program running for the end of the year — when it finally was into receivership — we are optimistic that the new system will be fully operational by June of 1990.

Doing it yourself

Business Tuesday 13 1987

Last week I promised (or threatened) that my experiences in the computer world would probably be wrinkled as future newspapers.

That upside-ended with the first disappointment: the computer did not arrive New Year's Eve as promised. The postal era are lucky the delivery people weren't injured and by five positions and brought the machine that thing definitely surprising.

Someone, naturally, telephoned the computer home office to let the folks there know that the hardware was arrived ready for installation. They were very interested in this information, but pointed out that this was a do-it-yourself proposition and that I would this detailed assistance in one of the packing crates.

When I stopped mouthing I checked the instructions and then it was familiarize in the consumer responsibility.

You are rightfully wondering about my aptitude at not getting this article right in the first place. Recovery in the industry it goes without saying that new equipment is almost out-fired by a good 360 technician.

My own surprise, considering that I have been known to have difficulty tuning in a simple answering machine instructions really were simple. I'll admit I had help and it consisted into phone calls to the Toronto but we were actually get in touch up and making solves.

I am now anxiously waiting for my wife to have time to operate the home, so that she can work too. Then are then setting all the controls myself.

Some 360 battle with the A/R and G/L programs, while I grappled with the mysteries of programming. I won't attempt to describe all my frustrations and anguish, but imagine learning to speak with two fathers that living both and both languages — all preceded to make, but which could be brighter — and among it all from volumes and volumes of manuals the seem to have been written for professionals. Then, when at your wits end, you phone the hotline, you learn that your helper is attending a seminar in Montreal in Atlanta and will for his available until after the weekend. So you blunder on, jumping deeper and deeper into the computer as you bring everything it back on it after the weekend awaiting the benefit of professional advice.

We learned, too, that for all the thousand speed of computers, there are some things that simply take time. After a while, we learned that some functions took a few minutes some an hour, and must even throw us four bones. But it is an invitation to insanity to stare at a computer screen hearing the bland message "Printing, please wait," and expect to emit five minutes and it turns into a three-hour wait.

One unmentionable weekend when we were loading our aged accounts receivable, we posted a large batch Friday afternoon that worked for the computer to absorb the new data and restructure the data-entry mode, enabling us to go home by the evening. We didn't know that soon as a while we had to instruct the computer to reorganize indexed files to speed up the process. One of us returned to the office after supper to check out the program and found the screen unchanged. A problem with the software on our system was that the more files that did not generate printouts, there was nothing to indicate how far advanced the run was: half finished 70 percent, or whatever.

But wanting to sit there and watch the bottle come to a boil is to speak, and eventually we left it for the night, we sat down and consumed a bottle of wine, believing that the computer couldn't possibly mess up.

It did.

We went home and to bed and on Saturday morning I rushed to the office and was relieved to find a serious message confirming that the three had been successfully completed. So we guess the remaining a few hundred more customer files that the program was in the system. Knowing now that the computer took a lot of time to address the printing — and perhaps wondering, instantly how the computer would work if did not ask that thing — we simply went home and let the computer work out the problems overnight again.

Sunday morning I dashed confidently to the office, and the message on the screen was only slightly cryptic: that an urgent message, exceedingly rare I understand in data communications.

It took me time for the computer head found the demand upon it beyond its ability to cope, and had simply given up and aborted by mist on a most undistressed point. This message was accompanied by error references which, had we been professionals, might have solved the problem. Instead we spent an utter aggravating Sunday and a sleepless night wondering what might have gone wrong. Value of the IBM Selectric typewriter went on Sunday.

The problem was really quite simple.

Let us to please you gave a librarian an empty backlog a pile of five thousand books and instructions to place them on the shelves consecutively (as opposed to alphabetically and as numbers were mixed, under any circumstances be two copies of this as the title — and all this without making any index of books as stored

The first few months would be penny fast, and then the process would become slower as it became necessary to check on each title against hundreds of stored titles. Then imagine those thousand books in place, and the librarian still attempting to add more, checking with title against these thousand.

At some point there would be only one logical transition from the librarian: "Quit!"

Fortunately our computer had done it quit.

All that would have been necessary was to run the data files through an indexing function every hundred minutes or so, so that memory would tell it that new entries were not duplications. Moreover having pushed the computer over the edge getting out of it wasn't that simple. The bedlam people tried, after the weekend, to get us on track without losing data. The result, however, was terrible error which made it necessary to run the hundred-an entire day to print an unaltered bedlam report.

While Evans was feverishly learned with the manual programs, I was having my own little struggle accomplishing things with BRADS, that wonderful program designed to allow an run user to build reports with little familiarity with programming.

In case this sounds far-fetched let me say that I have used BRADS to build scores of excellent (my assessment admittedly) and helpful programs, whilst even entering one-third of its capabilities. Again comparing with something in the every-day world, let us suppose you were given a box capable of locating, hunting, baking, burning, interpreting, shaving files, playing music, floating, flying and just about everything else. It only you learned the right abracadabra to find time for progress with those instalments to be gleaned from a book written, he part, in a foreign language.

Somewhere you might, with fortunate concentration and unrelated overwork, discover how to make the device fly and float. At this point you might, as instalment weeks for flying and floating and rely on traditional sources for the other functions.

That's the way it worked out with BRAPS.

It was very simple to design repair forms and read by date files, also simple to create. Even generating totals was a fairly simple step taught in the elementary training (self-training) exercises supplied.

The trouble was that as I built my report configurations, I would run into a statement in the BRAPS manual explaining that to do such-and-such it would be necessary to write statements in appropriate places in the report programs, and to accomplish this it would be necessary to learn a bit about System 38 BASIC — the program language of my system.

Soon I would find myself between the devil and the deep blue sea. To complete my programs, and make them practical I had to learn some BASIC as well as the mechanism of the BRAPS report program. Tackling BASIC, however, I quickly learned that if I read to learn it all before putting it to use, it would take years to build any functioning part of my programs.

So I would turn to the BASIC manual whenever stymied, but go back to programming as soon as a problem had been solved. The result was fragmented and useful progress that might have been much more efficient if I could first learn all of BRAPS and BASIC — but which that might never have happened.

Without reporting any of it, a highlight to a nightmare like part of a year of my thirty-plus years of publishing, will be the year or two entombment by programming, the frustrations of finding solutions and trying to overcome errors in malfunctions — errors spent brooding about alternatives and dead ends — and sleepless nights with my mind trapped in computer logic. Sometimes the roadblock was as complex as a typographical error. The experience really was the first totally negative. Few things are as satisfying as finding a program statement or statements that accomplishes what for hours or days seemed impossible.

Admittedly I sometimes wondered whether I had learned a programs and accused of a newspaper publisher. In my defense, I never played programs games or wrote programs just as exercises.

When we settle the installment, I was confident that by the time it had to be explained all my BRAPS programs in progress performing file functions, would be right there on the shelf like reports and minor blades, but there was only one program the same than eight years later and all the programs except A/R and G/L still have to be custom designed.

But but that professionals will do it.

Little triumphs

With so much space and so many words devoted to the mechanism and technical challenges of the weekly newspaper industry the reader may wonder whether there is any excitement in creating and collecting the components that comprise the newspaper itself.

There is, but it is at least as like as one of technological revolution, more subtle and difficult to quantify. The pages reflect our quiet communities, the lifestyle, spirit and sentiment of which usually lie below the surface and are not regularly exposed to violence and upheaval.

In our thirty years here there have been only two murder trials in our courthouse, which across a considerable radius neither of them were overly sensational. There isn't a major fire in the average year; automobile accidents are chiefly fender-benders, about civilians in big news, and in weeks when city council meets, the report of that tends to be the lead story.

There are little news victories, like the picture instalment earlier, of Premier Douglas and Mayor Snowley bowling on the natural pin and later making Time magazine. In 1968 an October fire during the night burned down Wayburn Eisenbaum's family-type establishment by local standards: small and not on the spot because an employee who rescued his nearby home was awakened by the commotion and had the presence of mind to call me.

There was the New Year's baby that almost let me down. This was back in the days when from upwind else the darkroom my house basement, and printing photos were produced on the Hitchcopyak Three Way on Wednesday and we "closed" page one on Tuesday morning. Front page bomber the baby that nearly would be home the following day at the latest. I mainline hospital in those times on New Year's Eve and by evening they called me I was so well forget it. There wasn't even a prospect in hospital, and is having a cold, history night anyone anywhere near you surely would have come in.

I didn't even have anything else ready for the page one hole; it is not a last news time in the weekly newspaper cycle. So I sat my alarm for three six in the morning and crossed my fingers. Then I got up and telephoned "Yesterday" publicity told me that an expectant mother had been brought in at two in the morning, and how did word of a baby and would be ready for a photo in fifteen minutes.

So I rushed to the hospital photographed that seven-old infant and mother at seven, got the basic facts for my story and rushed the film home to Irene. By the time the staff arrived at the office I watched printed the photo I and written the story directly on the boo-keyboard and the paper was being scanned on the Hitch.

Today's methodology would not loosen the suspense of waiting for a birth that might not occur before three can not. But with very developments of photos, Hitach engraving and last minute typesetting it was a feat to have a picture and a story on page one and on the street that and only been available two hours earlier

Once in the early 1960s someone telephoned to suggest that we go out and get a picture of a disabled car on Highway 13 (then still with a gravel surface). A few miles east of the city I don't know why a disabled car should be remarkable enough to merit a picture, but I drove out decided there was nothing newsworthy about it, and returned to the office.

That was on a Thursday or Friday and I did pursue the matter further until planning the ROAD for an in-depth report about Tuesday of the following week. Since there was nothing about a mashup on Highway 13 I asked the detachment chief what the story was on the disabled car. There was complete silence for a few seconds then the chief demanded to know in a voice that conveyed controlled rage, just what I knew about that car. I told him and received a response that I cannot in the tag requested to the police.

Earlier during the week to which I first came to look at the disabled car, an elderly farm couple living near Weyburn had been hamstrung and hacked a few many hours in a small granary. The disabled car had proved to be one of several stolen cars used by the hidden years and had not been discovered by the police until a day or so before I and called. Had I telephoned immediately it might have put them on the trail which was still alive.

I remember this story more because of my error than Once in my radio incident I noticed not many story I probably put my life on the line.

It was in 1968, and Simon Fraser, former national leader of the New Democratic Party and been defeated by Tommy Douglas in a contest for the public, and consequently had crossed the floor of the House of Commons to join the Liberal party. There was much conjecture about what this would do to his popularity in his Assiniboia riding, and even in the Kayville area he came from.

It announced that he was going home to Kayville to explain his decision to his constituents, and an Argus-friend telephoned me and urged on an unusual welcome planned for the Argus at their Kayville home.

It was a November Tuesday night — very cowardly night — and bitterly cold. I am talking about forty below with a slight breeze blowing. I attended council, wrote my news story and headed out in almost nine for Kayville, over an hour away in a sparsely settled region. It was no exit the car, just months old, did not even warm up inside during the drive, and ground-shifting was bundling up small drifts across the highway. I had to change the caught chain to full speed, heart in throat and hoping for the best. I arrived at the Argyle home in time for the end of the party. I remember standing a safe walk a large farm flag, and an underarm guest offering me a drink of house brew in an unmarked glass. Everyone tried to talk me out of driving home that night but my work schedule did not permit so the collection

It was a frightening drive. The drifts were deeper, it was a moonless night, yard lights had been turned off and there was not a car on the highway. I couldn't help wondering what would happen if I had car trouble and had to walk any distance. I knew I couldn't last half an hour out of the car.

Near morning, the car couldn't even turn over.

I have since made it a point to advise reporters not to venture out in that type of weather. Some stories just are not worth it.

The Saskatchewan Hospital fire in 1961 that took the lives of six elderly patients, was one of the major tragedies of our Western years, but I may be forgiven a degree of satisfaction over Saint's future outlook in our coverage of it.

The fire broke out early on a Tuesday morning, and Mary Grove and I got there in time to take dozens of graphic shots. It was unquestionably the biggest national-class story to have happened in Western Canada since the Leader-Post came into geographic use as our platform.

From spent all day making deadline for national television and eastern newspapers which had no hole to go when I transposed this the Leader's photos hadn't turned out. It was during the period when carrier boys with the Leader were still "carrier" and it was not unusual for us to allow the duffy to use a number of our pictures on the street condition that they be visibly identified as Regina Leader-Post photos

There was the great Medicare controversy when most Saskatchewan medical doctors withdrew their services to see their professional fees going on strike and there were storms that were hard and important but there was more routine than drama in the coverage. We kept our readers informed of what was going on as well as we could and film crews came out on both sides of the issue, but at it would be called well-lit struggle

Visits by prime ministers — Lester Pearson, John Diefenbaker and Pierre Trudeau — and other government figures gave our pages interest and occasionally a hallstorm that devastated several farms yielded us a collection of prize-winning pictures (in a minor competition) sensational floods added excitement as did no-radio and monopoly owners blizzards. Several wagon fires got us out of bed during the night, and there were local personnel and federal elections that kept us up scheduling pull-by-pull results for the morning's paper

The quality of the satisfaction of publishing a weekly newspaper has not a big headlines and sensational pictures, but in the quiet contentment of being an integral part of a progressive community in a province we have learned to appreciate a country we love and a world we worry about. We hope the editorials, features and columns reprinted herein reflect our involvement and define the constant challenge better than would a rambling history of the city the province and the world.

One of the most interesting editorial challenges of my career, recalling even the prize-winning Centennial edition, came when the directors of the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association commissioned me in early 1970 to assemble a jubilee section to be placed in all Saskatchewan weeklies in early summer of 1970, in observance of the province's 75th anniversary

Given a free hand as to style and content I used excerpts from most Saskatchewan weeklies to reflect the changing times from 1905 to 1970, and stories submitted by fellow publishers and myself to introduce the readers to our industry and its progress through and participation in Saskatchewan history.

I spent scores of hours at the Saskatchewan Archives in Regina reading old weeklies, and with Student, what consolation, consolation, by our colleagues in the industry particularly Ron McKay of Waverunner, put together what I like to think of as a fairly acceptable job.

Another source of satisfaction has been the presentation of saving one's positions and privileges to have some good ideas from bands as writing an apology for a relatively harmless typographical error is simply a way as in plain it is a humorous perspective having fun with it government money release, employing in a persecuting article about Saskatchewan in a large Californian daily pointing out in Canada's Prime's merchandising plans in writing to columns you must about anything that seems good for a laugh. Saskatchewan, subsequently was Lumby was not fully shared by the target, but mostly our letters issues were honourable.

An apology of sort

SASKATOON Jan 2 1976

The Review owes apologies to several parties for the embarrassing typographical error which appeared in the last issue of The Canberra gymkhana committee. In the blog 13 misread of the Review

Mrs. Ram Lowsley, the Caledonia correspondent and secretary writes the account of the event, and in our news office, one paragraph was edited down to read in part: Andrew Goertz school supervised. Wayfarers, addressed the gentlemen and during the supper hour Karen Wiens sang two duets accompanied on the piano by Phyllis Peterson.

In the committee as word words were mixed with the following result. "Andrew Goertz, school supervised Wayfarers, addressed the gentlemen and sang two duets.

Naturally our owes an apology to Mrs. Lowsley for distorting her story. We also owe an apology to her Honour who in his name in her style and dance segments in singing weddings.

And of course, we owe an apology to those responsible for planning the gymkhana, because of the organization left and they might be guilty of asking Mr. Goertz to sing two solos

I am willing to swear in every sterling quotation on the part of Mr. Goertz, her having most absorbed in shoulder in Rotary with him in many committees and that "in Canada"? I am my wife and me enclosing that no one is likely to ask him in song two solos. One maybe. But not two. Not even in consecutive years

Tips on teaching

THURSDAY August 2 1979

Saskatchewan Health her name up with 10 tips on how to limit typing children to speak

This advice was prompted by the case of a four-year-old hospital so for spastic civilization because the old can speak clearly but understood everything said to the. It should not that neither of the parents talked to the little girl until she was three years old because they did not think she could understand what they were saying.

time on the tips, followed in toilet, by the staff's possible consultant in her (or his) recognition case of thunderbreaker, inter:

1. Talk to your child long before she is able to speak. Your child will "learn" the conversation. And will be helped to her later / pronunciation. But not a lot. Even with 200 speeches of "Wonderful World" programmed with my wife while busy.

2. Demonstrate to him you want your child to the then ask her to do the same thing: e.g., "Say hands, "clap your hands and say it" by slapping up hands, etc. Again, your child will learn the process of your spoken at the end of every time. Repeat these 3 times a talking about of standing sessions published them.

3. Encourage your form, efforts to talk and to vocalize her with a smile or a hug. It become a very quiet time because it was impossible to say a thank-you sincere without getting elaborated over

4. Listen to your child talk. The best reward you can give her is your attention. Stop whatever you are doing, especially if the her difficulty expression herself and look in her voice the speaker. If speak too softly, it is because one of my parents more frequently.

5. Do not wish to supply the missing words there her from in find the words she wants to say. Many a time I'm sure in had hungry in the pain because mother suppositions in translation, my word that could the her understand. Be patient in to stage and gentle corrections.

6. Use all the senses. Children learn by hearing feeling and doing. New words should be introduced by using them in different ways. For example, "the table is smooth, will your hand on the table and feel it. Rub your thumb on the brush and feel it. Is it stained no, it is rough. "Other look more bad" after dinner's stained washer. My mummy cannot to put my hand on it and said, "Not bad."

7. Explain new words in terms meaningful and specificity. You taught early and pointing two an axis. I pointed to a cars Saturn two cars and got a Volkswagen woman on the subject under up of instead of them mothers ending she words "new Datsun

8. Discuss events such to holidays in a trip to the television. An early disappointment in his way my that tops in the summer. A one-hour build-up was my personal way of getting me up for a three-hour ride. About to drop off some dirty clothing. My newest greatest slaughterhouse video they want to re-scientific again and I grabbed a table by and wouldn't let go. He story ball out, with a babysitter and went to Disneyland without me.

9. Help by repeating the child's awkward grammar correctly. For example: "He was going away" may be repeated by saying, "Yes, we are going away." My parents made a great deal of something my sister the greatest of interesting my speech. Since I believed I was mature learner and neither said, "No dear, you'll behold like to hear it sooner." I laughed and I got carried. Look, here' hats coming!

Southerners Health center with the information that there are only a few hairs and the variations are endless. What I mean of light, my parents told me they are been pulled by a 19-piece guitar from the principal spokesman I thought they had taken an incurvature. Why those.

Nesting makes pet owner anxious

Saturday July 9 1970

Hennessy received toast thins a few unbleached are to be published for 24 hours, unmodified but equal in the mugs in write one myself.

What provoked we was a clipping from the Los-Angeles Times., brought in by a thoughtful reader making us to fashionforum feel this a spouting wrongdoers of crime cure in the Orange.

Based on a seeking and household hints booklet issued by the Saskatchewan department in public health for the frustrated bodies population, the Times story giving hints a light twist, has headed "Nesting Told Pets to Make Modest Stew" and read as follows:

REGINA, Sask. (AP) To help anxiety-ridden people save on food bills, health officials in Saskatchewan have put out a cookbook listing such unorthodox items as stewed snakes and rats' hearts.

The book, entitled "Recipes for You" is published by the women's division in the department of public health. Among other things, it recommends minced snake from skinned and pan consumed in rum-like fat, pack on to fill crust after they baked.

"For those who really them to try pressies, the chain recommends taking the neck bones of beef mature or old and simmering them for two hours, then adding canned onions potatoes and simmering the last 30 minutes to make the dish ready.

"Tomato or onions, the book advises, go out, and the fields in quest of dandelion greens, pigweed farms, wild onions or whatever else is edible nonpoisonous and in season.

The foregoing newspaper was so pan the letdressing letters to the editor of the Times:

"Dear Sir:

A reader today brought to my attention the enclosed news about "Handy Todd Stew to Make Modest Stew" which appeared recently in your paper.

"I incredulously secured a copy of the booklet "Recipes for You" which is giving you all the lowly laughs, and find it a written for our perfectly jubilee population, and is devoted to basic an economical nutritious interests in the extraordinary readily available to these people their financial economic and their traditional way of life.

"If you will take the time to glance at a copy of Saskatchewan are you will find that there are only a handful in unsuspected monosodic north in the geographical corner of our province. In that great northern expanse, roughly 100,000 square miles in area, virgin forests and rock, one can labor you a few thousand Indians They live there by choice like them they are reason any there were a small general store, and perhaps a Mounties away from such distractions as churches, hardwares and hunting gifts, they continue subsist in the proportion to foods available to them inside bisons and wood deer moose.

"But just so that them may be an hour, capacity of discussion, how about transferring into Zone and residing in a supply of pumpkins on many current, the contrast is citing the dope hotel dealing with customers have to keep your nose in a waffle jam, and sedan typified California topics. One native people would enjoy them immensely as they can dine another table with dandelion greens — as in upon countryside inside a last out yesterday.

I shouldnote, in course, that I hope the colour of the Times that as we heard of the recovery pollution in our southern waters. He might just like our shores you as well as I have have the "civilization" first advanced on their request in our unspoilt scotland.

Alice in Government

Interview May 1984

Alice was weary

After her adventures first in Wonderland, and then in the strange land Through the Looking Glass, she had remained (at the least) not to her own many and while her old friends carried up beside her, as she had found it a huge towards that resembled her for all the world in a cutlery system, with all its utensils, and uttered amusement.

"I wonder whom I am," she said to herself. "I hope I'm not me for double.

She looked around her and the grass felt upon a large sweet sign with two-foot letters blinking the words, "Canada Post."

Underneath this, at slightly smaller letters, was the legend, "Where Profit Is Not Just a Word."

Grey said, "I'm in the post office, isn't it? only a few blocks from home. I can walk it in a few minutes."

But instead the car slid, and soon found one, for by the time Grey motioned, Dani'd looked.

"I guess it's an emergency sub she explained to herself. Federal express and some quiet violence call. She settled down only to find that it was not locked. She and Jast found the third exit, and rolled it up, too, very quickly, when the last few men losing firmly grasped. She looked up to see a semi-fluent security guard.

And what, if I may ask, are you up to young lady?" demanded the guard.

"Time-out" said Alice, "I'm only trying to get out of the building."

"That's what I suspected, marked the guard. "And just what evidence do you have leaving the building at 10 in the morning — right hand before quoting about? Do you have a noteworthy lower pass, or a sick leave voucher or a form in five of each letter? Why, as a mundane visit, is a conspicuously heavy pass, or a

Alice couldn't help giggling at the thought of her a little girl, being a postal employee.

"This time laughing sector" said the guard.

"I'm sorry" said Alice. "I don't have an official form don't work how to a member of the public and I'd like-"

"You're a member of the public and you'll like?" exploded the guard. "Don't you know that members of the public are not allowed to leave the premises the only excuse before quitting time? Do you think Canada Post can make any profit on people who go drifting out of here someone from they arrive? For their normal necessary you bought in for?"

"Nothing, mumbled Alice. "But then, I haven't any money."

"Nothing, indeed, replied the guard. Then, mutting she was only a child, he said in a softer voice, "Could come well in fine. The kinds sometimes the taste of the outside here catalogue for but about anything you can pick. You simply make your selection, fill out the order form from take them to the appropriate Canada Post window and then your order. The merchandise will be mailed to you promptly within a reasonable time from the order in ordering by the above mail basis."

"What's a reasonable time?" boom Alice meekly remembering that about of all kinds said some hundreds of every description within blocks of about. And can't boost something go last?"

"Two hundred thirty-three minutes the guard.

"One more month The cold and soft you go to the Purchase of $1,000 and Over' basket. And there is under necessity "you get in control of merchandise, and there are to refunds Profits sales, are the name of the game.

Agnes, as a naive bushy lass, he whispered, "There are also other government supermarkets super-named here Perhaps you'll find some items on there within your spending range."

Grateful, Alice wandered off through a window until she came to window number 'Ishmit Canada' has, "Veterinary Services and then "Medical Supplies."

She stopped to the Weather Bureau window, finding, "At least I can find out what's weather's like

She stopped up to the street and asked "Please, sir what's the weather like today?"

"Use your eyes child" came the reply "The element of course in but then you want it as in What would you prefer?"

Completely surprised, Alice said, "Well lots of sunshine of course.

"Which is Miami, West Miami, Texas — you name it in Canada Post at last 37 hour phone.

"What a name!" thought Alice, and went on to the next ticket, wherein National Film found the and also might see in movie or one from getting fees.

"Can you suggest a movie?" she asked.

"Of course I can. That's what Television Self-and from post Canada Post tickets of Canada, under 72, and there's also-"

Now disappointed entitlement Alice, and marched quickly to the wicket designated Justice Department."

"I want some justice!" she demanded, with more and a little spirit

The clerk looked into silverfoot, who were judicial robes to wrist to the stained tag "And would would you like on in hair?"

"No" she added, panted, "What do you mean 'in'?"

"No, in appeared. "Out of, drop-ins enter your you have to tell it, don't that what justice is all about? Reasonable but profitable — prices. Does and that's what "Unimportant" Alice said to herself "Hey if I can't get out of from 1% but need a better ticket and still from where I am Maybe they'll come and get me.

So she walked up to the Canada Post Stamps counter and got a handful of stamps on the counter.

"For that absolute fact, said the clerk, "maybe I can get you a Topp 7-Jurisdiction stamp, in a most Egyptian

All I want, interrupted Alice "is a Canadian 32-cent stamp."

A Canadian 30-one stamp? asked the clerk incredulously. "Nobody collects those."

None more, Alice retorted. "I don't want to collect it. I just want to send a letter to me."

"The stamp is send a letter?" screamed the clerk, and more computer was astounding. "The stamp to mail a letter? She wants to send a letter?"

Spotted the Jubilee fault somehow "Off with the head!"

Things gets curiouser and curiouser.

(The foregoing was written as response to Canada Post plans to end most paper and other profitable mail processing services.)

Oh yes, that early ambition to produce the best newspaper in Canada

Over the years we learned to accept the reality that competition was stiff and that worthy opposition abounded in the country. While we never lost the dream, paid occasionally satisfied the muse, the Review also reached in the annual Better Newspapers Competitions, both provincial and national, we contented ourselves with frequent provincial awards, the Centennial edition victory and an occasional second in third place in our category in excellence in national competition.

And then it happened!

We were about in the event of a staff banquet observing our 56th anniversary in Weyburn, and honoring Hector Rutcher and Ray Watson as their twenty-five years with us. When we received word that the Review had won the triple crown of the competitions — that All Around Newspaper Best Front Page and Best Editorial Page — in our circulation category. It seemed almost as though a benign providence had rewarded us for a quarter-century in the business, and had lined the stake for the staff party.

We don't it is human perverseness, or the mortality that comes with age and experience I'm not sure — perhaps it is a bit of both — but where we used to look a new competition entries and wonder why they hadn't matched highs placement now we looked at you entry and wondered who in the world had granted us this prize for it — and why.

In the next few years we won the four All-Around Class awards, as well as several other awards but never the same, never as the one that crowned us twenty-five years.

A dream come true
reprinted June 15 1983

We all have our dreams

Sometimes dreams remain dreams, sometimes they become goals. Sometimes goals turn into dreams.

Before coming to Weyburn I was with a weekly which once swept the annual newspapers awards dinner for awards for in a number of categories — best all around, best front page, best editorial page.

Naturally and I what we had as our eyes on when we came to Weyburn. At the time it wasn't simply a dream but a goal which given the conditions and policies of profit seemed right around the corner.

Over the quarter-century The Review has won its share of awards in the Saskatchewan competitions. Few years have gone by that didn't see it bringing home at least a second in third prize and so often as not a first prize to add to some of the key categories.

The national awards have been more elusive.

One bigger plum came in 1967 when we received the award for the best historical edition in Canada: reporting of completion. The national work is a history of 100 dates in Canadian history.

Once every five years it as we picked up a second or third prize in front page or editorial page competition and one year our Christmas edition was judged best.

The first 25 years as on, we went in conversations confident that this was the year we would find ourselves once if not right in the try.

A quick look at the list of winners would establish that ours was not among them, and we would then sit back, add up the votes, compare them with those in the competitions, and determine where we went in the field. It was not heartening to find that we were usually somewhere in the middle of the pack. There was a temptation, at in any contest, to blame the judges, to question their impartiality or even their qualifications.

But in time even by we realized that different judges, with different backgrounds, did not vary all that much in their assessment. So that a mark here and the window We developed an philosophy — the was the competition is designed to foster — that its importance lies in enabling it as any how in the eyes of impartial viewers, we compare with other community newspapers of similar size, and to do so not for the sake of winning the big gobs, but in order to get our readers and advertisers a better product for their money from the press. But as our readership increased, we were also the prime competitors of the higher circulation establishments and we would find ourselves back on the middle rungs of the new household.

As years went by we found ourselves stepping up

The dream never was to find out as a good business secretary to the more important considerations of proving to everyone that we were somewhere up there among the better newspapers of the country.

For the past few years we have maintained just below the leaders, the 6,500 to 10,000 circulation class, and considering the high quality of some of the vendors in that group we didn't find we were doing too badly. It became obvious, however, that the years were slipping by and that the dream might have to be left behind by a future generation.

Then, then, along came the unreal scare.

The rule of the press being an obviously fundamental to our free society and an eternally sensitive one, the concept that it found is necessary to expedient from time to time to fall to ourselves of a proclamation on the topic and my interpretation of it. A few examples since May 1 are appropriate and for this change:

Commodities on guaranteed terms

Newsweek, July 8, 1961

It is heartening to see the position of the Commodities Exchange Commission taken by the Kennedy Commission as Republicans, which are aimed at killing the futures operations of U.S. manpower such as "Time" and "Number's Digest".

These publications which insist on reading that type of protection [illegible] my discover as their source that they have misled their readership for a matter of privilege. For government protection is also government control and that would be dangerous to the liberal arts media.

Half a century ago, with only half the population of today Canada had almost twice as many weekly newspapers as exist today. We have, with a much smaller population, had two newspapers. The weekly was the only medium through which the rural population could be reached, but as it built additional circulating overweighed, lot of small advertising formed papers.

Then along came national and farm publications with their large circulations, and consequently many communities were for some factor of national advertising. With the loss of this revenue weeklies in one-paper towns were forced to change, and so many smaller communities, dropped out of the picture altogether. Competition was stepped up again with the advent of radio particularly in the days when it was confined to large cities and large licensing requirements, and now with television. The increased rural circulation of the daily press also had its effect.

Fifty years ago, the weekly editor's chief news source was the human daily newspaper from which he cut and rewrote the most important national and world news stories. Local and district stories, which they must have related, received secondary consideration, and were of a picture even simply reported.

But this was what was expected of the paper and everyone was happy until competing media found the weekly editorials in America's community.

Today the weekly press all but ignores the national and international news stories of the day, and weeklies itself as more comprehensive local coverage local features and editorials concerned with local problems. The one-it has served to the maximum weekliness of readers and advertisers alike. Circulations have climbed, and many papers have developed reputations in the community service theirs go far beyond their immediate circulation area.

It is weekly can serve its readers through display reviews of policy surely it is no less much to expect the modern national publications to do the same.

Freedom of the press

Canada, August 2, 1962

Lately, we have people anyone themselves on the subject of freedom of the press to a manner that suggests their understanding of it is somewhat like Congress conception of independence.

Freedom of the press, of course, is merely an extension of the principle of freedom of speech, which, we accept as the right of any person to voice his opinions without regard for how they may sit with anyone else.

Newspaper editors exercise that freedom through the unbiased opinions of their papers and being human, personal likes, prejudices, ignorance and even vindictiveness may be influence. Other writings. To the nature and they do go over a period of time the writing of the paper's pronouncements inevitably suffers in an inbreed anxiety.

Anyone disagreeing with the editor for the right to publish a letter or a statement in the newspaper and the editor asserting the over rights, may refuse to publish it. If and issues, and a widow from the present may purchase space in the publication to voice claims his own opinions and thereby vouch the same people that are involved by the editorial.

The idea of paying for the space might seem as a notion in those who think of freedom of the press as a statement of mind of newspaper space something like manufacturer, statement of record like — and in which it is necessary to exist and like in newspaper, running pay for the press; it runs to preserve opinion.

If the newspaper refuses to accept this advertising does not like really getting hypothetical any individual still the the right to print a number and like, what it is may say by you in. The is what freedom of the press is the right to publish or opinion is not limitation of presumption not an into an statement in private thereafter.

It should be remembered that freedom of the press the democracy — is an statement of journalism, the simply one of the safeguards which provide a people from being enslaved by in ones mistakes.

Condemnations

memorial, June 16, 1966

In a "viewpoint" published a few weeks ago in this press a local minister (a not irrational) levelled a barrage of criticism against outdoor merchandising and advertising methods. He questioned the sensitivity of many current practices such as manipulating small children playing poses hidden workmanship, and encouraging unwholesome

Parents and the practices only which exist in advertising, as in everything else, are good, the discretion a viewer become informed public better equipped to discover advertisements which should not have been appealing.

As public statements to convention advertising and merchandising practices develop, both will be considered on a higher plane.

Retail merchants, particularly those in communities like Mayberry have quickly and honest advertising is important if they are to remain in business in an area where they must depend on the same customers to purchase their items week after week, month after month, year after year. That is the kind use of the amount why trying may local merchants find their advertisements in the Review attractive, and a lot-to-the.

This, of course, is the time of the whole debate on advertising. The responsibility committee is in serious debate with the consumer's ability to read himself of his knowledge and it to use and advancement the contribution of merchandise — the sale of their product — like the entire advertising becomes the villain

Self-policing by the advertising industry seems to be inadequate, not the best and most effective policing of all will be done by consumers with enough their convictions, despite what type of advertising will be successful.

Press freedom, NDP style

memorial, July 14, 1970

According to press reports of the recent Saskatchewan New Democratic annual convention in Regina, a resolution was passed condemning media in NDP government, establishment of a commission to study media ownership concentration and codes and television centres and regional publishing facilities.

One of the reasons advanced for the resolution, according to the report, was because the NDP "has historically found it difficult to present its views and to minimize the public in the day-to-day work." Saskatchewan media is controlled by Liberals and Conservatives. Ironically the same convention report from it difficult to get space or coal for NDP views, had to deal with a resolution many months later denied the press from the convention.)

Two members which is meant by "continuously-owned regional advertising facilities." The press now operates without penalties and those in writing to deny an advertiser or a group the right to organize a publishing enterprise meant under the newspapers we are in a co-operative

Obviously the has not been found formally practiced where publishing facilities exist and the NDP proposed advertising facilities could exist only with heavy government subsidization, which it is now would control the private newspaper and automatically have only the state-controlled and financed medium.

That is precisely the point.

Voice of the union?

memorial, June 3 1971

A list of projects approved recently by the Canadian secretary of state for funding through the Opportunities for Youth program includes a $6 923-item "to enable seven ministers to publish 12 issues of the Prairie Fire during the summer, allowing organizations of interest the interchange, debate and ideas and each publish groups to express their problems."

My member other positions was used by the government is clarifying that it was important for these individuals to publish their viewpoints on public issues.

And then there are the groups whose positions the Process Fix proposes (according to the release) to suppress. Why are they so opposed? Who has decided, and on what authority, that their problems are not sufficiently aired by the London Post and other publications, provincial and national available to the people of England. And are these groups the ones needed to city councils, the provincial legislature and the federal Parliament as effective citizens now?

We're getting a bit wary of the modern-challenged managerial and the problems of those groups outside forms of rehab.

Why is it right to subsidize the price of cars of the unemployed, the use the thousands of employed purpose who help find the fix for the farmer? Why is it more important to publicize the view of the lawyer than that of the landlord, who, moreso knows has lots of problems? And how do we know such a newspaper will actually discuss issue? to the causes raised, in whether this is really closer to public than to corporate vested political views to the exposure of the majority?

The issue involved may exist; like a small thing to grips about, the is to only a short step from a most unlikely to non-owned, state-controlled newspapers, and the end of press freedom in all

Danger to press privilege

editorial, March 15 1973

Freedom of the press is not and should not be the privilege of those who happen to be in the publishing or broadcasting business, but a simple and basic right of all citizens of speech; and in no way and it was lawful to make a written statement of fact or opinion in friends, acquaintances, a stranger on the street, or to the policeman in the corner is in and ought to be lawful to say the same thing in print whether through a circular delivered from door to door or through a town meeting reaching all, more, it is and ought to be lawful whether disseminated by the publisher through his newspaper, by the individual citizen writing a letter to the editor of a publication or by an individual in a group of individuals using a paid advertisement.

In our opinion, special privilege simply writes the operative the meanings of persons who may gather and disseminate information, and and would be the end of the of the press and eventually freedom of speech.

Freedom of speech and of the press are indeed so precisely but they are best promoted by safeguarding existing rights of all. Special laws — can through special protection of the media.

Dangerous to sell

editorial, April 12 1978

As publisher of the Review, we have to write to many advertisers in our routine solicitation of business, knowing in opposing any intention in a most unreasonable manner. Yet the universal conditions would not be permitted to buy space or solicit to reply. This is freedom of the press?

Think about the at things carefully and ask yourself whether this intention upon freedom of speech is really in the national interest, and how necessary those laws were enacted

Counsel, citation advertising becomes necessary. Not if we simply cannot meet the various tests. Let's the down on the official decision period. To compare upon the freedoms of public citizens and groups to advertise minor irritants in classrooms to sell.

The Cowichan Community sun effort prove on which the Review and about right other conditions in Spa Antichrome monthly municipalities are regularly printed

2. Weyburn, Saskatchewan

A disheartening beginning

For a few seconds I could cheerfully have killed the little old man smiling — leering, I thought — at me across the booth table at the old Kingsley Pies Restaurant.

It was fall of 1953 with the dust blowing as I had never seen it blow (nor had I seen it since) for many years by the old timers who had lived in Saskatchewan during the Dirty Thirties! I had only been in Weyburn for a few months, and had come here in spite of dire warnings from Irena's brother Eugene Dorheim, that we were going straight to the dust bowl.

It was a busy Tuesday morning, and as if the unbelievable dust wasn't hard enough to take, Edward G Quick, my predecessor as publisher of the Review had chosen this morning to come in and asked me to join him for a cup of coffee across the street. I had protested that I didn't have time, but he had insisted it would do me good. Not smiling, to offend the guest, solid manners of gentleman I had agreed

But like the proverbial horse led to water I couldn't be coaxed into the comfortable overhaul session one associates with coffee break. Instead I looked gloomily out of the window at the gray blizzard which almost obscured the buildings across the street.

That's when Mr Quick smilingly asked "Well Ernie, what do you think of it now?"

That a whom I graciously hated him for a few seconds. That's when I would have strangled him. It's all right for you to sit there smiling, I felt like saying. You've unloaded the Review and I'm stuck with it and this godforsaken little burg that gets lost in dust storms.

I replied to what I hoped was a unbeaded term "Mr Quick, if I had only seen anything like this, nothing could have induced me to come here."

He gave a little chuckle and said with a twinkle in his eye: "This is smiling. You should have seen it when I came here."

For the first time that day I took my thoughts off my troubles and did some thinking and rethinking.

I knew Mr Quick was 72 years old. I knew he had owned the Review for 22 years. I knew he had four children. I knew Mr Quick had been shrewd out of a little town called Youngstown in Alberta. And I must discard out. He hadn't even been able to sell his little weekly newspaper. He had just closed the door, put the sign up selling his old press and typewriter for what little they might have been worth, and left with his family for an itinerary somewhere

The unexploited Kapitalismus, a businessman pointed out, had operated the Youngstown Plain-dealer for almost two decades before being licensed by drought and dispossession to clean his doors. He was 50-years-old, had a wife and family and little else – and this year was 1936 – still the depth of depression and drought in Weyburn — a bra in task over the Revlex from an Egyptian who had been enough and seemed to get his paper. Weyburn and Saskatchewan all felt lonely.

Unable to reconcile the paradoxes I asked "Mr. Quick whatever made you do it?"

Still smiling he held aside the cantaloupe he was eating "I knew this was good country. I knew it would come back."

I suddenly saw Kitman to a man and a woman fight. Here was a man who had taken his chances on Weyburn and Saskatchewan after his own soil-bank, at age 50, with a family to feed. And I also realized at that moment that it was no coincidence that he had insisted on giving me coffee with an orchid-dark morning.

This local companionate man had realized what double must be standing on, and had grossly led me to the lessen of his own experiences. I have thought gratefully of the incident as many times as my three decades in Weyburn have shown me how keen-hearted and wise most people inevitably have seen their share of drought low with grace fullness, grasshopper infestations, overproduction and the many other nonsense that come up to bedevil dryland farmers and those whose living depends on their harvests.

Also 17 present

interview July 10 1975

This will always be a very special time of year for me for July 2, 1931, was the day I came over the Weyburn Hill to live.

Little was we to know that was to be the first week of July came through with some pretty hot days as the weather could serve as a reminder of my five days of trying to fill the role of editor in a community where I didn't know a soul.

That was a hot, dry summer, 1931, with heat and drought turned soldier and unpardoning men before it. Several farmers were stopped enough for me to shape of our customers drinks and even coupons without a license granted that long hard year in 1931.

I said that my new small family belonged in disgrace of my financial home before joining me in Weyburn, as it was a pretty lonely time, as those days you could be sure to without being counted as with the local and suffering who woke up on the first Sunday in Weyburn that ever-so-hot street home to the dis-pensary of having a cent and a prayer to our breakfast.

Of course, Mr. Quick was right. This is good country and it does come back

The foregoing will establish I am so to that my afternoon for Weyburn could not be called by any stretch of the imagination a state of love a first sight. Rather compliance and the air of pessimism engendered by three dirty-hungry, one of the feeling of strangeness in being on a community quite different from any previous experience.

Growing up in a small town should have prepared me for Weyburn and in many ways it did. Yet there were fundamental differences between Steinbach, Manitoba, and Weyburn, Saskatchewan, that did not make for quick assimilation of course, two years of living in big cities also hadn't done either.

While Steinbach had a unique nature within the context of the overall Canadian scene, Weyburn, in contrast, always strikes me as a microcosm of Canada, more particularly Western Canada. The Manitoba community a village sixty years old, was solidly settled itself three on an ambition — culturally, religiously and ethnically — from its best environment, discouraging its young citizens from evolving fame and fortune. Weyburn by contrast, drew first and foremost from North American people and community themselves and has since this society and offered its young to the building of the young nation

Weyburn was a product of what has been described as the greatest migration in human history the settlement of the North American west. Like most Western Canadian towns it grew at the turn of the century around the commercial magnet of railway depot and grain delivery point, and at a few years — in 1903 — qualified for it was granted a charter as a town Only ten years later for by the boom of western settlement and the great prosperity of the times, it was ready to be chartered as a Saskatchewan city Weyburn actually had the required 5,000 inhabitants has been questioned and likely would not have stood close scrutiny but the people built well past this foundation, and the community has always been respected among Saskatchewan's group of small cities

Granted, the establishment of a large provincial mental hospital here in the early 1920s its dominance as a local industry and the stigma then attached to the presence of such an institution, did affect how the city was perceived elsewhere in the province. Many people imagined life in Weyburn to be a virtual and constant lockdown.

However the hospital also contributed very substantially so Weyburn as a community integrated with the Canadian level of sophistication Innovative programs introduced and developed at So Weyburn hospital marked a progress in the North American psychiatric community As well the hospital's need for professional help and the transient nature of impacted professionals exposed the young community at greater diversity of culture and opinion than a remainder in small towns The associated training school for psychiatric nurses also brought to students from many backgrounds many of whom remained here as hospital staff, or married into local families.

If mention of innovative programs raises protest pictures I'll mention two that have been felt throughout the continent, and indeed the world — for better or for worse Witness that the first experiments with the tuberculin-type drug LSD were carried out heavily Dr Humphrey Osmond subdirector of the Saskatchewan Hospital Weyburn in the late 1950s together with his wife and his brother-in-law and colleague, Dr Jan Clancey Another was the resettlement of the Weyburn hospital's population into halfway houses in their own communities in the mid-1960s My approval of these particular initiatives may be qualified but it must be admitted they were inevitable paternalist efforts they were well-intentioned

World War I with its drain on both human and material resources, slowed things down temporarily so it did throughout the nation. The Roaring Twenties ushered in a decade of optimism opportunity and progress and so it has been for at always held by developments on New York's Wall Street, which precipitated a economic depression that efficiently took care of most of the 1930s. In the Palliser Triangle which at reasons Weyburn the depression years were accompanied by a severe drought with effects that were well beyond the economic.

The advent of World War 2 quickly drew the people of Weyburn into a partnership with the rest of the country in the preservation of the liberalism was its history Local men and women quickly responded to the nation's call and served, often with distinction, in all branches of the Canadian armed forces.

Two things probably enhanced Weyburn's credentials as a disaster partner in the war effort than the average community The establishment of a Secondary Flying Training School as part of the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan just outside the city gave the people of Weyburn an all-exposure for much of the war at hundreds of young men whose families were experiencing war in their land. This exposure would not have helped but fine-tune the city's natural sensitivities too with the war

There on a fateful day in August of 1942 units of the South Saskatchewan Regiment took part in the Dieppe Raid which has variously been described as a colossal strategic blunder as a necessary prologue at the eventual opening of the second front, and as a tactical probe with it cannot minimise of great sensitivity. Watchkeepers must, indeed, a heavy toll, since the 2939 completed brigade of men recruited in Weybury, Estersea and other circumstances to the service of the province.

The throughout Canadian, and for several years, more Canadian forces were of many as the summer, the telegraph of regret become all too familiar as Canadian concentration large and small. But few small centres were introduced so suddenly and ruthlessly in the realities of war. Weyes was probably no one in Weybury who was not personally acquainted with a number of the men who had been wounded, were captured or in the distinguished themselves in Dieppe and nearby villages. On the seven men in the skies over Britain and Germany and in the battlefields of France, the Netherlands and Germany now from the Weybury area distinguished themselves in war and many did not return to enjoy the rewards of the triumph of freedom and democracy.

"Green Beach"

Saturday, August 5 1976

One of the most fascinating books I have read in many years and to be "Green Beach" by James Lucas.

It was brought to me by Rev. Bob Jones of Weybury, and I have to confess, until I started, until I got into the book, not what the events was all James Milmore is one for: from time to time he often told a reunion in the service are always among us in their uniforms, and this occasion was no exception. He knows it, of course, and knowing keeps for better than I know dangerous probably took it for granted and I would read the opening and closing chapters and would then tell Mary on the first opportunity that would and it was wonderful and inspiring, and the 'if only he had told me' and some people in his service, he would include in home-piece.

Well surprise in was and failed by a book, and I read the whole thing, with hesitation. I presumed that description for a long time, because my first chapter "unpleasant," name slightly one of August in 1976.

The book was a blow-by-blow account of the Allies and on August 9, '44, where in many Weybury-Estersea men, boys and men lives in World War 2 — and which many have carried on a mind ever for the Normandy invasion two years later but continued by surviving veterans in a number of chapters.

... and all and made, a few years ago a return home in the daily pains recorded for the first time and the Dieppe raid without the Peterville version of it, and this is where the 8BB was involved ... was and in with a could-not-bigger miracle and would defy the imaginations of fiction writers today.

The story was confirmed as "Green Beach, which, while taking into consideration and fully confirming the broader purposes of the raid, also gives an intimate account of the personal adventures of one Jack Nonentheil, an RAF radar expert who devised a machine-turbine and went ashore with the 8BB as an aide-de-camp to be called in German radar systems.

What made his case so intense was and he was accompanied at all times by a battle of 8BB men and joined or protect him and could take a every step of the way to make sure and he did not fall into enemy hands under any circumstances because of his knowledge of British radar technology. The date and he was known at the time what the Germans wasn't aware of as Iron Cross quadrangular a Germany did not really the greatest and much under the RAF flight sergeant.

Inside the course of the whole story the fact that the raid included so many names of people that there about and or and about in back copies of the Estersea Intelligencer England, Kobaly Marine Mercury, Cross, Canoe Pick Stream — gave in almost a personal significance even those who were Weybury and Dieppe was already called into the very adventure to accept, and to particularly and was in the history in World War 2 fact.

Historical interest Canada a few years ago to help the Allied invasion a few book, and the more intimate notes perhaps in its own revolutionary service into Germany.

... we were in Regina, but tragedy ... 8BB radio were of Calgary, in turn, Edmonton, and Jack and ... tailed man to take us to our first experience ... was a school last pre-talk, the classes based our names and home ... we were English, why and we were and he gave us his story. Jack Longridge — and explained and he had landed with the South Saskatchewan Regiment a Peterville.

"You know one thing?" he went on. "There means English guy from a radar expert. How does it our people were going to work in it of them was any talk to his falling into German hands. I have taken thought this out, wonder what happened in this?"

With the book left in the trade story.

A Royal Canadian Navy frigate the HMCS Weyburn, has been announced the city's administration with the war. There were numerous contacts between the ships and the city and there was a real sense of loss when the ship went down with heavy losses of personnel, even though none of the ship's crew came from Weyburn.

Wesley represented Weyburn as a microcosm of Canada and particularly Western Canada, I must qualify this with the seeming contradiction that Weyburn was not a typical western Canadian settlement.

A high percentage of pioneer towns were settled by people from one ethnic background as another who were dedicated consciously or otherwise to isolating and insulating those groups and their traditional lifestyles. Weyburn, by contrast was settled first by Saskatchewan people from settlements along the CPR main line, then by a large contingent of eastern Canadians, followed soon by an emergence of American settlers. Next here by the available free land and urban amenities. Europeans who emigrated here directly from the Old World tended to come in families or as individuals, to homestead or become part of farm labourers or homemade as to work as the railway. Often they joined relatives if ready-made ones. While there surely must have been little ethnic pockets, they were generally too small to be noticeable or to have establish leadership and independent national social institutions.

Churches which often drew persons of approximate national or ethnic stamp may have done the opposite here because the major ones were not dominated by individual ethnic groups. The Roman Catholic Church for instance had parishioners of French, German, Polish, Dutch, Hungarian and other backgrounds including some of the American and Ontario settler. The Lutheran Church ministered to German and Scandinavian immigrants, as well as an English-speaking ministered of the same religion. The United Church of Canada formed from unions of the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches shortly after World War I became a catch-all for many Protestants whose religious views not represented here strongly enough to build their own churches.

So little is the Weyburn to which we came a bubble dozen years after the end of World War I. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the inhabitants have resolved to my mind out of original impressions tempered by the hindsight of over 30 years of exposure to the community and the evolution, pursuit of local historian (sometimes as opposed to) professional and even typewriter), personal involvement in numerous historical sections, and reading countless stories in back issues of the Review.

World War II had been over long enough to permit confidence in agriculture, the long-range weather pictures and in a strong national economy that might even surpass that part of Canada. All this was tempered with some caution and distrust on the part of the prosperous pioneers but there was no gainsaying the attitudes from the recently discovered Western Gold Rush beginning to find their way into local coffers through diverse sources.

Distrust outbreaks still smoldered in 1945, among sprinkling of the rugged individuals who fled settled the area and whose characterization helped to shape the community. A book just on these personalities would have been a challenging undertaking for a love writer I have been able to touch on just a few of them.

He paid the Piper! So he didn't owe anything
ATHENE April 7 1939

You can say Pete Hunt and Beatrice Sutherland was, and you'll only be exaggerating the slightest bit, as there is anyone in this corner of the province in where but very penniless and shrewd, unscrupulous men and something, there's a good chance that he's a solid something for him.

Twenty In July and with probably more than a thousand settlers now behind him, Pete has sold everything there is to sell and a lot of things and usually more than hundreds of miles fish which he claimed their extent a good Liberal, and kept his sentimental reasons.

It is said, and Pete admits it, and he can spot a bad bushel of one of the bidder's needs, and once a successful customer now claimed that all he had done was send an applicant on Pete, and the next thing he knew was "Sold!"

Calvin S. Horn, who is known as "Pete" by nearly everyone in the territory is pretty proud of the popularity which he knows has not become of their dealings with clients and business alike.

"Friendship stops when the rule must in dealings and highest ledger rules it I've never played favorites."

His secret of maintaining says Pete and he can give it away without having a fraid of competition — is to keep things moving with a flow of clients and a quick answer as a dispersing customer. And you town to build your cottage? If you can't control that, you can't control a town!"

But the greatest battle in the history of a town he established in the peninsula of the county of Grey.

"I can tell with the first shot," he avers, "how the whole job's going to go, and how well. Most the setups, if he's good—if it's good rock, first shot, it isn't."

While his Hurst mills, Meaford, Owen Sound, Midland, he can remember equally well countless sales, especially during the early election, when he didn't take home a cent. With always a real spec article to sell for people down on their luck, he relished in change-of-heart incidents or others where he considered down and out.

Recalling the first article he says it was for a woman whom he found was sick or hospital. "I went in the room and he asked me for articles on the house. I said—and was the only thing, and he just closed his head.

The canny auctioneer after learning his client extended to get only $1,000 out of the sale persuaded him to agree to his cash sale. After the sale he returned to the hospital, gave me his address expression and when to the room agreed.

"Well, how did the sale go?" he asked me. "The very good, I said here. "Not good at all. "That's what I figured," he said out, and added how much he thought.

"Why, he mumbles I believe you where I held him it had brought here $3,500 — $1,500 more than he I hoped for," shouted Ben. "And now you all can save many dreary existence in the provision—and to me you have I'll make out with the sale."

Ben's case for auction industries dealt in the early eighteen, and in very much responsible for his migration to Saskatchewan from his native Barrie, Ont.

He went to play hockey from school to go on motor bike, and to ride on horse. Now he rides his motor on the bicycle and he likes another of the happy whip, and odds-and-ends used to sell here to go work.

His interest soon before he competed at, for his first campaign which had "Tired of people" by his own house in a week for playing hockey the number needs it and—and Ben found he must be home-made.

Undaunted although broke, he decided to go west, and was induced to try municipal secretary's office by a man that said "Louis."

"I meant here Louis," chuckles Ben Pete, "but didn't know that and my way. I asked the secretary how going was they differs. That took me to Weyburn, where a number of local folks and started. I got a job as a hunt, and was able to send him back the money at the end of the season."

Pete worked at whatever came along until the time was when he entered in late 1930 business. He must do some but never realized Pete's, as a severe attack of influenza in hospital kept him for months. He remembers one moment when he knew finally being sent back to Canada.

After the war is in better, the late P. H. Hunt, early a few years ago dean of the University of Toronto College of Pharmacy, introduced Pete to a well known pharmacist.

"I had only to get used, he recalls, "and the man said I would have a position and lawyer; but I was terrified to start studying law. He suggested I be a comedian, or a travelling salesman, but could be only a hall.

"What are you interested in doing?" he asked me and I said him I had always wanted to be an auctioneer. Here's every change your mind, he said and—and I never have

After exhibiting to a few his models and a small practice said in Toronto "just no" could call again if he considered. My there returned to Weyburn, hung out his shingle, and two hours following his mate over there.

The biggest job of his career came when the federal government engaged him to sell a former million dollar wealth of cotton goods in Saskatchewan, at a fee of about $600 per day.

Here, too, Ben showed everything in his life, there was more than ever like you by it was a liberal government, and Hunt, though was a strong Tory (Tory "was once called Tory, or Whigs").

After leaving Bank stunned by he and Liberals that he had very little chance of getting the job Pete claims, he went to Ottawa determined himself as a man who thought the right way and should get the job, and began the series of a local Liberal Register.

Besides being the only auctioneer in Weyburn for many years, Pete is lastly for Lumber up a short career was then many a job as conversion unit to set up the livestock parade at the Weyburn fair. Knowing most farmers within miles, he would add a comment about the man he used and his feats, so he gained with "Ben" meaning much.

In the days before radio and television brought the latter into people's homes, daily Ben was the news a reminder on auctions day to keep up with a wire service and set up a public address system outside, streets which large crowds would gather to hear the latest national and local stories.

In the interests, the interpreter would hand the bidders; to Pete, who would read them over the loudspeaker.

He hasn't soon forget the time when secretary noise began the Liberals showed on early vote and he, unable to consult himself, toured into the rifle "How he can do it — I cannot see making it again."

Ann ann whom We are We about the always been closely associated with that of the farmers, it was natural that he should show a deep interest in their affairs, such as that of the Agricultural Society. He was on the field board from 1925, the latter he advertising committee chairman, stationary for the staff while for two years, and still on honorary director.

Meeting his Waterloo later in life from inside the Rotary marched Bertha Tubb in 1926. Those three daughters are all in Weyburn, although the youngest — 5-year-old Brenda, attending an outside local, story go on Victoria as an economy for lodging in figure studying. The home two are nursing, Miss Betty Bruce, and Isabella Low Miss Mary Beale.

With the end in first year Mr. Bruce became in entire from the lodging business in manufacturing. As 70 he's certainly entered the rest, but those who know him well believe it when they see it.

A luxurious hospital bin here

RELEASED April 16 1930

Fairly luxurious as the English for hound Weyburn, a hotel have quickened as an odd cans installed the lodging herbarians that were at Trantlow to him on the point of his hand as his own house nearer as a place where his wares is overwritten with "pressor" that "continuously lodder."

The George Bowdoin, among the first settlers of the district and connected to the years that followed with every single project which made Weyburn what it is today, traces the rise of the hotel for in the span of 66, fourteen eight years of residence in the hotel district of Nevada, he had landed in the city when it for that believed to make was the place where he would find to spread the twilight years of the life

And with every summer sun, that every Southern sentiment in the country he passed in the way home, came a recovery of the joys memory triumphs, Trantlow scenes and some that are no longer with us, to keep life in a new city a new province, that a new mission.

Born at Jefferson We. the son of one of the first Manufacturer in the state, he vanished seven years of his early years on an Iowa farm, as the elder Bowdoin and in grew up his mode for success of locals whom George sent only as and moved to a farm in the Hawkeye State.

There he might have stayed, helping his father run the farm, that managing a township cattle of his own, but for a railway trip in a society town in 1901 that haunted the state life, that easy hints almost the history of a good deal of our province of Saskatchewan, especially the city of Weyburn.

Sitting in the resort, the eye was caught by a pointed pamphlet. "Why it must We picked up, read it and was immediately sold on the western Canada that its underlodged purpose which was described in such glowing terms in the real estate circular that closed with the statement "Go West Young Man

"I'm going to Canada" he announced the same day in a travel was managed a berth as the same he had travelled in.

"Where?" the amiable wanted to know

"Just as soon as I've finished two is more years remaining before have to do M. travelled said how and travelled with a Saskatchewan partner for the trip

As he then planned, the Bowdoin completed the fall harvesting, toured the threshing outfit, visited the friend that he was on the way throughout they came to Weyburn and bought several pieces of land in the Primrose district.

Mr. Bowdoin stayed here for several months for year the Saskatchewan weather elements was this time handled by a prospect the of the more he opened he came back to Weyburn bringing with him a team of 30 white-faced Hereford cattle, believed to be the first of the breed imported to the province.

Mr. Bowdoin's cattle stood this part of his life well the prospect of the increase, on the mystery of the two dogs, which seems destined to remain unsolved for all time.

It seems that he brought with him from home his dog, a mongrel collie which was so well trained that he won the Bowdoin's pride and joy. Somewhere en route but the dog came pet on the train where he begged to and strangely throwing was whimpering and refusing to eat

The mistake the least of his former was opened in Weyburn, he continued on, travelled known a house set the fence the season and losses of crowding failed to bring him out.

The individual gave no finally, deciding that enemies was half a mile out on the prairie the dog would come howling after him. Each day he rode the entire morning the elements of the dog, did everything the dog appeared and after a few Bowdoin gave, Mr. Bowdoin was fully prepared for a nerve-racking trip.

Suddenly, out of nowhere, a dog stopped by him, got the hint of his, that carne back to it days of appeared the Bowdoin brought in first known his own dog, two when he came about discovered a team.

He gave the animal a pat on the head, as well as it were somewhat revealed in the form of a sandwich, and a note yesterday two formed. He said the dog for years, under successive from that owner over the same dog and where the new dog had come from but never knew one.

And I won't trying hard to find one," admits Mr. Bendell. He believes the dog was accidentally left behind when a carload of settlers made a stop in Weyburn.

All that summer, Mr. Bendell farmed another man's property from Weyburn to Fillmore over what later became known as the Bendell Trail. For the first time the first snowstorm came to fall, but a house finished immediately by plastering, and a cellar filled potatoes.

After several years Mr. Bendell moved to Weyburn. Saskatchewan where as horse trader and threshing machine operator, he had become one of the town's leading businessmen. His first step was land, when he bought a house and lot, and he later moved across the river to the present Bonne-Aventure subdivision.

Dealing in everything in the machinery line, Mr. Bendell made money a stack of 60 by 36 horsepower carboard houses in 1912, and selling every one of them.

Mr. Bendell was more than a businessman, he was a community builder, whose support and labors were responsible for every worthwhile project undertaken during his town's life.

When the old hospital (now Mount St. Mary) was built, Mr. Bendell, who owned the land, left the stacked shingles and piled the scantlings in neat little rows piles on the ground, and whenever they decided would be there with him.

When the call came in the fall was built Mr. Bendell's aid was sought again, as he mortared two bricks, finished a chimney to his specifications, and so two and a half days Weyburn had a new mill.

He was elected mayor at the first since held three and at time for many years thereafter. He was also on the fathers of the town's ways.

Long a member of council, Mr. Bendell served when all the provincial and federal politicians, management could be found in town.

Also during the 1908 election the Conservative defeated a veritable sea for the task of support from the press, for the old Weyburn Herald came out with two-inch headlines saying the electors to "Vote for Bennett," and almost every front-page story was on his opponent, ranging from jubilantly critical to downright libelous.

How many was headed "Liberal Candidate a Blasphemer Still" another "Bennett ——— Breaking Home Life Pledge," and a third "An Attempt to Steal the Seat." A story which provided no detail to might have been borrowed from the Calgary Sweepstake.

Undaunted Mr. Bendell's response to these fiery planks in his platform "I Vote against Bennett because he is a Conservative; I Vote against Bennett because he is a German; I Vote against Bennett because he is a Catholic; I Vote against Bennett because he is a Protestant."

Mr. Bendell's trusted attempt came in the 30s when he joined countless other Premier Bennett in defeat under a Liberal landslide. His comment on his defeat was short but typical: "It was a flood."

Of the long, eventful life behind him, Mr. Bendell has few regrets but would like to live it all over again, but specially adds "knowing what I know now."

In spite of his eighty-four years, Mr. Bendell finds himself anything but lonesome, for old friends have not forgotten him. When he arrived he was greeted by a group of acquaintances who had approached him even in a wednesday restaurant, and now...his home at the Regal, for in most days might be several of the old-timers who were here with him when the Soo Line was only spoken of.

Weyburn has changed since the day when George Bendell made his whole-hearted decision to stay with it, but it will always be home, and still always welcome and the man who made it.

Western Wire and Cable had been here a year in the hangars at the airport, vacated when the war wound down. Western Christian College had moved into airport buildings at about the same time. There was optimism that other industries could be attracted into other available hangars and a few outbuildings — notably Vern Laing — so that full employment would be this year.

On the civic scene council had approved a long-term program to pave most of the city streets but found a perceptible was the replacement of many of the water and sewage mains still in place from pioneer times. The short-term consequence was a lot of mud on the roads we drove and a lot of dust on the more common dry and windy days.

Negotiations were underway to sell the oil power plant operated by the city and nearly in need of modernization to the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. This was accomplished on this following year amid political turmoil that resulted in the resignation of Mayor Jim Sproxley. The city received $2 million for the electrical facility. Not only was the city relieved of further concern with the operation and modernization of the utility but what was then still considered a privately owned could be set aside to finance future capital expenditures.

A few weeks after our arrival in Weyburn the city police force, headed by ex-Mountie Jim McCardle observed its first anniversary. For years before that community policing had been handled, under contract by the RCMP.

Until the mid-1950s the education of Northern children was handled by the three-original elementary schools, Assiniboia, Saskatchewan and Alta, but the city's growth demanded expansion and a fourth public school, Elgin, had been added as well as St. Pancras Lower School for the recently organized Roman Catholic school district. Here too, Queen Elizabeth School was built for rural children, reflecting a growing trend toward centralized education. A private kindergarten was introduced in the early 1960s and in a few years this became part of the elementary school system

Product and vision of the century

REGINA, November 12 1959

Fifty years ago, the county-built country shelter of Saskatchewan threw its proud portfolio of the progressiveness of the 20th century. It progressiveness that demanded democratic for the life-blood of the gigantic, inherent she had to be sacrificed to obtain it.

Today shelving into a proud-shelved, neglected background, the students' hide and attachment in a victim of an entire century's pace, which builds, then quickly destroys, as students of another step forward.

Within living memory there schools were built by farmers, whose horses drew the lumber over muddy trails or dusted "shifting sand" and made happy gatherings out of days of hard work.

Then a school was Ministers, five miles' was of Western, and the establishment of its former students and the people who built it would be the first step of children formed hundreds of little schools in the countries which have faded from the sphere of usefulness.

Gone by 1964 it was learned from Marcuse, Ont., where many of the district's pioneers came from, and where were held school reunions every term that year. Since the central high school district was introduced. At one time there was as few as seven students enrolled in a county of 30 district Grid

It started with an elected school board which met the needs of all the children, each in return by the the lumber and where to borrow for money to finance the building that enough money was raised where the district. Later after the school area built, the student and so that a student used to decide in five or six miles.

The school was, in a sense, a community centre, as it was used for business meetings, parties and sometimes as a church. Christmas concerts and other parties were got out frequently in most country for a worthwhile project, and everyone in the community joined in and grew a hand.

Most of the work of planning in the days of the country school fell to the teachers and students. Teachers had to do their own janitor work such as shaking fires, washing windows, sweeping floors and keeping wood.

One of the happiest times for teachers was the social preparation for the Christmas concert. No school work would be done for at least two weeks and there would be lots of laughter and gaiety

Sometimes just one act in long hours the ceiling, and the daring "big boys" would climb on the plaster to do it.

In you asked any of the customers of the district in self of one has been connected with the administration of the school, they probably would mention the time the teacher made a mistake that "O Canada" not to sung in school. It seems to argued it was a French typos therefore deserved to a Canadian students mistake. the student was not accused.

It wasn't all the rosy picture of the school however and several near-tragedies resulted from lack of proper equipment or from work done by unqualified people.

In 1932 a burley student grew off flame which nearly engulfed pupils and teachers. School was ordered for student days inside the student was required and the victims recovered There were no school casualties.

In 1954, a fire started by the school when one of the students left a fire in the student Outside to get the fire started the fuel caught it with gasoline. The cast aroused to burn, and fire spread so the building where he was unable to get by the occupants and out.

As classes improved, reduced, the students attending than the school and in in the streets the school in the student neighbor's a phone the Wayburn fire department, which came and the fire was ignited. There was no loss damage in the building. Although the house were badly charred.

The school and quite a turnover in students, as a family moving even a few miles would in in student moved district. Often new families moved to school in January immigrants, whose children spoke not a word of English.

The students remember wonderingly and forgive the language barrier. Hay scrap bed any difficulty playing hand games, and exercise and hide-and-seek, painter's time, red light and other children games are remembered.

All grades were taught in one room by one student so it was in student that the students felt like one big happy family. Birthday games and the like were not complete unless the whole student body was there.

To the younger children, the visits of the school inspector were astonishing as he revealed in developed himself in work books and and books to see if they were neat. And he always was anxious to the desks in its drill work. The older students enjoyed the visits—if their books were to indicate they knew them well.

But the senior class was always on best behaviour on these days.

Interesting research in the operation of the school was looked after by the locally elected head, of course until he grew into more than his office by 1965. Many people thought the change was a good idea, but there were many against it although no one actually put up a fight.

The main objection was that they felt the retired head by the authority should belong to them.

School terms have been changed from the first year the school was opened. At first, the term was three April to December 1 with two weeks holidays in July. Gradually changes were made until the school reached its present September-to-July schedule.

Another thing that changed was the teacher's salary. In 1907 wages were 100 per month. Thirty-five children in there until the 30s many they dropped sharply, almost reaching the 100 level.

The largest school size is to share finished long ago and although accepted with misgivings, at some period by most.

But people of the district could remember many years ago the county schoolhouse whether scouring premises was not just where they changed over to the senior secondary modern system.

The Weybern Colliery's finish is spanned in the day of Weybern's inauguration as a city until agreed with the community a secondary educational needs, although with some additions in the original structure. Two junior high schools, with a total of 1,200 pupils and a comprehensive high school serving a larger area than just the city were not made in the future

By the time of our revival the a sensible had fully taken over in the standard mode of transportation. Hitching rails had disappeared from city streets, and livery stables were on more. A last reminder of the horse-and-buggy days were the horse-drawn milk wagons operated by Gordon Miller from a city stables can and a flower wagon and Norman Kochanik's familiar dray frozen by a number of horses.

Television was slowly creeping across the nation and with the opening of a Regina station, attention began to find their way onto Weybern residents to pick up fuzzy signals of wrestling matches and puppet shows. Distance between a clear contrast being what they are in this part of the country, it was only a few years later that a cable television company erected a receiving tower almost 1,000 feet high on South Hill, supplying the quality of reception increasing the choice of stations available and removing the jungle of antennas from the rooftops

Also-ran Weyb can on the 20th century accessory of electronic communications, a local radio station CFSL, had been on the air for just a year. Reluctance in the station in the opening chapter about in a villainous revel should be read as outside of a possible reason on my part. The Reviews and CFSL have been sometimes but complementary to each other have enjoyed excellent relations a all times and have worked together in many ways for a better Weybern. The founds and president Lorne Long, maintained my deepest respect, and he fought me many valuable lessons in my initiation a the business world

A number of local organizations had joined forces in an initiative to establish a park on the perimeter of the water reservoir formed on the Souris River southeast of the city a project known as Lawrence Sweet-Mile Dam. Also of work and been done with much of it not visible, and for a little it looked as though the whole project might be abandoned. Certainly the council of the day was not particularly unenthusiastic about it I like to think that the Review had a hand in keeping it alive until the provincial government stepped in and sometimes gave the recreational area new name — Nickle Lake Regional Park — and a new lease on life. Today people of the area could not imagine being without it.

The horse isn't leaving any

FROM AT September-17 1963

"The one local horse is some, but you can't make a dash the old village grow and we share concern that the needs of the city for R.C.M. of Weybern that the R.M. of requires the for purposes of increasing the Weybern Community Park, residents in very many of whom that we've."

Although the Review has been campaigning for a regional park agreement in several years, we have never received articles from the arrangement. Neither however were we prepared for a completely negative approach.

When the city first extensively explored the possibility of further with rural municipalities to form a regional park authority council showed its resistance by speaking on its representative the resolution who milit contest the next opposition to the park.

When, finally in spite of themselves, the three councils agreed to proceed (we use the term loosely), the ice was appointed in the province only because it suited only one person who had ever shown any interest in the park. The other five have five records of unanimity against and we have no doubt that we will receive the full value, and more, for every cent we contribute them.

Another regional park which has become popular throughout the Province was born about the week I arrived. The Metropolitan Regional Park was established to house Mickie's pioneer theatre, who had been many things besides leader of the community.

Unleashed rewards

EDITORIAL June 16 1959

Man love not in fact good the acquisition of a suitable failure — or let us rather understand that good only as mortar whether it was worth the trouble into the chief hard work.

Last summer held a century ago, when young Dr. William Graham Ridgetown opened his practice in Mickie, prescribed for him the course he has followed and promised him in return a path named in his honor. It only he assumed that the district would have turned down the offer of a moment of glory in return for the boon of more fees.

A week ago, when southern Saskatchewan turned out three thousand strong, to dedicate the Ridgetown Community Park, Mrs. Margolin the woman who has lived the doctor' genius to his dedicated enthusiasm, collected quite correctly the first and received their reward in the friendship of the community, and that the wearing of the park was a glorious generous token.

These were not empty words, just in the naming of the park was not an empty gesture.

To the members of the committee which planned the park 30 years ago naturally had considerably very unanimous approval. It wasn't merely the gesture of an idea which brought them fame; it was a deliberate thought into needed only viewing to take immediately approved. It had its origin in their genuine love for a man and for Mickie, which was the essence of what the Margolins considered their reward for their work.

Which brings us back to again

What would the doctor's goal?

We can only guess but it was the knowledge that he was doing the very best he could, every day and century circumstances.

Their were no easy tasks would he ought have told "No, and rewarded the contrary judge him was basically and to do the opposite.

But being his own judge made it more difficult had the thousands who now had acknowledge the appreciation required to give man and town his due.

We believe, in you, Dr. and Mrs. Margolin that you have your reward. But we could whether anyone issues have much of a them is.

It is difficult to improve on anyone today the situation found every summer by parents on the days when polio was still a constant, perhaps but weather threat. Who wanted to be deprived of the treat of an afternoon at the park just because there was an infinitely small chance of contracting the crippling disease? Yet who wanted to expose children to the dreadful consequences of polio? So children, for the most part — most and took part in other group activities while parents in unison sat and fret by the fervent prayers them. Then in the late 1950s, along came Dr. Jonas Salk and the era of vaccine that wiped out the disease on this continent and removed at least one source of parental misery.

Tommy Douglas, who had stood his partnership in Weyburn's Calvary Baptist Church as a springboard in becoming, eventually, Canada's first Socialist premier, was still a familiar figure on city streets and particularly at community functions. He had first been elected in the old federal Weyburn riding to the House of Commons for the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF), holding the seat until 1942, when he had resigned to take the leadership of the provincial party. In the 1944 general election his party was swept to power, and he never forgot the city that gave him his political start and the people — his congenial personality and persuasive powers had gained him a large following — who had given him those unwavering support.

It was only a few years after our arrival that an old theme of Tommy Douglas, universal free medical care and hospitalization was introduced amid great controversy. By this time Douglas had accepted the national leadership of the New Democratic party successor to the CCF and there were continuously held before the Saskatchewan electorate plus — Canada first — and those factored along just a bit to strengthen the Douglas image unilaterally. A strike by the medical profession marshalled antidotes and barricade that left the mark for decades, but the plan became the model for a national medicare scheme. Few Saskatchewan people today would stand for its removal, and politicians of all parties make very sure they are firmly on the side of the angels on that question.

Hockey and skating in Weyburn were still limited to several outdoor rinks and the old Barley Arena Rink with its unreliable natural ice. The curling rink also with natural ice, was attached to the Arena Rink.

It was also in the late 1950s that an organized effort was begun to build the Cobbenzee and a new curling rink with artificial ice by land on the old campgrounds. It wasn't long coming to fruition and brought junior hockey to the fans of the Weyburn Beavers in the 60s Weyburn.

Recreation was still much confined to towns and small cities in the 1960s. It was in 1963 that Al Hewson was hired for a two-year trial period as Weyburn's first recreation director — at a salary of $5,000. When you look at the recreation programs we have today it is difficult to imagine anyone ever managed to live on less organized or co-ordinated times.

Rev. Harris Harrow, who lost his life in the ministry in favor of writing more paper columns and fiction was writing United Church and downtown life interlarding so those days with a fiery paranoia laced with humor and scorn. Instead of the fire-and-brimstone speech the visionary seemed of Moses Steed. Weyburn's power and backbone of Harrow's sermons and his brief century was the political arena to a city statesman, he probably opened some eyes of tourists in the sanded opening, but he didn't always in any long running to matter the results. Every so often, the announcer Rose McMurtry was pastor of the church for about thirty years and a no less known to name some luckless, but he hung on, either tacitly confident in the service he a no passing along or in his ability to come up with some announceable for the times, and guaranteed to provoke thought.

Speaking of characters, it seemed that the small town national world at those days was dominated by characters. About could be written just about the individuals who run the butcher shops, drug stores, garages and machine shops of a few decades ago.

Although grand highways were still very much the rule in the late 1960s Highway 39 and 6 between Weyburn and Regina and received some sort of surfacing — perhaps oil — about 1968. This may have been a plans for joining Tommy Douglas into the provincially. When I arrived those highway had already been blacktopped, and Highway 13 east to Stoughton was being prepared for surfacing.

Traffic between Weyburn and Regina was still relatively light, probably in part because most people still tended to regard the trip, in those times, with a one-hour drive as during travel. The two-car family still wasn't the norm, and even single-car families had not yet to developed the imagination to eliminate walking back, for a period, assumed to be part of the North American psyche. In the two years that the Kramers remained in the Mitchell Block after we came to Weyburn, for instance, I rarely only stuff members (out of curiosity), to drive a car in the office. A few others owned cars but used them only sparingly during leisure hours. Twenty years later a few the second Revlers some was inside to the East and South locations we provided a parking lot with spaces, just about equal to the number of staff members and even then a few always parked on the street

Sometime during the next twenty years blacktopping of Highway 13 from Stoughton to Carlyle was completed, giving Weyburn residents easier access to their resorts at White Bear Lake and Kenosee the same highway a no easy, also upgraded and surfaced from Carlyle to the Manitoba border, providing all-weather access to Winnipeg

The International Parks Highway Association, which promoted a non-combined (586) good-quality highway from southern Saskatchewan (through Weyburn) to the Montana border and beyond probably helped bring about siting and blacktopping of Highway 39 from this city to the U S border and later some form of continuing north in the Trans-Canada Highway. The 586 organization faded away somehow but now recently has been replaced by the Assiniboia-Big Sandy Association, promoting a north-south highway system better geared to meeting traffic patterns and needs.

In the mid-1950s the Red Coat Trail organization was founded to establish an alternate route from Winnipeg to British Columbia, following Highway 13 through Saskatchewan. This group helped bring about straightening of Highway 3 west of Moosejaw to the Alberta border and connecting it with a new stretch of highway on the Alberta side. This and resurfacing of the Weyburn mall, also led to blacktopping of Highway 13 west beyond Frobisher and siting or surfacing of other numerous sections.

Events seem to distort, unless one has been a mixed bloomer. The good roads era is basic for the traveller but less so for the small town members who own his customers washing oil in Regina and other cities. Weyburn's mall is a product of the late 1950s, was a modern convenience in this round, purporting to offer district people one-stop shopping under one roof without going in fair-off cities. That hurdle, of course, has yet to be overcome.

The local airport a legacy of World War 2 also affected Weyburn's contact with the world, bringing in small aircraft from either throughout the continent.

Oil fields developed in Southeastern Saskatchewan in the 1950s gave a new dimension to the economic base of the district and the city and again affected new blood into the community.

This perhaps is a "through a glass darkly." In a glimpse of the Weyburn we found in 1950 and I hope the editorials columns and features reprinted herein and hereafter, offer an insight into the Weyburn of the 1960s through the 1980s the people of the community and their collective experiences and industries.

What's happening"

Remonstrance, March 23 1961

"What happening to Weyburn."

Above title examiner people asked themselves this question last week after learning that meeting that the city police force that has maintained for a mole of people whose utter contempt for constituted authority is 8 matter not to be taken lightly.

It was difficult to believe that this was a quite agricultural community as news by the standard of any provincial or Saskatchewan — for the matter, in the gang war that of a group which had enjoyed harmony for so long time to members were targeted by the murderous of the city police.

It is doubtful, too, whether the cause of law and order was helped by the fact that a score of civilian males simply looked on while their opponent to protect them fighting a losing battle.

The situation was finally brought under control when members of the RCMP appeared on the scene, this it is interesting to note that the Mounties shall were empty-handed. They carried night-sticks and didn't even have to use them.

Strangely however the police were anything but subdued after they had been locked up in cells in the police station. They continued to laugh about their status in their quarters, even after the supreme magic being appeared to be the hand of their enemy.

Even in police court next morning they were hardly the picture of wayward youth constantly living headlines. The courtroom was filled with their buddies, and only the request of judgement, even seemed to be unduly worried.

It was brought out in court that most of the youths involved and previous convictions, that they were continually appearing before the court on the week of the police force was continually being hampered by the fact that they were constantly having in court the same persons at all hours of the night. It made an element in maintaining law and enforcement in communities and whenever apprehended in these hours dentists have shut up light.

Sentences have been passed and the case is now closed. except in the minds of those of us who are wondering what part of contemporary our children are growing up into under what heirs to oppress relief then is no journey in real society, it seems to be other way around it is the small town father wavering about how evil that might be his sons in the city.

The police that the court have served notice that the sort of thing will no longer be tolerated. Night-sticks to be been ordered for city policemen, and belligerents blindfold in handing out prison terms in last week's defendants seemed reminiscent of their gang that this should give them a measure of what to expect

But the police and the courts can do only so much. They can enforce the laws, but they cannot, alone, arouse any support for law and order. For this they need the support of the public and especially the press.

Fair correction as are doubtful about how much good the two months sentence in any other manner—will do the double threat, passion not already going actional requiring the gangs treasons and the police are picking on them. What law-abiding citizen finds the police picking on him. They've got too many things to do. Magistrate McCaul disposed of that argument very ably when he remarked that "the police have many right, but it is their duty to exercise any other rights continually in fact of his home between midnight and 6 o'clock in the morning."

Of course we can expect a hue and cry the first time a member of the police force uses his night-stick. This will be helpful especially as "police brutality" has it as up as an issue by the police in their effort to effect a clean-up.

And incidentally we are right support first the police should feel free to act, for real issues

Experiences are and the public

Saturday, October 3 1964

During the past year or two, the Saskatchewan Hospital in Weyburn has been engaged in a rehabilitation program which has drawn the attention of the psychiatric profession across the nation.

The net result of the program — which will be more permanently established in the near future — is that a number of the patient population the hitherto produced by normal backlands. The discharged patients whose treatment is considered to have improved to a point where they are temporarily or permanently capable of getting along without hospitalization, are in large of the community although still under observation by hospital staff.

This has not, inevitably to increase the size number of other residents to which Weyburn and those just since the establishment of the Saskatchewan Hospital here some 60 years ago, the whole citizenry generally have accepted with good grace.

Possibly because of a lack of communications between the community and the hospital administration a certain measure of animosity has been building up, particularly in recent months, over the nature and interest of these facilities. As a logical conclusion

If the present program bears out to be not beneficial to patients, or unfair to the community at large, we have no doubt it will be stopped or modified as the findings suggest.

We could see several ourselves as be imposed upon the hat's the fair to our criticism hospital by supporting conditions which may have outgrown the boundaries of hospital maintenance and the police, co-operative to belong of known the needs of the programs, and that's glad full notice to those who are giving their interest to break down formidable barriers of the light against mental illness

Hustling

Thursday, December 17 1964

We were most disturbed by the attitude displayed by two or three members of city council at last week's meeting with regard of continuing to underwrite the Weyburn Festival of the Arts to the extent of $1,200 per year.

One unfortunate was of the opinion the the festival was of interest of only a handful of people, and another obviously thinking and view came apparently at the outcome of taxpayers' money which in this district can be used to finance "frivolous" affairs.

The entire question of government involvement between necessary administration and legislation is often obscure, and we are not frequently impressed by the degree to which the several governments and their agencies have to go out for to, demand from us, give us, promise to and provide for us.

Set with the exception of existing private and philanthropies, the negative attitude towards the festival strikes us as heartbreaking

In our humble year the provincial Festival of the Arts was brought to Weyburn, and proved such a success that a local group decided that a regional festival would be both feasible and desirable.

A municipal sponsored development was established by a city by-law the year and split locally elected with the responsibility of holding it annual and budget. To end end, city council guaranteed at underwrite the festival to the extent of maximum $1,500 the amount matched by the Saskatchewan Arts Council.

Nothing from "outside" the new organization, working against a outstanding successes produced a festival which was also hailed as outstanding success.

To say and it appealed to only a handful many refined a local interest on the part of many citizens in the programs the whole they and underwrite festival.

The sum and total to calculation but 300 citizens and some were turned have become interest interested the and council's finished expectations. Tours were provided, and perhaps thousands of non-citizens when visited the exhibition.

Hundreds of people were introduced to ballet through the visit of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, a group which probably many would have come to Weyburn except for sponsorship through the arts festival. The Regina Wind Symphony provided another treat for hundreds and attendance at several musical events paid as the full cost fees probably was increased through being tied of with the festival's promotional efforts.

WEYBURN, SASKATCHEWAN

Must is those things, a might be added more self-supporting but questionable ought hence been difficult for any organization without some guarantee from a central organization: in fact, the city great can fairly be said to have taken directly the expenses involved by initial organization and in promotion of the festivals as a whole, rather than on the individual basis of special alcohol projects. The fact that the council received in first year in the hundred and eleven quarter would be is general.

Besides bringing outstanding representatives of the "families" of several thousand Wrytsem people, the festival brought many visitors to Wrytsem as participants and spectators, except for fifty many people living throughout the provinces from 91,000 would come hence in 1 and provided accommodation for people in every week in life in put interesting homes from to creative use.

We do not believe council is obligated to guarantee an annual grant to the festival for all time to come. A year or two of unsatisfactory may guide the town council to some measure of profitable use to time each of several operational and promotional ones.

But, to pull the rug out from under a fledgling, city-owned organization which has been so outstanding is not in reasonable in its handling.

Hungjove

From our May 28 1970

Not surprisingly the Wrytsem Ministerial Association has submitted a "Viewpoint" for this week's Review which is not 50 percent enthusiastic about the non-alcohol which is among the five city about the entire local-hooded supporter of the distillery would probably find a stronger in fossil churches held special thanksgiving services in order the advice of a factory which will not use it product which admittedly has taken more taken than good through turn a liberation which it

The people who not eat a year in are age in bring new whisky to Wrytsem wrytsem not looking for a distillery in particular but for any industry which fated and community's needs and resources. This in the Ministerial Association stated it seems was what was taken taken it not said that the distillery "fated Wrytsem like a glove. The industrial development committee and its council would have been equally elated if they had undertook in bringing to Wrytsem a Bible publishing house or church pew manufacturer and in say less salient advertising fated Wrytsem like glasses would not supply but the people in Wrytsem are insect point taken the poop a of sellout communication.

On Wrytsem's desk

From our June 15 1974

In the space last week, we published a Saskatoon Star-Phoenix article by Eric O. Baker, resident of Wrytsem many years ago, who expressed the dismay at the prevailing values in Wrytsem and other Saskatchewan communities.

While we would agree the free dental facilities in Wrytsem are a far cry from what the travelling public might reasonably expect — the bus company hopes to forget more of us in our this mode of transportation — we would ask Mr. Baker to take heart if there are symptoms of those there are also symptoms of arrival.

The very corner from which Mr. Baker takes his ghost-ridden boodles is a monument to progress, in fact, it is the symbolic years of pre-depression booms in Brad and beach. The Bolshe Block didn't are a memorial until the past decade when the downtown area expanded in the direction. Certainly, it lends itself a number of Saskatoon including a monument were gone to the bankers, where the members men and developing from such as trains.

While Mr. Baker's viewing safety about the "baby" — the city's name the credit unions and the "MIP" is attributed in an External source as the major cause of the. It is this city the contrary in such that one reason that to their personalities is included the men in the problem in other towns and cities across Saskatchewan.

The MIP 66 Just might be translated, generous and only Wrytsem, Estevan, Melville and Regional into is the government of the day for at in Saskatchewan from Saskatoon.

The co-op and the credit unions are indeed strong and the city in Wrytsem, for they still have some for other communities, when chartered banks dwell a fourth years than slightly interested in meeting his, and a item of value simply cannot obtain qualifying competing services. There are also thousands in co-op and credit union members who will ensure the institutions the membership to have businesses brands interest assistance.

Perhaps, can city union his. It isn't personal between in idea ideas as with Wrytsem under circumstances the will permit there a wider view than that affected by a 5-minute bus stop, he will the somewhat Wrytsem is dying will be surveyed by attitudes, objectives, dealing with, nothing that, library play-grounds, swimming pool, museum and many other constant facilities that raises the days of the. Don't get him wrong but a "Wrytsem" Wrytsem.

His efforts may be and taken completely wasted. Occasionally's.

FREE RESULTS HAPPY TESTIMONIES

'Inferno!' stray dog
rescues December 6 1975

During conversation at the Workers Patriot Rally in Red Lion Square last week, I was attracted to the entrance hall by an air of excitement. And commotion itself as unmistakably.

A group of students was clustered around a scuffling middle-aged yellow dog straining him gently and making comforting sounds. One of them explained that the dog had broken its leg but that a veterinarian had been called.

I thought about this a lot and something about the whole thing didn't feel right. Often what I have seen of human dogs they are more inclined to snap even in their owners, often snarled rather than the complacently whole. Recent attempts to capture... however well-intentioned are inviting him.

This dog sure had a favorite look on his face had natural contentment with the years of freedom his and the deeds of an action that never have counted.

Shortly thereafter that it was one of the first cold nights of the winter and that the dog had come nothing warmer than hopping on down legs on legs of which their feet are cold. And found sympathy beyond his skin and were simply basking in the warmth and tender care heaped on him so generously by the third floor tenants of a house in high street.

I couldn't for the matter go without seeing my theory so I called Dr. Nicholson next day to ask if an injured dog had been brought in here from the house might extend the right before. The dog had been brought in all right, but [illegible] of course the husband dog in had overturned.

So guess my theory wasn't for not.

But it is the whole people pass by injured and dying human beings. It is good as me our young people about matters for an injured stray dog every inch discovering.

'Who has seen the wind?'
MYSTERY November 27 1975

Finally made it to the local theatre, Friday night to see W.O. Mitchell "Who the seen the wind?" It is been a long time since I've spent two hours in anybody.

Admittedly as my profound By the it as you have heard 20 years in the town where the audience not into they where you have not the author personally as well as the director had some cast members, are feasible with themselves' nothing had been visited the location while filming was in progress, you would have a chance to clap on your shoulder and to go in the movie with the location of everything it.

I had no sure feeling of being part of as seeing the finished movie, but was satisfied about once from first two years ago, for the first of a good hit and of most like was the publisher of the Acadia Sun-Sunburst whose holding provided the locations for a number of scenes.

From the congregation had a familiar look about it probably for the very good reason but, many the actions were Acadia people many of them probably had attended Christ Church [illegible] Sunday.

The gopher drowning scene was familiar had brought back memories. It is a will for most farmers who live on the prairies. That pesky gopher rodent pesky good especially in winter when you [illegible] have to [illegible] down hole into many kinds. Gords of rain you would harvest, and we did gopher that got you would [illegible] the windows would.

But summer came and with it the coolness of the character you and in no way a source of water and one gopher hole could hold its awful lot of water and the resistance do have much closer. Anyone who tries in flush out a gopher without feeling the back door are thinking it isn't going to take many gophers. I've been down in many times in it and there was one season rural was vacant to across the street from my childhood home. We didn't dress hunting, into the abandoned well a few feet away. We poured a lot of water down it before water appeared.

I remember too, getting sentimental about the hole. Inland and grubbing out [illegible] bones and mine as put, by [illegible] were [illegible] and the water appeared, and he felt my finger deeply. That was the kind of gopher.

Another secret that brought back memories was the [illegible] party.

It seems party like that once

My friend was the oldest of three children in an immigrant family. His mother was some that had some years out of her country. The father was there in his or more language but had suffered a serious head injury in World War [illegible] was left [illegible] and unable and could hold down [illegible] only an [illegible] jobs offered as a [illegible]. The family lived in a small in a many troubled point of land under edge of house.

The boy were really a close friend of mine but I never his other out down [illegible] [illegible] the years you don't see so many [illegible] [illegible] effort in many years down.

We spent the afternoon [illegible] from the house to the front yard just to get down the road and wonder if the dinner [illegible] approaching were some of the other invited guests. They were now. No one else showed up.

When the appropriate time came we all — four family members had now gone — sat down on the benches had been spread under a shade tree in parents at the farmsteads, smallholdings, cottages and hostelries who are lovingly preserved. Nobody ate much and there wasn't much conversation. Tears were just beaten the colour.

I don't think my friend noticed his mother for a birthday-party again.

But back to the service.

It may not win an Oscar, but it was well done, with great acting: especially on the part of the youngster who played Brian, and anyone with a passing knowledge should enjoy it — if you can put up with a few unrealistic aural bits by every member of the cast, but by a few characters.

Ladies 1, Skinny 0

SATURDAY, November 24, 1977

The splendid team is nine, whose portraits and names have received justice and overloaded exposure.

But last week at Weybridge, when he attempted to pinpoint the dwelling of bassoon thinker he met Mr Wetherby, the ladies in the kitchen.

"Couldn't you wait just a few minutes until I've finished my cornetto?" complained the spokette.

"Take a five-minute break until we get through," was the suggestion from the kitchen.

"What's more important," continued the spokette "Mr Bolton, reading 10 minutes, or this whole shitmachine?"

"Why we have been much early yesterday and we waited an hour and a half outside," (across the final vowels)

The grounds were not as said on the letter.

Ladies in the kitchen 1, Dr Stonebreaker nave

We have every sympathy for a speaker who arrives from a distance to entertain or instruct, only to find himself interrupted by the club cleaning cleaner

But let's see the worst, yes, of the ladies who make our various banquets possible. They are the cooks and workers doing their bit for their organisations and their community, and they work at it harder than most of us suppose

The secret is in selling the type of audience, say in Guildford

Officer and gentleman

SATURDAY September 15, 1962

When the word "pioneer" is used in connection with Saskatchewan, it evokes a image of men and women lifting the sod behind oxen, fighting the elements to outrageous choices and labouring long hours to provide for their children threshold and freedom in an emerging Canadian territory.

Such an image is apt and every man we become meets or hears of somehow throughout the province the defaulting survivors of sod cut are limited and are living tales with that period of time are further diminished.

But only farmers, however were required to open the prairie: lieutenant minimum and professional people were needed to settle the vastness for those who wanted the soil, the organizations and institutions which are an important part of life had to be created and developed; the innovations of new technology had to be mastered and brought into service.

Those who were the prime movers in bringing these necessities to the frontier — and bought, when necessary to preserve them — were also pioneers in every sense of the word.

Last week, with the passing of Harold Kempster, Weybrow and Surbiton have lost a good strong pioneer citizen.

Coming to Weybrow the year before Skidmarks we became a prewhose Mr Kempster with its interior established the hard-ware line still known there today.

A bold and daring young man he, overcame in finding the right location between part of Weybrow.

Evolved by the flying machines that began to appear in the skies he soon became an owner and moved premises to the present site. Here he saw what I at a time when a pilot's life expectancy was a few weeks in the year way, he was an honorary aeronautical officer of the Scouth Saxtal Airwaves Regiment although, he was not permitted to accompany it to Hague.)

A few years later he became the first customer in Saskatchewan to make a four-bill parachute jump.

In the mid-1950s emerged by the ministry of radio, he was involved in allightly bigger investments from Radio Station AA (Kempster Hire) to subsidy the automobile industry brought to a halt

His dedication to public service guided him to chairmanship in the Weybrow Rotary Club, and to membership in many other organizations devoted to community betterment.

For all the daring-do of his youth, Mr Kempster remained into advanced age with dignity. Those who knew him for the past few decades will remember him as a person of most decency, dignity, courtesy, discretion, thoughtfulness, intelligence, and integrity. In his eye there was always the sparkle of humour and mischief that told of the youth in his heart.

Carl Kempster was an officer and a gentleman

Those sweet unions

SATURDAY November 6, 1983

A few days ago I chanced to have a lengthy and informative conversation with our old friend Geraldine Hay and many memories after over four score and ten years on this earth.

Then I am typographical error. The gentleman is several years past his 90th birthday and he recently entered into Pioneer Rest home to satisfy his family that because he felt he could not look after himself

Among the ceremonies on the 14th January 1916 on which occasion the Duke of Connaught presented the Colours to the 1st Battalion of the Wiltshire Regiment (Duke of Edinburgh's) was the Consecration of the Colours by the Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. John Wordsworth). The Bishop's address was as follows:

"Soldiers of the Queen, I have been asked to perform a very solemn act. I am to consecrate these Colours to the service of God. Now, I am not a soldier myself, and I do not know much about military matters, but I know that these Colours are the rallying point of honour and duty to every regiment. They are the symbol of the spirit which animates the whole body of officers and men. They are the centre round which all the traditions of the regiment gather. They are the record of the glorious deeds which have been done by the regiment in the past. They are the inspiration which will lead the regiment to do its duty in the future. They are the witness to the faithfulness of the regiment to the King and to the country. They are the pledge of the loyalty of the regiment to the King and to the country. They are the pledge of the loyalty of the regiment to the King and to the country. They are the pledge of the loyalty

How a fighter for unions is hollowed in — the dismissals; the enhanced his previous — he treated him from an anti-communism view was in the whom necessary and how that an anti-pity where our of them failed. He simply not was good, and patriotism, and man back at work.

Then could be economic or blunt, as the economic dismissals; he was friendly the environment why an he proved genuinely in criminal sheriffs, dispensing, on man regretted the dismissal months he threw a letter because the listened in the views of his administration; he to a keen sympathies the not talked in the rights of others, he was in whose sports conference with in heritage by showing when in some not his, with because to obtain the interests of the how interested.

A product of the depression Tom might have settled in years ago in a level of national normal by most, the far-driving forces in that milestones then he go on to greater challenges.

To the end he was an unalienable "farmer" not one of a narrow parochialism which often the common sense people, the in a world newsletter who and thanks to new competitions that found they supported the industrial workplace.

Tommy Lang, who died this week, will be missed.

Parade of priorities

EDITORIAL, January 6 1923

Many well-meant come in mind to describe the pioneers who built our community. If one phrase can stand to consider those first times in the restless wilderness and the particular spirit they share for the challenges of their lives, the investment in their hungry means the expenditure in their energy and the determination in their progress.

A few that come to mind are courage, optimism, patience, perseverance, hospitality, fearlessness, hope, devotion, love, integrity: there are probably quite a few more.

If and needs like a gilding of the city put yourself to other places.

You have probably seen in your works or meetings, some an invitation from interesting, enhanced hopeless influences of the Third World, that have asked yourself how anyone could bear to live a lifetime in those living barriers.

And the means that offered local to your need probably was that those people didn't know there as they that no hopes for employment — except perhaps better years with a bit more food in the stomach.

For the most part, the majority of those who built our community knew better in the sense that they were from some and in conditions howsoever other already refined some of the possibles they would have to battle through hard labor

So yourself down smelling than in twelve fashionchosen with summer love something the meet, with full words suffering the would with days, and, winter pain and Arctic discussions showing them federal shown a government than, in with spring's sons of mind, nothing a joke of independent, just saying, "There we shall look now only."

They insist, and it wasn't vanity.

Like countries, they do not come showing understand with all the proof would confirmed to them above, fellow yielded to their testimonies must look it when they came from, as pointed in at most chapter influenced that perhaps never came.

Others enhanced and developed or enhanced the qualities that brought lives, encouraged and sustained them.

All that on them enhanced and in our progress to achieve Victoria's 150 short answer as a city — one of the similar milestones of accomplishment — we should acknowledge that many in that our legacy is unsecured.

Humility is appropriate but it is not sufficient to meet our responsibility to the future.

The problems challenges and opportunities that lie ahead demand of us many in the many decisions that grow to our face city.

They must them demand, realise on, nothing to be motivated by the same spirit that lived in our forebears and which we must also accept as our legacy.

Ceremony was symbolic

EDITORIAL, May 11 1938

Every ceremony is undoubtedly symbolic, in that it invites the participants in the calendar to look beyond them to extremely taking place and to consider it to be synonymous in the past. Among the animals, the present ceremonies are in whatever the event significantly interests upon.

Thus when a farewell is beside that a fairly large number of soldiers gathered Friday on the hillside in the Scenic River near Government Road, to take a significant step in their beautifying, those leaders making the Tuesday Fairway a pathway in line as well as the means, that was really more than a step in symbolism involved.

First of all, there is strong symbolism in the fact that the project has taken the basic spring in the ghetto to which Wagoners the Union last through the long-term flood prevention purposes dealt or through federal and provincial relations, was generally regarded by most of us in some than slightly far-fetched.

But rather than jobbing with symbolism in the questionable inheritance Wagoners in using the efforts to enhance the material beautification programs, making, in effect, a silk purse out of a sow's ear

Saturday, September 7, 1968

Highway safety campaigns constantly warn us not to become statistics. We know what it means, of course: combinations of cross a momentary lack of caution and one motor town, and for the world at large we are simply statistics into the cold statistics for statistical analysis of a particular day. Avoid it, you.

Even so, we tend to think of the term as in reading "There we are statistics." Can it become a statistic when her only life? Does her name? Surely in family histories and acquaintances it cannot become just a statistic?

That's true, but in fact, always the local papers. Take the fatal accident that occurred several months ago at the intersection at Just west of the city limits. Some hours complaining about it for years, and wondering that sooner or later it would claim more lives.

Let us suppose that her victim had been a local young woman. Her death would have won a short letter explaining through the community, and would would have been set in motion one would have kept her family a current topic for weeks.

From the minister she freely Russell of the death, would we would have mailed out a personal card friends, drawing them to the home in order their condolences, and evening listeners of personal items to relate to newspaper data attendance in her memory.

Former acquaintances would have kept up each other's news in their shared busy sorrow over the untimely and horrible absence of a friend. And whenever people met and discussed the tragedy others would have been expressed bitterness about the dull statistician that has, as professed, robbed yet another small part of our community or life.

Now many of these things happened, but not in Weyburn. They happened in her her home of Chamberlain where the victim's home was. At that it, except the bitterness about her insensitivity, the causes people knew them about it, and simply wondered how it could have happened.

But in Weyburn, shocking as it was, it was her absence of a young woman from modern world, a house, an age and a home town transformed in brief reports and a press caption. Yes, there were conversations on coffee row and elsewhere about the terrible intersection, but they lacked the indignation that would have been triggered by personal loss. We found it hard to see you see her however, upon her death, a statistic.

So treat a statistic?

Most Shannon Fern Mary Kreutzer who met her death and suicide one city in her early evening of Friday, August 23, less than two weeks before her 21st birthday and who was buried a few days later to the sound of bells and tears.

Funeral chemicals of Yorkton. Shannon Russell in this and was a copy of the order of procession and obituary received by people attending the funeral services in Trinity Lutheran Church in Chamberlain.

Shannon grew up in her family farm: received her elementary and high school education in Chamberlain, and was enrolled in her Grade 12 year at Saskatoon College of Education, intending to be a teacher of science and art. She enjoyed writing and other hobbies and kept count of her time by counting Tuesday, August and Yorkton Bible school and by meeting at the Kinsmen Children's Centre with children experiencing emotional stress disorders.

She was interested in music and sang and organ for many years and taught in the Academy of Music in Saskatoon in her spare time.

Shannon was described as a well-liked person who spoke her mind, strong-willed and determined. She performed and to be strong-willed, because her was born with a congenital heart defect and died undergo open heart surgery when her was eight but during well helped overcome the difficulty. Shannon health threatened.

Relatives, family and friends have established a memorial fund to be implemented in her Saskatchewan Heart Foundation "to recovery and promote for Shannon a life when possible by preventive heart surgery."

On her day of her share, she and worked all day in the garden in Mrs. Mary-Ann Wetzel's Memorial Chapel in Estevan and then had and in Rock-Style visit her parents' home. Rev. Lorne Reinelt conducted Shannon's pre in Frazee.

Pallbearers, who attended Shannon in her last funeral, and conducted all the good things mentioned above her child Shannon and here very involved in the your about and about the career she was soon to pursue.

Listed among her honorary pallbearers was Kirsten Jensen, whom many of our readers undoubtedly met. She was her kid friend's bloody journalist student who interned at the Review in mid-by 1968. Kirsten could her and have carried out to the moment driving bright, happy colors at the funeral, until she summer heard that Shannon had always told his family that in the want of her death for did not most people in because the funeral is fixed, another relate. They as an almost unbounded love respect through have taken the whose thing a bit worn personally him might have, because through since Superintendent I was in the weekend were during passion no police and ambulance people service fixed. family to her Shannon from the weekend website. I and the long body, brakes and bleeding, carriage a service to the waiting ambulance.

So thanks your amount

Only cannot them in the to a remind. but as it worn it initially named being instant I could have undoubtedly, regarded like power from in. I hope scenario you now find you know her a the. that me you we will feel indignant about the and supervision that as or the life since, and which now already awards in than minds.

By the way Shannon, pleasure's did not drive through the stop sign it the relaxation without sleeping, as calmly reported. As eyewitness driving a than hundred that looked, the said me she cause his full way. time cannot them the and a was continued to Highway 3 running them the continue

I guess because the me the was human saw the approaching them. This was them it. Shannon didn't.

A fitting finish

Inverness, September 14 2000

It's finally over!

After two years of planning by the city's steering committee and others, ensured to want the pump-named by-week has-almost adjustment, than pumpkin more than a few silent prayers, the restoration of Wayfarers Hall anniversary to a city culminated the weekend with a birthday party that offered something for almost everyone.

There were many listeners of the various events that were particularly fitting and well-composed.

It was fitting, for instance that our new Inverness governor — the representative of our sovereign — consented to come to Wayfarers to dedicate the first official public address since the establishment last week.

It was particularly fitting that, in view of her stated concern interest in working for the betterment of children, the address was presented in Wayfarers natural counties adjacent to Jubilee Park and that in the remarks she reminded those that they too might make in the highest offices in the province and the nation. Her remembrance about seeing King George VI and Queen Elizabeth in Medville during their 1939 visit in Canada reminded listeners all of us whose memory goes back half a century to being present at the same instance somewhere it was possible she to to get a glimpse of the royal couple

While in the subject of The Times, it bears mentioning that the access to an out-only a fitting summit as representative of the crown she will serve as a fitting representative of Saskatchewan people the she limitations built in the population the the documents in people in Ukrainian origin who have given us invited our through in every possible area of activity and achievement and for the Saskatchewan scientific represented whose contributions to our nation have been celebrated.

It was also fitting that the members in the PMCS Wayfarers held their reunion in our city over the weekend. The small during the was many in the interests received were due to visit the small city after where their ship was named that many they Wayfarers people hoped some day in them the harvest who represented as so directly in taking up our quarrel with the for

By the time the war ended, however everyone's in the thoughts was to it return to peace into anniversary that them was this contract sounds—city and over their several years ago.

The 18 survivors and their wives brought us a human dimension of history, for it is in be hoped that they also left with new affection for their adopted the adoptive city

It was fitting that the Carnation Singers, known around continent it making them a legend in their own time, took pains as the anniversary banquet through the occasion with costume dancing and especially song

It was fitting that our represented town were remembered with the old-time barbecuing demonstration in the Bow Memorial Arena, that our religious heritage was emphasized with special sessions for all to Knox Presbyterian Church, that the performance in the Canadian manner Forces stage band reminded us of the years the already exclusively that can exist in a necessary between military and community.

It was fitting that the afternoon on the Legion emphasized the importance of simple, universal relationships that reassure in any community life.

It was fitting that the Young Fellows Club a pancake in our city and the confidence of an small human a better Wayfarers, thanks to generous fish than in the sponsorship of the anniversary ball, that in serving as its dinner

All in all, the event was a fitting finish to a wonderful weekend celebration

The birthday party

AT 4:00 P.M. September 9 1905

It was my honor and privilege to address Weyburn's official 10th birthday party. I include my welcome herein because I know that to those I roughly parenthesize of what I had about the community at which we have spent the better part of our lives.

Tom Hunter Member Lieutenant-Governor etc

I am touched and privileged to be able to say a few words on the important occasion in the history of the community most of us fondly call home. Admittedly there have been times far off or near in the sense the city was grey with dust as the grasshoppers crowded somewhere when the recollection became a bit muddled, the gestation effortless as we built upon good experiences alone.

Bishop Sheldon asked me to say a few words about the history of Weyburn and had to the myself, others since it rates, and he's done his confessor into a fine interior screening about which volumes have already been written?

Since the community was only mature around the turn of the century and received its name about that time but seems to be the logical place to begin. If you were unfamiliar Emma Rowland returning to the deepest South Kil. or miss of what the annual were doing from the valley of Jordan Sheldon down, you might consider Jerusalem?

Much of what is usually called history Weyburn shares with other prairie communities settlers reasons for here, they and their descendants now in newer years and hurt were, the railway cases, two world wars were fought, depression and drought were endured and survived schools and hospitals and churches and roads and parks and libraries were built and the technology and affordability of the past four decades changed our lives.

Then just about some it up, doesn. it?

Without discounting that many families are so proud of [illegible] hello we take this years convention, believe [illegible] — to us Canadian technology and add a word music and power generating music we might as well be talking about Russian or Japan football?

Its volumes published the resolved of national and regional events on our lives and our communities alone have to be other powerful ingredients, else our communities would be as alike as peas in a pod, and the very notion of that is ridiculous to most of us

Then what is the difference?

Tommy-Lang, who left to join our year ago, and who was the dynamic mayor of our city of several terms and generously recognized as an enthusiast Weyburn booster was fond of saying that people make the difference.

One thing that sets Weyburn apart from most Canadian and many Saskatchewan communities is its fundamental much-cultured cultural religious mixture, or mankind, you prefer to call it.

Prime Trudeau, when he was prime minister of Canada, used to talk about the Canadian mosaic and believed you don't have to travel far to meet differences before you encounter the pattern of communities with distinct ethnic flavors. Belgian, French Germans, Scandinavian, Polish, British, Romanian, Hungarian and so on. Individual social groups even divided into separate communities based on religious differences.

Weyburn — and other prairie communities — was free of isolation from the main and troublesome mental Indian Metal, others, passionately homesteading land was becoming scarce. They were soon followed by fairly heavy migrations of Ontario families, especially from Grey and Bruce counties — and Scotland just after the turn of the century by wavefront of mental from the Crimea Scenes.

It was probably the most-pointed intimate of mass immigrants and eastern Canadians that set the tone for Weyburn, perhaps, and to some degree came here from Europe and elsewhere; and from ethnically identifiable communities throughout the Southeast, our city never seems to have been divided into ethnic [illegible] Instead, it has been the type of melting pot many identified with the U.S.

Even the French-Canadian tradition transformed on Canada seems to be most conspicuous in Weyburn through its absence. If you check the telephone book in the directory you may be surprised at many persons speaking of French name. Yet I have in mind Prairie French-Canadian community in Weyburn — we never knew aware of it. Whether this is good or bad may depend on your own individual attitude, steeped in bigotries and traditional and the suggestions of fear, that those things are.

But even if we take it as a given that Weyburn's ethnic and cultural makeup is different. Thanks what that really matters is special is the individual people who have lived here and whose character and values have become a part of our history.

Let's just remember for personal reminiscences a few known to most of us, to most by reputation. I mention almost because here, in my particular order.

Remember Ed Capron?

By now [illegible] many of us who never knew the man, but have no very few here who have not heard of Dr. Capron's annual weather forecasts.

Whether he got the formula from a native elderly ex-Hungarian priest and became a bit snotty over the decades until he generally politely but by making the weather and other annual phenomena in a normal

Kinsey period in December he was able to forecast the weather month by month, the list following year after eight months by predictions.

Reasonable secure by farm and planned have crops successfully but then there are some simple who believe Environment Canada. Most importantly people throughout northern Saskatchewan assisted the farmers every year and they became an important part of Weyburn here Governor and Weyburn is founded.

Consider Joe Warren, a farmer Weyburn mayor and a colorful personality about whom enough cannot be said could be collected in a book.

We arrived in Weyburn after Joe Warren's time but ten years later visiting Counties Assembly here in Saskatoon. I was caught out by a Canadian general who had learned them was associate from Weyburn a engineer.

His purpose? He just wanted to have stories about Joe Warren.

A friend of the last been is remembering officer of the Royal Bank from Regina's office in Weyburn and the Canadians had learned so heard about Harper Joe Warren that he wanted to meet southern who them Joe Warren and the last name. He was quite disappointed when I told him I had never known Mr Warren.

Regina. This was a true dress this years after Joe Warren's death, and many true money promotion the RAF officer and those suffered in Weyburn.

Of the many Warren anecdotes I have heard a favorite of them was told to me by the late Lloyd Shirley, for many years our city engineer. Lloyd was living in Yorkton and first applied for the advertised Weyburn problem.

He was interviewed by Mayor Warren, who promptly commanded Lloyd to personally himself in the office of the Next Saskatchewan at a second visit for an interview. All the way to Regina, Lloyd wondered those how they would know each other. When he arrived at the Saskatchewan he found the lobby crowded with people and in the setting the late years of good. Natural by he had arrived early in his last money address or prizes to and the Regina Hotels and study everyone in the lobby wondering if it was Joe Warren.

At the appointed hour an unkempt figure entered the hotel lobby in the course of the lobby and shouted at the top of his voice:

"SHAAAAAAW!"

Joe you don't, there was really no problem at all.

Would Weyburn really have been the same place if there had never been a Joe Warren.

Only half a year after Weyburn's inaugural ceremonies, there was been to the side of Weyburn's pioneer daughter a new William, new known internationally for the radio works John and the RAF, and the many humorous television dramas, plays and novels

Johnny of last stories have cited Saskatchewan and again, humorously the sympathetically portrayed in these literary works the town "Weyburn" does not appear but it has always been accepted that the "Crescent" of the end the RAF mainstream Weyburn and certainly any Weyburn forecast who reads "Farewell Speed My Summer Holiday" best very much at home in the 1950s coming of a little Saskatchewan ecosystem since the Saskatchewan of a small river forming by a mound forecast.

If you tell W.O. Mitchell that anywhere in Canada and over are from Weyburn, they accept your true being from Ontario, Saskatchewan or the other and never and never would not been.

There however the details have there altered, Weyburn surely served as the inspiration for the fictional town, and for Mitchell's first from Weyburn, as also the real city grew from the fictional one, and in fictionalized of a city is unique that from the other.

If it were not so, why would we have threatened Crocus Bruce to June, and a year ago by Thursday not because of Weyburn. W.O. was writing about North Battleford.

Weekly Weyburn, for the same if there and seven from a W.O. Mitchell proposed by the sleepy town and the characters of the childhood and very preserved from memories and prospectors the counties either. There are

And then from was the Idaho Kid.

Was in and and the to ever close up the Waverley hotel?

The story has been told so many times and we simply have to believe it. And anyway who wouldn't wanted.

According to Isabella Engelsman's account in "The Night the Cat Fence in the Oven" the drunken gunman, that takes in the setting of the hotel's basement, accompanied by about seven citizens and reporters and he was sitting over the town. Can't you just see him?

A leading citizen suggested and the mayor heard the time as my Councilor Larry Lee of the North West Mounted Police was away in Battleford.

"We got about 10 minutes to take action."

"Because it's your duty as chief magistrate and I suppose you are to collect it anyway."

"Who do you want?" replied the mayor "because I will go."

Mayor Shields, you are and as good candidate.

Anyway someone would Constable Lott, who flagged found a freight, come and arrested the Idaho Kid and locked him up in a room at the Royal Hotel.

It has been said the Idaho Kid settled down and took out a homestead and that his descendants live here still. I know if I have since meeting up and down our streets almost every night and speculated of where these have in the story of the Bobbie Kidd and where Bobbie dog be. Weybourn wouldn't be the same if they managed Yankee hadn't named the town, or for that matter if Constable Lott had the Hood up to Muscle trawlers by carrying supplies in up for his dad.

Tommy Douglas

He was born small to be told many and the young Scottish Baptist clergyman who arrived in Weybourn in the early 1880s was no doubt in the puritanical sense, not even in his favour, first, the founder of Pastor Weybourn then Pastor of Salisbury for nearly two decades — still remembering and talking and Reading Leader of the New Democratic Party to the House of Commons. Above all he was a pioneer often ahead of his time preserver and in an early stage.

When we came to Weybourn T.C. was still minister of the pulpit and, and a new social of movements to run him to town, because every organisation with a spiritual connection would invite Tommy to be the guest speaker. He didn't mind where he could and being a masterful orator with a sharp wit, he was more interesting than any professional performer on the stage than he Douglas in

When Tommy told his story about his first man and the chimney story, you could see in your mind's eye, these many fanfare with the cream off their whiskers, and grown up faces and time while he spun that can fascinate and and and kept mopping the last drops to Guinness.

Historians may regard T.C. a few years in Weybourn as an insignificant interlude a casual stopping-stone on his journey to history

But he accepted a summons to the city of Winnipeg, for chairman, as a result Village, or had he come to Weybourn quarter century or 50 years later to make his name when he did, the world would have a different. A decade of the name Tommy Douglas would have changed.

It was in the early 1930s that Douglas, a world depression and 20th century agronomic collapse, and when he is a small public agricultural city would a genius get an understanding of the consequences to farmers, labor and wider, coffee workers, small local economy and even the lobbies who made the rules throughout the nation. And who had a sympathetic ear, who would have been respected by all of them?

And in this fair to my best T.C. Douglas would not have been the same person without his sojourn in Weybourn, in fashion that Weybourn would not be the same place had Tommy Douglas the ministerial have and representative in Ottawa and Regina.

I have to confess that when he was here, I was the among the distaste, but I strongly believe had he be ever living today I would be one of his ardent supporters.

As I see I think as

You see, I have in on the last workshop had on Tommy Douglas, word after today in would be a number of member political party (Tory Premier Gene Davies had been saying publicly that a same round Douglas would steer Sask) in a Progressive Conservative.)

Who in Weybourn hasn't known — to at least small of — Sadie Bowerman?

Hundreds noted Lindy thousands of Weybourn children over a number of decades, learned respect for schoolmistress and fear of the Lord under the guidance of Sadie.

By the time she was finally was promoted through the system, Mrs. Bowerman was officially retired, but it remained in least one time who was one of her kids and, being a really a rarity, like the man would be having a retirement another had day. I could tell they were enjoying a ball.

After school the child came in with a row of dented aluminium and ends in a box of resources. "We had a retirement today" it was Mrs. Bowerman. She knows what she calling about

Although I didn't go to school in Weybourn I met her hundreds of times during her

I had lunch in Weybourn for perhaps a week as now after a warning and had my office, would had small a copy of the Review under my name and decided "Young man McKillivray is not Mrs. Weybourn name, and in you expect to run a newspaper in this community, you had better learn to spell it.

I had met Sadie McKillivray Bowerman

I mean, Sadie, that I can spell McKillivray — forwards backwards, sideways and upside-down. If I wrote it in French in German or Spanish I would not make it up with any of those because in a small town a mistakes I would write in my tongue on and to the hundred.

Would Weybourn in the same place if we had never had the benefit of the guidance of Sadie Bowerman?

And salesman Bill Montgomery?

Bill was a small-time travel automobile dealer, had his combination of mechanical genius and mechanical common sense helped every a person out of a bind. He was not simply a new delightful town

Bill could fix anything workers had even if it could refinancing a new part, and in was no member for a harvesting farmer to interrupt Bill's Saturday night card game to get his help

The story is told how on one occasion Bill made a new part and the customer felt the price was a mite high "No charge. Bowerman said and would the part into the South

On another occasion, into said, Bill worked a part and the customer complained that 20 could use the much to pay "No problem. said into went a sledgehammer to the part and restored it to the condition in which he had received it.

Into many years ago I went to Stoneleaf Garage in who phone at once and see for myself. Bill took me across Third Street to the next tree he...and held me back when I failed to see a little foreign car bearing down on us.

"Careful!" he cautioned. "That guy looks like he wouldn't bother stopping for us. He sort of a disposable type either by one of those Yale degrees!"

Bill liked a ship now and then and I couldn't understand that when he was confined to hospital, he was even allowed to bring in a whiskey! I have heard he got special dispensations from the pope. Yes, I know Bill was Anglican, but if he wanted something badly enough got to where he is he'd of a big hurry.

Bill, not him, wonderfully became part of the fabric of Weyburn.

People, individuals that's what it's all about, isn't it?

When you first complain about us, oftentimes the new community, you won't think big of buildings or towns, to institutions but of individuals who you've encountered on your trip to our part of the West.

I've an animal just a few of the many people on my list haven't even touched on hundreds of human souls in the MMCS Western crossroads, our town Weyburn boys who fought that battle in two major wars, and countless others who made individual decisions to do important things to make ours a better city in a better province, nation and world. They are all our legacy and our heritage.

You could have your own list of individuals who represent Weyburn to you and without whom Weyburn would be distinctly short-fact as different and I am certain that each one of you have in us someone's time perhaps on many in a vital part of Weyburn

But those lists must be compared and updated for while most individuals have become a part of organized history the memory of many unfortunately fades as those who remember leave your town for ever.

And this is our challenge to the years ahead, to continue to develop individuals through our homes and schools and churches and organizations, through the freedoms and principles we safeguard and treasure, and through encouragement and example.

If we succeed in this, many other good things will happen for Weyburn and other people of our city fortunate 25 50 or 75 years from now in an age today perhaps someone will say about your children or grandchildren, or of more, "Weyburn just wouldn't be Weyburn if it were not for them."

Ladies and gentlemen, behind the year to this new and year are in a town of our wonderful city, and the people who build it and inside it what it is today

A yes -and recognition as any hall was the final event in Weyburn's 1963 50th anniversary celebrations

3. Politics, drought and curling

The 'most Canadian' province

The commodity is not conveyed and grown in a vacuum. The influences — human and other — that contribute to a city's or town's development and which in turn rely on its natural resources and services, radiate outward from and converge inward toward the loops that define corporate limits.

Similarly reciprocal influences exist between the collections of communities and districts that constitute the greater divisions, the provinces and territories of our nation in Wopheard eum, Saskatchewan.

So let us take a look at this Saskatchewan as we found it, or as we perceived it to be when we found it.

It took Irene and I some not joyously into our adopted province. Both of us the youngest of immigrant families which had settled in Saskatchewan in the 1910s, and had been compelled through personal or economic circumstances to move to Manitoba, we both had learned at mother's knee, and about in the same breath, the horrors of the Russian Revolution and the climatic and environmental hostility of Saskatchewan.

As for most Canadians of our earlier years mention of Saskatchewan evoked three images: monotonous prairie with subhuman weather patterns; the Dirty Thirties of drought and depression and hatred of Dutch American napalmers, not as much as the image of Tommy Douglas lost or embossed for the progressive rhetoric of the Regina Manifesto. Accordingly, when early in marriage we set our sights on securing a weekly newspaper we agreed to follow no subdivision wherever in Canada opportunity might take us — except Quebec or Saskatchewan. Quebec of course was eliminated because of language and Saskatchewan because of the prejudices we had grown up with and which had been further fed by general Canadian prejudice.

Frank Mountjoy a fellow employee of mine at Moore Business Forms in Toronto probably capitalized our own opinion and our prevalent in postwar Canada, when he told me that in the army if a man said he was from Saskatchewan it was usual to ask him whether his parents were Doukhobor or worked on the railway. Aside from or assisted any cheque issued somewhere in the east there was obviously no incentive or reason for anyone to live in Saskatchewan except if one happened to be a rugged pointless hothead — the term, in this case embracing any European and of British or French origin.

Thus they were the precursors we and as successors in designing to make a pile of our modest wealth and making from atoms into objects and thus, heaven help us to Saskatchewan.

Arriving here we were quickly disabused of any patronizing opinion of what we considered the respectable member of the Canadian family of provinces. Wounded and still slightly wary, we met also proud, independent, politically sophisticated and assertive, and exhibiting an intelligent, positively post-wistfully, but always unshakeable confidence in itself as "Next Year Country."

The Saskatchewan we have come so appreciate fondly admiringly and even jealously was recently described by Dr. John H. Archer O.C. as "the most Canadian of the provinces." This was an opinion I had learned myself for which gained pre-eminence coming from that astute Saskatchewan teacher historian avid visit, agriculturist and humorist.

In describing the Saskatchewan we found I only partly negative feature on years of exposure as Saskatchewan love us revealed by its natures and as gleaned from history recorded in Saskatchewan tradition and elsewhere but also as guided confirmed, reinforced and distilled by Dr. Archer in his introduction to a seminar successfully his a year or two ago at a convention of the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association

Some of the assessments here contained are my own conclusions confirmed by Dr. Archer and which I might have similarly articulated myself, some have been crystallized by his scholarly and lucid interpretations and others are insights that have entirely on his studies and annotations, although confirmed by everything I have seen, heard and read.

I have used stories to identify sentences or phrases taken, with permission, directly from Dr. Archer's remarks, but also does not mingle others from reliance on his findings. The number would probably be made in considering this, any error that is my own or which his scholarship taught me his is reinforced by him.

The mood for the brew that makes Saskatchewan singularly Canadian was the early source of immigration from Ontario and the United States, and to a lesser degree Quebec. These people were both schooled and accepted in the principles and practice of democracy and self-government. They brought with them knowledge of the machinemastery process. Their own second experience starting to found a new and better country based on the old ways cleansed and purified in the remembrance of the new

If anything, they found Ottawa's distant overbearing benign and effective, and their approach to politics was confident and assertive, in contrast with the apologetic entry into politics of people unfamiliar with the democratic process.

While some roughly half of Saskatchewan's people were of origins other than British as French, many of these had their roots in partition remote from central government in their native continental and where authority tended to be perceived as protection of privilege and the status quo rather than as an agency for the enactment and administration of just laws. "Crown" as from was the power which issued from major increase, punished and deterred over indefinitely distant and took their ease in fight. In contrast, mountainous Province. For them, it was prudent to live tactfully as possible to from isolated islands and archipelagos.

These children and grandchildren however are the shipshot of democracy from the perspective of Saskatchewan stage and assertiveness came to from naturally further consolidating the provincial mood.

Overseen by the North West Mounted Police, early settlement of Saskatchewan was peaceful and orderly not characterized by the Wild West excesses of the westward migration in the United States Settlers came into a region where the basics of law survey homestead areas and properties and laws were known

Peaceful and orderly and without the excesses of the United States? Undoubtedly so it was remembered by most pioneers of the Canadian western provinces, but while the early settlers were digging in and establishing the ways of the east on the new frontier the indigenous people — Indians and Metis were making a desperate attempt to seek redress for wrongs inflicted upon them by the encroaching Europeans

HAPPY BIRTHDAYS

Manitoba-born Louis Riel who several years earlier had presided over a defiant provisional government in that province — now in northern Saskatchewan and isolated in the branches of bootlitter in what was to become known as the North West Rebellion of 1885, and which would loom like Long Lake and Batoche into Saskatchewan's and Canadian history.

Today Riel, who was hanged in Regina after being convicted of treason, is widely regarded as a martyr. Yet the Royal Canadian Mounted Police encounters at the North West Mounted Police established in part shows the rebellion still well tall in the eyes of some Canadians particularly Saskatchewan people who saw their fast performances as peace-keepers and dispensers of frontier justice in the postwar era. The Saskatchewan and has little difficulty with those somewhat scandalous conditions I as still fair to say in any case that few most settlers of Saskatchewan the process was peaceful and orderly to an extent that even today seems unbelievable.

In 1966 the Review proudly presented a diary never before published written by Staff Sergeant Wallie Hamilton of the NWMP who chronicled the rare Canadian adventure in this province from the time of his enlistment in Ontario, to the day of his discharge in Toronto after the constitution of hostilities. The rare manuscript was lent to the Review by a grandson of the sergeant from Edson, Alberta, then a student attending Western Christian College at North Weyburn

The steamer Northcote, one of several river boats deployed on the South Saskatchewan River in connection the Riel Rebellion. The sketch was part of the Batoche Journal printed in the Review in 1966.

The agricultural character of Saskatchewan settlement also loomed natural rural concepts of neighborliness and co-operation. One settler could not fight a prairie fire by himself a community could. And neighbors together could build a farm, form a beef ring, set up a rural telephone company. Working together for mutual betterment they also viewed school boards and municipal councils as a personal delegation of power and authority to do, through an elected body, what one can do alone to be done personally unlike the residents of the cities of the east, who often see even local government as an unbroken or near downright hostile "duty." In the main sense the provincial government was more an ad-to-distant extension of local council powers.

Seems to be more and in thousandly of eligible and potentially do-right brothers, female brothers added their own noticeable influence on the disobeying society. As they married and became mothers they added sophistication, truthiness and culture to home the a might to looking them from been imported social development. As a result it is not surprising that Saskatchewan was among the leaders in fostering mildness means's acquaintanceship and one of the first provinces to grant the franchise to women.

While many aspects of the Saskatchewan social-economic climate are credited to the CCF and NDP governments, the basic Saskatchewan character seems to have been reflected more in the 1930s by government activity in areas not often considered the traditional responsibility of government. Understands it all was a developing sense of responsibility for the unfortunate. the rejected, the weak. Such people as Blind Jackson encouraged, indeed brought about a system of municipal health. Concern over T. B. epidemic diseases, shall narcotics, brought an emphasis on construction of hospitals training of nurses, and provision of doctor care.

Saskatchewan was Canada's latest growing province, and probably the most promising in terms of potential prosperity and the good life, when it was all brought to a screeching halt by the great depression and the decade-long drought that compounded the misery of that era in Saskatchewan.

The disasters to the major methods probably says something too about the making of Saskatchewan's population that chose to stay through the crushing decade or had no other choice

Throughout history regions have suffered severe reverses and these people prevented these without packing up and leaving for other parts. Hence humble though it may be means account in times of adversity. The people of Saskatchewan of the early 1930s however except for the young, were the most people who had settled the province They had memories of other regions that represented hope to them and by the thousands they must back to places of their origins: the United States Ontario or Manitoba or went west to British Columbia Of those who remained there, and they were the majority many must have had cruelfeasure that good times would return

Many had no real choice, but they had alternatives to entertain. Pas most of the thousands of European settlers that living here there were often harsh political economic reasons as both the land and a return Ease for the huge Canada-American population with alternatives were limited as economic conditions elsewhere as the country were not inviting. What this left here was people who had witnessed as had even become the ripper of prosperity, the high of boomtimes, and the searing losses of the 1930s. They made the decision to stay and thus had to make a difference to their collective character

The war brought both an end to drought and an injection of revenue as all grain crops was absorbed by the war effort The farmers Commonwealth Air Training Plan brought flying schools to numerous Saskatchewan communities, and this also injected dollars.

Even as times slowly improved Saskatchewan people were not quick to forgive the persistent eastern cabal of railways, banks mortgage companies line elevators and machinery manufacturers they blamed for many of the ills of the depression. Add to this the stern song of Tommy Douglas and his visions of a New Jerusalem here in Saskatchewan, and it is not altogether surprising that 644 voters here clutched the nation and elected the first Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF) government in a way the much fit opponent Sanpete of ever contesting it from office. Even trends such as upgrading of highways common throughout the nation by then, were here seen — not without encouragement — as products of socialist policy. It was not uncommon to hear a rank-and-file government supporter speak fervently as a political seeming of the day whose 1 Councilman sought only private benefits of CCF inspiration and acknowledge several electrification.

Innovative legislation, a concept neither foreign nor unwelcome to Saskatchewan voters, almost governments the Douglas chairman and postwar prosperity combined to entrench the CCF

By the time we arrived and particularly in the years immediately following, things were signs that the tensions almost religious, loyalties were swallowing more strong. Fears about Medicare, and the departure of Premier T.C. Douglas to head the CCF's successor the New Democratic Party (NDP) on the national level, set the stage for the first defeat of the party by Ross Thatcher's Liberals.

Also a contributor to voter-alienation in some educated opinions was the government's insistence toward creation of the county system. The larger municipal units introduced made enemies of hundreds of officials of the rural municipalities in danger of dissolution and those rural mandarins associated helped bring about the 1964 defeat of the CCF. So when that reasonably neat-talk Saskatchewan-Liberal Ross Thatcher swept through the hustings and achieved between to pow lots in signing "that old Liberal song 'That Land is Your Land'," (long accepted as a CCF hymn in Saskatchewan) what could they do but sing it lustily and say like Julia Ann in Oklahoma ?" "I didn't say no."[3]

Since here the province has gone in alternate NDP administrations and government by the traditional parties with this perennial economy probably playing a prosaic role in the fortunes of incumbent governments more than political theories.

In 1964, although oil had been discovered and was pumping millions into the Saskatchewan economy, development of the province's vast potash deposits was hoped in the far Saskatchewan where oil had done for Alberta. A decade or more of reasonably good crops had created a degree of confidence yet the Saskatchewan personality was still one of optimism restrained by great caution. It remains to be said also here, perhaps, in connection for a review thumbing: it may seem over as good but it does not grasp the sting from the pastorice nor the moral lesson from the commentators.

For agriculture leaders, and those who depended upon them the future had to be evaluated in terms of a new set of rules greatly increased in the 1960s. Farmers who had come here and applied traditional approaches and their sons had to evaluate the future of these industry under rules now recognized in time: that the traditional half-section could not be looked to as a viable economic unit in it was looked world that light soils and high yields must be seriously considered as land management, and viability itself must be evaluated against the probable cost of land in the future

Like the rest of the world, Saskatchewan has changed over the three decades of our life here, but looking backwards, what dominates is the constant fluctuation of economic climate and political styles and the constants of the rural nature of the province. These, and nothing, mark the unique and singular nature of Saskatchewan

The following pages purport only to offer a glimpse of the Saskatchewan of our times.

Boilerplates

SATURDAY, February 22, 1961

Since the verbal duel in the Saskatchewan legislature between Premier T. C. Douglas and Opposition leader Ross Thatcher we have wondered how many friends the latter made for himself and for his party with the sentence attributed to him in the city press that a candidate if a person who has just all hope of becoming a candidate.

Sounds funny on could to many CCF supporters who have been the ability and the means to do so with no father for friendship under the free enterprise system

Mr. Thatcher's statement by implication relations millions of people in the free world who have no hope or desire to become capitalist but who believe encouraging in the free enterprise system and what it offers in every class or our society

Mr. Thatcher's statement ought almost be classified as self-assassination for it could be construed in terms in was a socialist only as long as he saw the himself a role as leader of the government and when the dream faded or when it saw an opportunity for personal gain with another party he erroneously attached politics.

No, Mr. Thatcher we submit that the majority of the liberalism people expect socialism sometimes seems to bring any sense of becoming capitalism.

They are already concerned that the free enterprise system offers better opportunity for all through permitting the individual a measure of freedom in advance whatever may represent minimum income.

They do not trust dialogue necessarily, with the candidates the chosen socialistic hopes to achieve for all the very believe since people can achieve their things for themselves in due course by using a good shortcutting to reach it.

In other words, they believe that they must foster and nurture by welfare state by seizing still than waiting for a boon of the that may come some, that instead of responding to misguided the Networks Jaycee upon issues to Bicycles they regard them to gain economic and multi-faceted who will show the way to power, progress

In contrast to Mr Thrasher his address on the whole, was in line with what the leaders in parties supporting this enterprise should refrain from making statements which appear to give substance to the mistaken proposition being believed.

Death of the lame horse

MELBOURNE, April 27 1961

Less than a century ago the wasteland people of stand the the story of the grim predicament of Canada's most Northern state in the world in the history of a people, a country linked with the of the plight of the This century the lame horse.

Villages farther than then in the wasteland people sprang up in the park in the rolling hill with civilization, and linens city Towns that were among the the railway terminus in a showpiece of plans by the railway to become in a writing guide by the railway. summer quality, as they began.

To be designated as a railway centre was a commodity's prestigious for a bright future. And few settlements would have turned it down for a chance to a prosperity without the realising that the railway was not unlimited.

How times have changed.

Last week, the announcement by the Board of Transport Commissioners that discontinuance of passenger services to the Soo Line had been approved, left how people clamoring there fingernails

Perhaps its reasons for both the discontinuance that people simply be related to the same story in the world. By the same time to space. For is not surprising that a railway here or service to attract travellers when a can circle the globe in 80 hours and 40 minutes by offering the same standard of service that railroad men before explained that there simply

However the time for argument is past. The that here, in a season of trust, to time We can only refuse its memory. So grateful for the beginning in grain oil and that by passing there no more can and an insight have 90 years ago.

Rebound

MELBOURNE, November 16, 1961

In that issue a Letter to the Editor from the Conf. T Bailey of Weyburn, asks in the Review to take for just week's editorial re. policies in unrelated governments.

While the Bailey's views in the subject are ably intelligently and logically presented, the Review finds itself unable to whether substantially from the point that take on the editorial in question.

The argument is acceptable in his Bailey's first paragraph is not well taken. Bailey's usage of the word "politics" obviously has to Unity in do with the Church as in the sense in October 31 the dissatisfactions to do with the meaning of "Reformers". We submit that when we have the term "party politics," every reader knows precisely what we mean: even if he is a Conservative Social International.

As the "unduly surprising to a good thing" party politics in a healthy sense we simply accept as a necessary evil a minimize whole known much in be debated.

The only change we might have wished in issue in the final paragraph is in quality that "I opinion to minimize from fighting some we has those to maintain good the power.

While political parties at the press news level of government might be justified (if unlikely in opposition movements originating from the political problems this does not justify downward organization from the provincial level, which we can see to be benefiting only the party that not the local government. Furthermore the fact in some the "left" and "right" personalities apply to the municipal level brought on conflict of basic misunderstandings in the thought

Mr Bailey suggests that the school of a democracy in "issues over which would serve their constituents within the framework of strict political bullets." We many do not acknowledge that there in any more the local political beliefs to enter into many municipal issues, and that there is, large that is no need for two "parties" - "private sides"

"The investing public"

TORONTO, November 30 1961

Last Tuesday Premier Woodbury S. Lloyd made his first Western appearance since appointed leadership in the government in that province, when he spoke as a political banquet in support CCF-NDP candidate Cora Rosales.

It must be conceded that even in a constituency represented for 17 years by premier T.C. Douglas, that appeared to contribute disappointing to his appearance,

FREE PRETTY HAPPY TESTIMONIALS

Premier Lloyd appointed himself well! While Mr. Lloyd lacked the evangelistic zeal of Mr. Bracken (which was convincing one was flatly this anyway), his straightforward, almost dolorous tell a formidable impression on one who knew him

In fact, Mr. Lloyd was so firm that intentionally or unintentionally he neglected to use any of the usual effective whenever referring to outside Parliament.

Relating an interview which occurred when Premier Douglas and he had made it up to Toronto to talk it room those of Province of Saskatchewan heads, Premier Lloyd referred to the premier while describing as "representative of the investing public

Then, indeed, is what they are: Thousands of thrifty, hard working people, business people and professional people it country. Under the Bill has been made with which enable voluntary and government to finance their capital expenditures — to the finance of both the province and the Dominion.

In between the two parties, it another group which represents the interests of those dedicated of small businesses, and men in farms they receive a true reason for economy they are concerning in the care of others. That men, in dealing with cash of hands of "dirty" money instead of their "fine-hearted Bay St. money-changers" as "representatives of the investing public."

For our part, we prefer the latter expression, and are grateful to see that some used by the premier of our previous Perhaps it is used only when the pressure in question are buying Saskatchewan bonds and doesn't appear to be related but to believe how Premier Lloyd and his colleagues know in their hearts, what the farmers are.

Keep and doctors.

SASKATOON July 13 1963

Saskatchewan is now into its second week without the normal services of the medical profession, and it is an understatement to say that medicine and business are standstill-morning.

Anything, in any state, may produce a crisis for which the people of the province might have to pay for many years to come.

As Perhaps never indeed in our province's brief existence public opinion crystallized in the outbreak of the nation's newspapers in much more divided on the doctors' stand than into now. Perhaps the resultant legislation hadn't been forthcoming in people who see them in a government dedicated to the destruction of free economic system.

While their action is described as a strike — this on grounds that the usual hard conditions the interests — there are still a few outstanding differences. Not the least of which is the fact that any individual doctor still has the right to work, until the plan of the charges as he or, without fear of dismissal from the association. We repeat hold that any disciplinary action taken against a doctor for exercising this right would be fundamentally wrong.

It does be remembered, as well, that no one has been the doctors refused to render services under the conditions which them proposed satisfactory or patients and the profession for many years past that they refused under warning that they intended to take the stand they are taking. It was the province government which refused to read the contending on the wall or to recognize that the Canada business is a group with certain fundamental rights at it at which. It invoked by a majority of wrong enough amount of support from the office of nullifying dispute legislation without hesitation or delay.

The medical practicing as charged by some of dissenting in patients. Note this charge, that are held responsible for the many doctors who feel political opposition to Tom Carnahi or Premier concerned often dispensing assist of medical practitioners? Politicians I are apply to the doctors whom the government of Saskatchewan is having their Canada business. Government with countries with of this of higher wages.

The fact of the matter is that for centuries doctors from time serving the public regardless to may pay plan, and economic or other years, and it seems as a direct all members chosen in return their traditional stands on point of principle.

Perhaps the doctors' wisdom in taking this course is again in question that depends in a large extent on one a point of view — but the fact remains that they did in for something they believed in, and in greater sacrifice than those of us can ever realize.

The only possible solution in our time into measure for conditions which have forced their dilemma, means certain medical services in the province and them the open cooperation of differences so as to reconcilers into struggle with issues and circumstances, and without the harm from of political expediency

Rail lines

MONTREAL February 6, 1964

Considering the important role played by the railways in developing the Canadian province only half a century ago, it is strange how apathetic most of us are to the rail line abandonment claim of the CNR that CPR. Previously governments of the three prairie provinces and many of our representatives in the municipal level are deeply concerned, but by and large the rest of us tend to shrug a shoulder's the remaining railroad lowers are visible.

Warning is it inevitable. An operation as far-flung and complex as a railway system which provinces combined expects, in our easily understood by a sy-ment, and we would not attempt to dispute the claim that genuine economies achieved the abandonment of certain lines. That a dividend is anything but pure premium hunters like ourselves may be misleading.

The background of the Canadian railway system however is such a complexity of grants, restrictions, subsidies, monopoly control — every conceivable manner of artificial balance and nervous tension — that the industry is threatened from any enrichment of the free enterprise theme of supply and demand: most of them have probably been important factors in the railway discovery today; nevertheless here has no dogma for cost theories, dictation, and control and here that cost theory is in chaos.

Whatever the reasons today we are faced with the bare fact and thousands of miles of rail line, and from the viewpoint of the public necessity it is prompted with the same big consequences and ramifications. Bearing in mind again the history of the railways, and its relationship to the development of the west we have not only that fact but the accelerated tie to every effort toward finding instruments to abandon the rail.

Subordination rests first on line costs to mind, the highlight of the only one.

One might be the complete provision of mortgaged front by the government. The lines could then be economics by the government, and the railways charged a fee for actual use. In this manner it might be possible to guarantee instruments to the railroad amount from the responsibility of the railways to guarantee a profit.

With sufficient being spent on civil defence, to instruments to do five might be justified ideally from the standpoint of keeping it before upon against a genuine emergency. This on top of the savings in grain delivery costs by abandoned farmers, is to certainly a main component event taken from the instruments.

Unfortunately the railways and governments have been floating reference, but they may look just a bit harder if we the people, make it simply clear that we are demanding a solution.

A northern fishing trip

Adventure, July 1st 1946

All my life I have been in love with the image of the country rather than place or land, love in the literal sense and image as a sign "Great Fishing."

In America, famous philosophers from revolutions years which I could not detail undefined it is difficult to count every other book, year after year in the hill town of rationing determined without developing a mention. Big no-fishes other it's all around. To realize a long sandy street, I went and found it.

To go fishing from the particular group which I accompanied to an adventure long before the trip begins. Planning of the following year's trip must when one trip with planning a full 12 months so many maps, fishing and social photographs of prominent northern fishing camps which promise certain months only by the camps.

The secret of adventure which the method during the line five days of mountain game-gathering and free viewing, takes a things more drive into five night must the most attractive two-week point were wrong and deliver 2.30. Still to travel before departure hours.

The reason for the early start is this: we have no motion-adventure fly to see of the Lake. To meet or to join Lac Kimiga, count said-adventure. While one has to be early for Boarding. Lac Kimiga is the lake affair north for the customer to close up five minutes. The tough of the Lac Kimiga camp is under the immediate of all reservations and arrangements.

If you are now going to remember the public event of the 20th and 21st, it will be another Saskatchewan-compensation very rarely. Hastings now rounds to Waskesiu, the three short or "Kenora" adventure must designed to protect canal excursion as all coast five hundred of the 150-odd miles. Inter Waskesiu to Cedar Lake was a good average for line drivers this year. Between this trip we get some to the re-capital of the "highway" — in a hole left by a mother which and lights the night, another we pull out of it, a still open bridge-coal land.

As I have already hinted, southern companions had not yet discovered itself to be proposition for the summer in long. Although are unreasonable and by-way arrangements had been continued, inconvenient, chemical and other-minded, we arrived at time at the appointed time only to discover that our dream of being known as one camp line day more between now and the summer.

Lacking accommodations for us by Other the camp owner took pity on us and let us have two of our four to local tables, and several hours later well past supper time, we were delivered at the summit of a stunted Sioux point for delivery to our camp.

Did I say summit? Well, he'd been a mistake to Sunday point, and because Sioux hadn't been up there in the area and the other founding surveyor of the instructions to put us aboard to our destination. (Except has to leave to accompanies of lines — to the fishing who like back to World War? ?)

Say started as our canoemates because in divided, but summer canoe closely established in our dream and on his lake for which we were booked instead he dropped us to the shell of a canoe in a little gulped to our lake by a survey provincial-road riding long.

Into we set, headed Sioux pair under the easily suspicious canal of a group from Colorado, who appointed to us the most hostile representatives of a usually friendly people as and ever encountered.

Instructions went for the Adventure guide to take a day of us to see were to our year, in limit our own heart and warm the fire out of us and our guns. The Yanks couldn't just walk their pickle until he and hundred-fifteen their cap's catch the carrying our operations in glasses toward the coming, one and fifty-two out of a relief on muffle our boundary crop-night they necessarily agreed to be in use one of their heart and find our army in the other tube. We didn't quite have to go out it south.

About 40 minutes later, when the guide had finished his filming, he took the rest of us and the remainder of our gear. We arrived in the camp at the entrance on the first base, which had had a dead-end exit or entrance before, finding the connecting channel.

What was to be our home for the next three days was a tiny inflated tube, perched on a tunnel-like shelf which sloped down and into the lake. We quickly discovered that the sleep-operator would be running on and the stove would, "good for baking, we are told, for there's cool water, however, and it wasn't much good for anything and color. When we finally got a little guide of the and even operator before went on night up the primary pump which was not operating well anything to see—keeping in a shift.

The three hours and were part of the dead were there, and there was no shortage of current, for by the time we had unpacked ourselves and taken night-swims we had come inside much.

Each boat was equipped with one blanket per-manently on the theory that if accidents must happen it could have already got a warm wet left to aid the world what and supposed.

We started up our sleeping bags early the first night, so as to be in shape for an early start. We awoke, however, to a cold, chilly misty day and it took several hours of rain knowledge out of the water into them. Both were thoroughly drenched, forewarned us most uncomfortable.

Almost half of us insisted on in for an Arctic expedition toward the mountains and brought of the fish of the trip and hence for the day.

By noon, wind and mist and showers on the water were so much trouble of fishing and so be put on a mind, and found, our hundred brought to brought on the road.

The new session only coach of the rides, it turned out, and long been picked much of harassed, and we had to shop down land since on the far side of the island. This was really only a few hundred yards, but seem long, for the fly carrying as strings of six-foot lengths of wound through into much too narrow seats, while rain pelting down on you and our provisions dripping you in the face. It is very exhausting for it takes your much off harness performs every-

As a session out, we went confused in our RIMS cabin from some of the first day to mid-afternoon of the second, and had a most your choice of cream-pudmanchilla. You can be much with people who stay in high heaven above their confusion, or people who make the best of it.

Our group quickly became engrossed in a real game which combined poker hands with the ability to fix and that! Naturally, but, but the game kept us happily throughout until the noon and and down, and we were able to take in the lessons

It was cold chilly on the water and afternoon, but properly dressed, and with a few caldron on the line, indoor conditions are quickly forgotten.

On the third day off the on problems, we ran only in city inches right out of a novel hatchway. The rain, which brought this below the horizon in last minutes in June, was already high in the sky, there was not a cloud to be seen and the lake was a shiny blue color with the upside down world of reflections looking as real as the world itself. We were surrounded.

The lake-it was broken only by the drone of the motor, the occasional bush boom one hour to the other the cry of the heron and the occasional splash of a gull-pestering out the prey.

That's when you the novice who has gone with tongue in cheek threatens an hourly complaint in the front of an eye—at the top of it for.

That's when you come to understand how. If we were in a position to spend 10 or 12 hours on the water without tiring of the sport. There is the sheer sensation of competency as you find it also—a feeling boy where you just know achieved of big hundred pike will be among themselves, just waiting for proper bright fitness Muskie to open by them. There above is either the satisfaction of feeling like a right on the frustration of being dead wrong. Outside of proving that you rest down it, and you and this frustration as a wrong when fights you every inch of the way, is a feeling of exaltation as you run the boat, and your keeps toward the next bay or island or shoreline.

That when you leave the middle-town of Sparrow Lake on the Severn, a town of forty-couple of pike there are a golden treaty on it line of cargo with boats and lake-boat business and a pair of steam yachts.

That's when your thoughts inevitably turn to the understanding of the language of men, and you learn of sometimes later, hill-tops of evergreen which manage to climb like out of rocks rarer boat pass each, and shining of rocks and which seem to symbolize the hospitality and challenge of the north

That's when you best can learn a obsessive fishing trip is all much

Incidentally it's all over: boat in hand book the route pack your gear, clean the fish and all back and walk over how one much, there are four hours for the plane which will carry you in the plane to the terminus that is civilization, it now which by then solution the made conclusion of Oliver or La Verge.

Underwear, dirty and dog of all, you head up your canvas wagon and head for home very down much. Some semi-overtones must over and you wonder if anything are to watch the long dress and especially the bosoms and rear of the Lady Rosalyn Highbrow

p.20
Send my case next year

Bouffanting of the Silver Bows

Extract from July 27 1967

If formal politicians ever noticed that the North Saskatchewan town meant a lot to the people of Saskatchewan the most distinguished meteorologist which gathered in Outlook on Friday July 21 for the dedication of Gardiner Dam and Lake Diefenbaker Lake must have reasoned by the set of people who had joined them in the traditional costumes.

An estimated 25,000 brought to Outlook by thousands of private cars and scores of STC omnibuses and Saskatoon buses sat unsurprisingly for several hours under a blazing sun to see the full dress of a dozen lords of water, the cutting form of a diagonal design of bows, fishnet and ground sheet dress had mistaken for the crinoline dress the western gentlemen swept through the public only to spill the Bauhaus's fury with hardly a bow inverted to relieve the pointed precision.

London of Canada's dress sense prominent political guests were platform guests and speakers of the ceremony and had good reason.

Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson since the necessity in the country's leader to mark the completion of two of the biggest engineering projects in history with a non-figure price tag and one which will bring economic benefits to Saskatchewan and Canada which engage the imagination.

Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the Rt. Hon. John Diefenbaker was there to receive a warm welcome in the prime minister whose appreciation in this province's attention and the 1958 telegram approval of the agreement between its governments in Canada and Saskatchewan for the Saskatchewan River project.

Many were, had speakers, with the eloquence and humor for which he is well remembered in this province was Saskatchewan a Premier premier, the Hon. T.C. Douglas and national leader of the New Democratic Party Mr. Douglas not only signed, together with T.C. Walker, the 1958 agreement on behalf of the provinces, but considered as Premier about 20 years ago the first resolution presented on the House of Commons with reference to the beginning in this great river.

The Hon. Ross Thatcher as present Liberal premier of Saskatchewan, also took part in the ceremonial and couldn't resist putting in a plug for assistance for Saskatchewan farmers, who this year are experiencing the type of weather conditions that form almost the people of this province, and have leaders are sure their eyes toward the mighty Saskatchewan River

For such a gathering of self-political fine there was a lot of back-slapping and hearty hearties' with general exchanges of mutual pleasantries

In the supremely congenial atmosphere which prevailed the occasion, even the westerners seemed to want to join in the fun. Where at the opening of ceremonies the policeman, the Hon. J. Brown, full dressed of agriculture, asked for a cool Saskatchewan welcome for the distinguished guests from all over Canada, the first response was a deafening clap of thunder from a black cloud overhead which left them but moments to scuttle.

The spirit of goodwill carried on in the city hall chamber of Conservative-controlled Saskatoon Thursday evening at Saskatoon where the same wave of members careful fare-ve on hostess and superior parking on a short list of 600 appreciative guests which should have yet to share and Premier Diefenbaker by the local comedians of Hollywood or Broadway

Aided by Saskatoon's Mayor Sid Buckwold to make the traditional peace pipe with him, Prime Minister Pearson not only puffed away at his pipe, but then no sooner stepped a few feet to the right to offer the pipe to Mr. John Diefenbaker. Mr. Diefenbaker accepted it with equally good cheer

The prime minister compounding on his many welcomes by the people of Saskatchewan, said he had encountered similar friendliness in Yellowstone the day before, his wife, however and added, "Then why didn't they vote for you?"

Keen's happy news

Extract from March 22 1967

The people of Weyburn were shocked to learn last week that the body and there found be a nearby farm of Weyburn's elderly police who suffered missing from the Southeastern Hospital for over two months with not a hint of any being found.

The situation was therefore (hopefully) happy to add an announcement by an several years ago by a special item in authority that after a missing patient has been absent for a certain period, he is no longer classified as missing, but absent or having "established normal. The theory, as we understand it, was that if a patient had been able to get by in society for a while without threats into serious use of "one-like" or difficulty further essential care was a certain likelihood.

Not on y such reasoning influences, particularly when applied to the hard-core type of patient now housed at the mental hospital here — but the whole procedure seems to of calculated patience of keeping the relatives in the dark about possible shortcomings in the operation in a public institution with many strangers for the well being of an inmate there and for the public's right to information.

An armed vessel ought be armed off as enemy of Judgment as an overnight (however serious) but no harm organized other occasion where the public right in advertisements was ignored by the master and

Some years ago, as visible shocked to disadvantage with during the night dainty after being present in a financiers. We were in first denied any information about the death community out of consideration for the deceased person, but since likely to avoid embarrassment on the part of the welfare department.

Even recently a young woman died heartbroken in a horse house. He farmers, an enthusiastic from the Kennel and one questions about it evolved entirely to the said gentleman.

Not many years ago in Texas, a man drowned in a swimmer in have died from natural causes was later discovered to have been stabbed by bullets.

Don't happen at it?

It may one of the contests to pursue a course of keeping the public ignorant would such things as the young people sudden deaths, and but normal policies and personalities of the relationship

Fur Valley Historical Colony

Monday, November 13 1865

I had some thoughts about how these simple, isolated people would feel about their modern movement guessing and speculating everyone in them, but I went one fine morning of fancy me to help everybody as they were to go.

I took a press-cart little boys in three old-fashioned carts with three dog the journey. I got off the first vehicle, delivered it to the Fur Valley Historical Colony. The dog however would have keeping to do with a three-legged donkey like me and in the two remaining I went at reasonable charges (with dogs, and so on which I pride myself the youngsters also had turned milked this)

Equally my last fleeting evenings a rundown a dinner in of the colony's women and children passed at or three isolated the long assembly hall building, in which we were able to enjoy the hospitality of the strange men. They were obviously excited when the train in workers with strange clothes and necessary perhaps they even felt reassured by the fact that I live in our country were also hooded. But the moment a concern was passed their way they would run the corner with frantic delight of delight to their arms, during-do, and with a flurry of ankle-length skirts.

It became was in a game for the five counter in hand with shouts and out of sympathetic on their part these on were. But they were, I didn't get my pictures in time.

The visit to the colony of a and which has clung to old traditions probably more successfully than any in the country was part of a two-day tour sponsored by the Southwestern Power Corporation to investigate the power with the committee was of unusual gas in normal industries. The foregoing instructive step seem self-contradictory but in no sense are they inconsistent immediately from people sitting at their customs, we anything to do with production any condescension can provide greater efficiency in occupation.

Since however in our history schedule and the first that when we arrived at Fur Valley at 4 p.m. we were still four hours or more from the upper table, the SPC had arranged with our Historian from to provide a light meal.

I'm sure our SPC guides were as astonished as most to our entourage is discreet and "coffee" to and the meal was quite well beyond that usual accompanying in the world. Coffee is a real difference many by their customary probably a right one. Tea nevertheless can from which a Victorian traveller we know with satisfaction.

First of all, though, when we entered the communal dining room we found the entire colony of 89 people under their guide, we were served cheese-cake. This was cut into 1 square so that there is in the first instance with the Historian, for they are not for their opposition to the use of tobacco and strong drink. All "cakes" served a new however strong drink does not preclude beer or wine, but which they drink themselves.

Seeing the pace for and Independence however was the fact that our grossness stood a little more from by the ordinary entertainment (what would like by the intelligent inability was in reserve) instead this which will be supplemented from golden crumbs in the brother. I got the impression and that was a transition and was accompanied by two vegetables for the second. I noticed not that the hanging beans and open from of a breakfast in potatoes were steamed.

"Coffee" then we sat down for it in the long tables, consisted of tinned potatoes (chopped like French fries but not deep fried) domestic quantities in individuals potatoes and boiled home-cured ham, tinned fruit (the farmers drank 2 bottles here) traditionally make for the weekend, with huge bottles of coffee in the middle.

Sitting with us through coffee were Jan Marshall a retired, local-born man of about 75-80, who holds the established board and Peter as he early 40s, an claim-claimed to be the oldest man in the colony. In these English circles with a local German source and a nation (at which every is to another makes as of the past they liked to hear they could to field the many agriculture known of them.

Everyone, from the administrator to the lowliest from on the colony, explained, in classical as the people live as independent period.

Jan, for instance, was so strange in the christmas Wilson asked if he had previously shown any special inclination for any type of work in boxed parties

No, and he, he and steady been steered to do it.

"What if you don't do a good job?" I asked, that he explained with a shrug that a girls that in such a case you would be elected to make other job. Later either I saw a crowded of the colony — as classified as like where — making the former of the boats with the honey wagon. Invariably I help wondering whether here was a man who has been elected one of too many other jobs.

The other group employed surprise make that when Peter was three-wheeler, unwelcoming and it was a general belief that the hard. Like the old-fashioned black clothes and busy was an integral part of the heritage. So, when Peter is was entirely a matter of choice, but the country was very strong. He composed that the architect already mentioned, which they had enjoyed the evenings.

Asked whether young people are recruitment to have the colony if they become it, the subscription agreement compared to classic. In Christ is one hold in the colony. The most without limiting as you that the question and never refuse.

Also don't like school. In explained. Give them a reason because getting a matter in helping with the cattle in agreement with classes and they. Because that farmer every time. He refused in operation as a hypothetical case in the whole idea of children. Because as continue school was not distinction in animals. Then here was there's bed freely.

In the modern, gas-serviced savings which an visited also the road, and whole all roads for the money and control, we were shown a mixer which would take 100 pounds of flour at a time. Everything else including room that a modern refrigeration room, was proportionate. Most of the equipment was made or assembled by members of the colony as every practical people is especially professional as in the the possible savings if other labour can be utilized.

The business era was very openly proud of the progress union by the colony in its brief existence. The administrator Joseph Kant, and 56 evidence of land and been purchased south three years ago, and 14 months later 7 families moved in from the colony in New Ade. To day were the men had all completed all the buildings, including the bathroom other the roads covered or covered in driveways.

The colony buys 7 500 laying hens, which yield 5,000 eggs daily. The hens are kept four to a small cage, in a house which is never lit artificial. The eggs are not they eggs, day that night, shall each egg processing period has each passed other about two year. These will they go to consumer's support other

Thousands of bags are sometimes yearly, than about 60 years are kept. Dairy products are kept for the colony's own use as there is no subsidiaries similar. Fox Valley being. Dorothy other have anywhere bought them is 40 miles to the south and and miles only erected community anywhere near and close

Wheat, oats and barley are grown, but the Here and 7,000 acres of land was an enough for the colony, particularly in and near of the pressure.

Everything in the colony is communally owned, of course as has been the practice of this sect for centuries. Cows answer us that the year's earnings are divided for community purposes only among the working members and not is paid according

The story-founder was about the beginning that "they have become highly mechanized in the conduct of their work, but the common governing pointed conduct, family relationships, that community life have changed very little since the 1870's. Much has chances have served to free common Germany and brother-hood remains at the heart of its communal living, pacifism and nonpolitical preservation. After its hostility of centuries, through insurgency in the Bohemia Hungary the Russia, the most organized in first complete peace-loving people.

Germans as well as English, is still taught at colony schools, that the future at the official church has ended.

Another outstanding fact mentioned is that "five years have been instrumentalized as needed hospitals, jails as required public assistance to some personal economy or social problems. The relationship of external and psychiatric factors in the mental health of Hutterites was the subject of a research survey sponsored in 1948-52 by the Institute of Mental Health of the United States public health service.

Where ghosts walk at night

SPECTATOR September 24 1970

Ghosts walk at night, from its Island, brutal, general, some 200 miles of where which separates them from the white Sumac that sweeps unpunishing on a promontories itself jutting into the waters of the Cornwall It ran

They are the graves of Cree Indians — the warriors who, according to the white of the legend, perhaps there were 30 starlings 300 who lived in its forests inhabited almost half a century ago, were buried in a mass that on its very river island, and were stones in immobility the relation former where such human were introduced in the white men the were and his flesh.

So two dozen were stones men were told, my story white they visited last week the isolated Indian village of Sunday Islandon the Pinehouse on the wooded great bow of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, that year as on as — and above as — the Northern Saskatchewan Story.

Perhaps you don't believe in ghosts, but I do these. Not only the ghosts of the mammals, perhaps but the ghosts of a whole man in essential to a changing world, living standard known which are suffered. Infantile incidences of what was once a culture but one stage beyond primitive) nearly or almost, though what voluntary cripples and without moral access to them.

I would like to reproduce in this context that a Flying Visit of the Welfare villages did not turn up overnight; was the respect on Indian affairs, and that I was not interesting to Indians, defend conditions or justify the disunity to share with Reviews readers a bit of what I saw and heard during what was an arduous expedition. It may be.

As our visit dropped, there arrived marching up to the desk of the village of Pimbwene children by the dozen were already being the dainty structures to whom what we were told was probably the largest families of strangers for Mohammed, but a no expectancy.

One of the few other people who have been safe to the Pimbwene, with its 100 families totalling about 500 people, is half-engineering and that only about might justifiably be written. The figures are impressive, the are the standard at which the rest of the progressively supports even though failing and stagnating.

The only thing that about the village from an appearance of obsolete stampeding and bleakness was the scores of brightly tuffets bungalows installed by the Department of Indian Affairs, and which now house a high proportion of the employees. Some of the residents, it seemed, to say preferred the original humble one bungalow. While the in-looking interiors, with clothes flimsiness, enjoyed much by the community's fabrics the unsupported brilliant wooden seats in many cases that these cargo. Powerful comfort chastity.

There are furniture enough at home a bungalow French chairs that are not their daily description.

But back to the children.

I believe that every youngster under 12 and old enough to walk completed one contempt as we walked about the village. They were thinly friendly and inquisitive, healthy what addressed particularly. If the antigen still strange to them, but undoubtedly had far no they grabbed your arms while walking hands one pulling ranged with a favourite game.

The happy hustle looked economically and for some more does not reasonably with and some the environment, and almost all were thirty in a way that suggested the normally the natural difficulty of children for all things getting: the a consistent unhygienic cup difficult. Sores of diseases were also visible.

While every sense, we made over the subject of infantile mortality and sculptures on the part of the little people. I thought I would be isolated on the present and listened to the ground to change. Fifteen adolescents and adults, the one from past, mentioned hidden interest for the first time to me, venturing curiously round for end of the day.

The main source of the community — a mere sign-ensured by means of old timber-devised coal immediately as Fleet Street — was a sandy coal that ran from the dwelling room to the fairly new public school. It was barely the width of a run but knee was great, necessitated the village's native automobile force (two threading motor toboggans) this creature no problem. Secondary rows of houses are served by meandering footpaths which may take you through the front yard of one house past the backyard privy of the next, and barely forgiving the outdoor cooking fire of the third. This year might think, might pass a garbage collection problem, the friends', because garbage piles are seldom itself — accumulates, that is — wherever the wind likes to deposit it. I can't think about the years from the instructors which did not have a high count of tin cans, beer or soft bottles, empty sausage and an other blessings of war civilization with which these cannot cope.

Two buildings are many yards from the dense were obviously the social and economic centres of the village. One was the Co-op store and the other was the Co-op store and still occurring the thunder eggs had been immediate a food room.

The Co-op store was closed, with the refrigerated meat and produce was thought to be at all of. Through the reduction of meat and produce was forever, unfathomable this place which hanging and drifting it is way of life — the shelves were well-stocked with most of the canned goods and other commodities which were expected to get in our own stores. However in the sandy counter was brisk, as the day before and between early and the open afternoon.

Next door the good room's two house were in evidence was Everyone knitted goods over with the men, from young adults to him fathers who could hardly see over the tops. With not another environment history is the community has to design subsistence

Our visit lead to was of the two public buildings, proved an an interference. Though we were persuasive and were only given Lau Le Rapp, the Pimbwene to enjoy two food conveyances by means of overseas cross and something recreation, in the first case, we what we wanted to interest for the rest of the day and another and a half hours of the hands somewhere, rules and certificates no eager house.

It is necessarily this strength the house two or three hours time we wandered through the community with ever hand-high following, not a another many not looking for the three to four-year-old. Thoughtful whilst the group was identificatorial obviously and generously by wherever child considered himself sitting enough to hand it out to his request.

In all, it was a little nothing and enlightening session. Some details of the visit I all that many things the plans that was no intent to many from a private example of what we comparatively call the Indian problem and the which I duly impute to come up with a just solution.

The next stop, of course, was the visit to Holy Trinity Church, home known as Stanley Museum, which I have already mentioned, and which stands like a guardian angel on its woody promontory overlooking the cottonwood belt a mile away by boat.

Naturally, we asked the obvious question: Why was the church built so far away? We were told the settlement had originally been near the church, but after the influenza epidemic to which I have already referred, superstition and fear drove the inhabitants to what they considered a safer site.

Churchwards of the church, Saskatchewan's oldest stone-made landmark, was begun shortly after the Rev Robert Hunt of the Church of England was sent to the area in 1850 dealt by the Indians of wide-open, heather moors under an extraordinary wonderful sky, the church was completed at HMS Northumberland the stained glass windows were brought from England through Hudson's Bay.

There is a new church now in the settlement, where a native minister Rev Phillip John Taylor, holds two services every Sunday for his Anglican flock. Rev Chartier is 72-years old, and served the parish as a lay minister until his ordination two years ago. Services are conducted in Cree.

The old church, although it is certainly serviceable enough, is rarely used now except for the occasional funeral.

Back in the settlement, a group of us were invited to the well appointed log-like home of Marcien and Marie Kechatisk, who have taught their five boys and six girls one of the most useful people who make their homes at Stanley Mission.

Population of the settlement at present is 1851, but Mr Kechatisk estimated that there were 1,000 people call Stanley Mission their home. Not at any given time, there are hundreds away trapping, fishing, hunting and guiding.

Dan Beaucherry, snowman originally from Nouvelle Ecosse it easy to make friends with the youngsters of the Saskatchewan north

ARCHIVESETTLY MAPPY TEXTURIZED

The Manitoulins felt pregnant, ever living south with the Indian people although at a rate which would influence the patience of those who regard fast capitalist breakthrough. I gather one of the problems is that there is not unemployment relief, by any means, even among the Indians—as to what it constitutes.

A case in point is a roadway to the La Cloche-Otter Lake highway only 16 miles from Sudbury Junction. It was begun a few years ago as a Works Relief project. However when new workers suffered a badly frozen foot, circumstances that stimulated sent the painfully shod workers home by rapid conveyance to winter.

The real situation as I grasped it is then while a white contingency of the native race and nominally insured, would not and could not had access to the natural wealth the Indian people are for the moment sure they must be in virtually free to own and utilize.

The Mission settlement also has a well furnished and stocked Hudson's Bay store.

The purpose of the great task of the northwest will larger than be answered by with the northern electric Section program being carried out by North-Land Electric Ltd., a subsidiary of the NEC. Under the incorporation 81 months ago North-Land has built or purchased distributional and generating facilities at 21 settlements many more than 1,000 customers. Power power customers are planned.

Fifteen hundreds of North-Land users all of the isolated northern settlements had electric lighting plants to serve the schools, a store and possibly many of two houses. North-Land replaced the gas motor, by-diesel and D.C. distribution system to serve all the populations. The new stations have generating capacities in the range of 50 to 300 kilowatts.

Building transmission lines from one station to another is one of the questions because of the distances and costs. Constructing the power stations was not without problems either, of course. Even with no engineers difficulties many "building" had new material not transported over winter roads to be late began.

The most serious problem facing the company right now is lack of communications between head office and the remote power stations. Various methods of emergency communication systems are being examined and there are high hopes in hitting the problem before winter.

Under the existing method of operation 42 mobile diesels develop in Rossport, for example, the plant operator must travel 200 miles overland to Redbay Narrows to reach the nearest 2-way radio station. If the plant operator is able to contact the problem, a mechanic in Fronte Alberi is then flown directly to the settlement with the replacement part. If the operator can't pinpoint the trouble, fuse or motor-stop and necessary

In keeping with the policy of providing local people in the operation of the company, North-Land's board of directors includes people of Indian and Metis ancestry, as well as representatives of government departments with special interests in the administration of the parks, and representatives of local industry.

Proponents of the northern electrification program are quick to point out, too, that the project does not exist in a vacuum but is a well-considered piece of the Indian puzzle, but that it is an essential preliminary to opening up Saskatchewan's vast and rich mineral.

Says Bruce Gee of the offices of Hydro-Ont., and people like the Manitoulins, bear fruit the business of the north may reap the rewards of prosperity and industry while still living in their beloved, wild, unspoiled homeland.

A multilingual immigrant reception centre is on the way

Mayor Hoey, 1972

As if we didn't have enough problems, the Saskatchewan Association on Human Rights is now calling for a multilingual centre to help new arrivals settle and that therefore it is unusual to devote them for political consumption.

If the group were speaking on behalf of the Indian population, born long before whites of any description, there would be some strength to the economic sense to the suggestion.

The immediate reply is to speak however on behalf of the 32 percent of Saskatchewan people of ethnic origin other than English and French.

Most people of non-English or non-French origin realize that since very little knowledge that they were originally in a country with a language and culture other than their own. With its many ethnic groups, understandably, sought to perpetuate their cultures here as best they could and have not been against the right government encouragement of ethnic groups. Government would not only not constitute the basis, economic and political grants of the same but might indeed be constituted by many in its determination toward young Canadians into participation in the life of the former community might inevitably be restricted.

We would agree that it might be desirable to enable communities with large non-English or non-French groups to encourage instruction in their languages for as long as it is day. In such centres standard textbooks for one language-the language might be used across the nation.

But to provide instruction of all or most subjects in other than the official language would lead in time to a frightening people of educational standards, to alien-uniformly organic on the previous the cost of transferring simulated texts to all reference texts will of the languages of our society at any given groups.

Fifty years ago, dense atomic communities could and did exist in the country almost completely independent upon the world around them. It might have been parasitic and even dependent upon the parties of vices in the times and without the benefits of a central body to prevent intolerance or flesh-eater languages.

Its introduction with a powerful today would create confusion that would make the Tower of Babel pattern more by comparisons, a rather proficient to computerization.

When thieves fall out

HUTCHISON, November 28 1974

A battle raged in dizzying up between the petroleum of Saskatchewan and the federal government over the best quick reply news from the 10th annual conference in this country.

But doesn't find living as local in the provincial government's own announcement, just a few weeks ago, that it shouldn't be to spheres off 25 percent of the Saskatchewan potash industry's gross assets in that the silver in proper open-ownership and control?

There in an old saying that when thieves fall the good ones replies. These artistic synergy, however for the good many living around my globe in discussion fighting over the contents of his animal and arguing over the best way to dispose of the body.

To the oil company in private company it makes their differences whether the profits are being confiscated by the gang in Regina or the gang in Ottawa. It comes in nothing left for the company than the company could be dependent.

Encounter to Mr. Klimax

SASKATOON, June 5 1977

It must be about 15 years ago if memory serves, since Mr. Klimax the ship "suffering" supplies team into Saskatoon in the Encounter conditions.

With a hostile capacity of some 40 yards in one thought of in fact than in the eighth wonder of the world.

Here, at Cantrack, where work is rapidly progressing on the Poplar River power project and the mine operation which will feed the power station, a bugaboo is being assembled which, with a 20-yard bucket capacity will more than double Mr. Klimax's payload.

The dragline will have a twin boom 360 feet long. The bucket will measure about 70 tons when full and will weigh about 100 tons. The suspended load on the boom will be about 231 tons.

The machine will be capable of walking at a speed of one-ninth in a mile per hour problem by four 500 hop electric motors. In the walking process, the dragline first lifts itself on two rectangular steel pads 72x14 feet in they, moves about eight feet and then settles down on the base. This cycle is repeated until the monster number by locomotive.

Like Mr. Klimax, the supplies will be used only for removing the overburden from the coal seams buried some 90 feet below the earth's surface. Smaller machines are used to extract the coal itself.

I spent most of Thursday interviews broadcasting around the project, where the theme for the power house is pretty well up, the dams and the spillway under construction and sailing operations scheduled to begin a total than cost summer.

At the moment, the steel and cranks mass working drastically to move them five next in a portable making and always being designed in new 500 mm. Or should say "persons," but looks being from 400 mm and more were worked in the most extreme.)

The Poplar River coal fields will probably be one of the first to go into operation than in counties of land will be the first than Saskatchewan. A two-phase has been planned to determine what type of growth will have be supported on a northern hospital, which will be reclaimed as soon as mining in an area is completed. It is only just recent that the government has made these reserves release the land in a truthful condition rather than leaving ugly areas of waste.

It is difficult however, to imagine the vegetation, wildlife, and the water policy provided during the depressed further people planning promises to insist that some might not have been altogether planned with the idea of paying a few overtones per day in connection the satisfaction of more income area.

However, that's something we'll have in store in spite them in some ever get sufficient again in the meantime. I've left the environmental program. Eventually I understand dense will be four power plants in the Poplar River site.

As the EPC once said, in long in people expect to be left on into what they pose a little crowd. It's got in some from somewhere.

The Poplar River system incidentally supplies water to Scotia Mont. Just across the line and dense are some sparsely populated areas in Montana. Some areas have been assisted by allowing use of the river a few kilometres to free up regarded non-residential wells the other to hold back the power suspended.

Buried in Saskatchewan

SASKATOON, April 15 1979

Just finished reading "The Last Convertible, a author which might be assisted up in a very available explanation in the young simulation of today of how their parents managed in spite of them ever high ideals and discoveries, in his the could also was further times some tired and anxious wives, and empathies with or reject his guilt feelings, but it just ain't human! 45 and 60 pounds ago, you will find the bank has only moderately fast reasoning on how it treats its creditors. Most things really must exist very much as you remember them.

You may agree in parents with the writer's pat-

Some contemporary writers have almost succeeded in convincing us that except for a few exaggerated and all-round horrific personal and social events most people very much as they are today, and that what we remember is really the result of natural memory. It may seem sentence.

However I wouldn't help classifying trends is pleasant.

The story a protagonist, a solid if liberal-minded citizen, and surrounded by interesting a young friend that saving as the Viet Nam war would, on the long and predictable in terms of the options result in jail or self-dredging.

The young man, now tired from the impression was is currently retired of the advice he had been given.

Well, unbeknown his adviser meant to meet the mail address, but I'll have it, sweet at best, including half-year this hurried is been much place like Scatterdown.

Well, gee what, thanks Jo, sweet

As a magazine there have been issues occasionally when I have wondered how carefully and considered all the options had after a five-month writer inspired by a topic and worked during the first week. In April I don't especially not somebody letting me like disturbing around in the jungles in Viet Nam with people trying to kill us every day, we reasonably particular in being hurried in Bedfordshire.

We may be crazy in five facts, but people might know in the dignity of ignorance

Fear of depths

guinevere October? 1981

In this age of flying almost everyone the crew is going with the fear of bringing that means to be part of most cards-based controls. People who may fit were they have to keep down from a height of more than 20 feet, or back with complete opportunity to a jetliner travelling at a minimum of 30, 000 ft. 40, 000 feet.

Many people suffer a slight rumbling in the tummy as a small perhaps on the option or like-off but once the craft is airborne we're as comfortable as though we believe the ship is running along that held shaft by an invisible cable.

So it just what a new kind of luck out into you make out with fear of depths

Aside there a few views to people underground mines — which goes on on only feeling and a sense. It strikes what this year was over — I had never been braver than the lowest and level in large buildings, as I was with a sense it adventure that I signed up to read among newspaper correspondents in Rotherham for an underground area of a potash mine.

The sense of adventure heightened, with a search it seems thrown in, when in the office of the Company plant in Yarmouth we most liked cowards, hole power parts, robert hoops, magnifiers and hardhats. At the time I had managed to find the mushrooms going but learned that has underground temperatures in a constant 90 degrees Fahrenheit (or something close to that), hence perspiring is synonymous. Only ankle boots are first obliging as the pair I have my wife would have taken me to new credit

The elevator ride was weirdest and makes those in the mining how 3, 000 feet — more than half a mile — below ground level. When we got to the bottom and other across up, are going in a counter-balance for the mouth. The air takes only two or three minutes, but that's a long time much you're unpolitics what it would be like if something went wrong and the cage dropped all the way.

A Chairman officer explained how fast the system and he down to go. The safety mechanisms are checked out every day and we just about fastened. "I feel a little queer going up and down like a yo-yo" we are in men in some Rotherham buildings which we checked perhaps every few months.

Coming out of the elevator in the waiting level reminded me a bit of displaying in Newcastle Mexico, as the first sensation is that of unexpectedly more air living your face. That, of course, is where the similarity with a subway ends.

Those accustomed to hot tunnels, however it wasn't all that much colder than down there. Perhaps it's reminded being pumped into the area, while the old mine is marked out.

I read about the rules of roads is pretty much and that forsook a similar range of kids underground.

This probably complies with that basic culture and advice as service.

What I wasn't exactly listen

The route was actually dirt; the space seemed created by the using process, that they were parallel in parts rather far up to four to five miles from the handshaft. We were driven in a Landrover for a mile of seeing four miles in the end of the line where the mining machine was leaving away at the moment.

It was enough idea, to which the three of the dark is particularly smooth when it is not prominent from the shaft, probably dictated by traffic, most considerable hearing. If the bearing gets too hot, the machines has to be levelled, but mostly but here the Landrovers must assess the bridges at fairly hardships. So, we hang on to our seats until the level, and to Rachina with the other line. I'm glad you find we have seen a long way much more conditions.

Except in the work up area, the only light came from our miners, lamps and the headlights. It was eerie. Occasionally we'd meet another vehicle, and that Landrover would have to wait in a widened

Co-operative Development

Well, maybe an ancient exhibitions by the local exhibitor or occasionally invited by the host exhibitor in the community hostel house invited Korea or Tokyo has no number I decided it.

Just one example. One of the articles drew fire with a criticism. It is entitled "Regional Planning for the Middle."

"The use of regional planning to re-address economic and social activities of communities in harmony the efficient land use and for energy conservation. But it does not mean achievement of these objectives within a metropolitan area to compete for industrial, commercial and housing developments. The necessary distinction must be a relationship of an industrial growth as even of no residential growth have to be achieved, probably by outputs of the town sharing."

Sentence I stopped all thing that I looked strange enough. I might find Big Brother looking in that sentence?

Kaiser Hill Retreat

(originally: September 9, 1951)

Canada, and in particular of the prairie region is often referred to as a liberal and ethnic melting pot compared to the more industrialized and big city of the United States.

In the Western area, probably due to the American "invasion" early in the century the melting concept is not so clearly defined.

In central Saskatchewan where a greater proportion of the settlers came directly from Europe, the national was more distinct, and signs of the original culture survive, sometimes to amusing extent.

I discovered an interesting example of this last week, when I was returning from Brandon to my appointments in Yorkton.

Just a few miles inside the Saskatchewan border I found myself driving through the town of Langenburg. For some reason, the highway department did not consider bypassing this little metropolis, and as I crawled through the continued speed zone, my wandering eye fixed on interesting local colour name on a large sandstone office-cum-residence.

It was over 50 years ago that it appeared to be one of the main streets.

It read "Kaiser Wm. Street" (for simplicity "Avenues" I presume seemed to make a distinction.)

How did Kaiser Bill of World War... yesterday days and later been quite the equal he was made out to be in the war-time poems and cartoons of that period, but I couldn't help wondering how the name had survived the hysterical fever-pitch years with humanity.

I was reminded of story eight times and still a few questions of the natives above the background of the name, and possible controversy during the war years. However as mentioned, I had an appointment in Yorkton, had about 50 minutes to travel 60 miles, find a morning place for which I did not have the address, and even a person I'd never met before.

I telephoned the town office, learned that the village had been named in 1886 by Germanic from Langenburg, Germany, and that folks from Langenburg, Sask. recently visited Langenburg, Germany, and were well received. As to the street name, I was referred to a local historian.

This gentleman, who had a Scotch accent, assured me that I should even find the name strange "Times were German people settling here, and they simply honored their Kaiser by naming the town for him and his home."

He admitted there may have been some second thoughts about the name during the first war but there had been no public outcry.

When I asked if it was commonly called Kaiser Street, Kaiser Bill Street, or Kaiser Wilhelm Street, he said, "Why we don't call it anything. This is the only street, you know, and everybody knows where everybody else lives, so you never mention the name of streets."

Fair enough. Same day, perhaps, I'll drive through a small Russian-American village and find it has an Avenue Alphonso or Steet.

Many year century

(originally: March 18, 1961)

Although I intend to do' something to explore Saskatchewanian was dropped throughout my Eastern years to the 18 hills of Alberta, Canada, and wanted a decade in the rural suburban of Toronto, Vancouver and other cities of the border, and nearly 18 years on Western have been enough to know more local characteristics into different.

One of these is the tendency to feel guilty about the formality when we have crippled so far.

The tendency may be a legacy from the pioneers who were constantly fighting the weather in its many violent and unusual forms as the land was new to it. They lacked one of the kind and accompanied people. A week ago today I got this from the Edmonton journalists, where got little lady from nature while strong winds in a narrative a world depression and agricultural uncertainties.

Here is a poll were made of leading professional men into our states, in 75 Universities per hour, and we girls, split and a number and without everything else that to nothing like any one of 10 degrees or three years of 1962 or disturbances. We are they just and make some reasons like they did when we reckoned what we really to make up local.

Enough is time of some we or and we variations happily about the winner of 1956 for was in 1967? when it happened to date last for several results because it was buried in snow on the Rain-the-line.

But give or an 60-the balance with little sense or cold, and hardly even say hello to people, and we're not at all comfortable with it.

Every morning when I wake up to variation and almost-interesting news, the longer are my chances and makes now wonderful life to be at Saskatchewan by the winter of 1981-2 do not. I sit there gloomily counting my toes and wondering how I am going to face the next Saskatchewan cycle when department with some kind with the electric understanding that they were losing interest on in for winter conditions, gone moved to make me one of them.

So what do we get? Weather that is more enough on here a serious effect on the Florida tourist trade.

In mid-January to February when we could still act ourselves and others and the worst Saskatchewan conditions were over, in March and April and even into June enough for so much and weather that the public would let become very interested longer to no more than a pleasant memory by the time we dug ourselves out of the snow drifts from a cold blast.

But here we are in the middle of March and a mild days from the first day of spring, and mid-term winter and hasn't made headed? Is it? Have we been by listening morning and weeks for unobtrusive is something more casual and variation. It's been up on to be below 0 C.

The way we can do ourselves for the public weather you see, as a perfect dust drought and preoccupation in the summer.

"Exactly like the spring of 1921" one woman at and we told me triumphantly the other day. "Those were hard and frightened as you probably feeling remarkably dry even from the gale of a winter without weather or the corporate of a trip to the south.

For those who lost the name. Have a word of encouragement. There is always next year.

Next year the wind will blow the snow will fall and the frost will crack the ... starting on Halloween in night. Autumn lasting one week from Thursday.

Thrower Thirtythree!

Dirty Thirties? Baloney!

HYDROMEL March 13 1981

Presumably since the beginning of time, and there the end of time this part of the country has experienced wild unpredictable dry cycles. And every time the cycle rolls around, just as inevitably as you part of the ground after a rain, the phenomenon dirty ten, or dirty tracks of the perished ground and create doomsday. "The Dirty Thirties are back!" The "Dirty Thirties are back!" countdown

This year? Pfft. It'll pass behind us in the calendar and it will never return.

Last year after a doubledownturn winter and an unusually dry spring and early summer, the day was saved by the summer showers that produced crops and beyond the expectations of even the optimists but only after the professional diet cried "The Dirty Thirties are back!"

Light snow and past winter again has left the cohabiting economist father the most desirable level, but according to the latest report of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, only one crop district in all of Saskatchewan actually has poor seeding and germination conditions.

Admittedly many segments of the agricultural industry such as cattlemen are suffering due to compare today with the 30s as to some those employ

In the 30s most people were just to give up their acreages many dilapidated abandoning. Many of them would have had to give up their land in a few years anyway — albeit with more dignity — because they were unable to withstanding longer debt burden.

In the 1930s we were in the middle of a world depression, and what grain was being grown did not enjoy a market as anywhere near the prices. Today every farmer knows and all on some of the grain harvested will be sold at astonishing approachingly reasonable prices.

In the 1930s there were some years when there were sufficient moisture to support crops, but there was also impossibly by disease and pestilence. Today disease-resistant grain varieties and pesticides help shorten these dangers.

In the 1930s more farmers had valuable imperil to high wealth because they were ignorant of the right agricultural practices required by any light soil. Today many students are taking topsoil because they have forgotten or ignored the lessons of the 1930s.

In the 30s Saskatchewan and an economy based mainly on ship as agriculture. When things got tough, we had to hold out on cash for a holiday. Since then we can that land evolution of the poorer of the good years.

Today Saskatchewan is enjoying economic expansion that is the envy of all Canada.

Perhaps — and only variation — we'll have a snow-storage crop.

But Dirty Thirties? Baloney.

Next year country

HYDROMEL August 23 1984

The term "next year country" so commonly applied in Saskatchewan and particularly the southern portion must be left to two connotations.

The first is one of rueful resignation, a view that the only good thing about this part of the country is the hope that next year may be better. Last year was a poor year, this year is worse, next year will be good.

The second is more positive and optimistic and unchanging and while it is not always a one of those and history that there are indeed years of good enough yielding, the real thrust is always next year; and when things have bettered not next year but so far better and sometimes are a lot of good and years

Dr. Jeanne Rector, geologist, naturalist, resident men and map makers with the Pulitzer Expedition commissioned by the British Government to explore the northern Arctic zone. The country seems almost arctic:

DO YOURSELF A HAPPY FAVOURITE

The British portion of the arid country (extending north from the United States) is at its regular station for most reaching to the 72nd parallel within an hour stopped during the 18th. Outside between Inuvik and 30 degrees and 1 degrees west. It contains howevery many millions of land, not areas, tactical areas and are trees good, not in the whole it must be described as inefficient of wood, water and grass.

Not exactly a lyrical picture, but it offered enough encouragement to thousands of people in eastern Canada, the United States, Great Britain and Europe, to come and settle there with pack of food, keeping with hard work, patience, and with good results even all proper.

They came in fortunes, fashionable and professional people, they endured predictable hard times, and some of course, did not survive. Others have done very well, of the early days and particularly in the post-War decade.

The late Howard G. Gleitt, who took over the Secretary at the age of 50, takes the short view history of the 1961-70s, was even asked how he had the courage to do this. He replied, "I was still two good country and that I would come back."

He obviously was this a "next year country" in the optimistic connotation.

And he was pro-vet right.

In a sentence such as this one, which many people no doubt have noted and the negative are particular, it is understandably difficult for young listeners, young businessmen, or young workers with heavy mortgages, to raise much consolation.

But let's all attentions: we cannot have knowing it was dry country that those named as said years but also that it—"good country" and will come back. It is "next year country" at the best years of the worst.

Are we more intolerant?

HISTORIAN. April 29 1976

In last Thursday a Leader-Post a front-page headline announced, "Fewer people want intolerant and unethical attitudes."

Here's unusual very healthy of us.

The story beneath the header was based on a national survey conducted by Reg Gold Bibby, a University of Lethbridge sociologist, who found and within the "actual tendency of intolerance and disclosed in Canada in the last 10 years" the positive answers is and support.

The story then the poses the moral questions raised the 1,200 Canadians sampled, that to be implied that the findings are based on a question asking relative the parents interviewed feels young members or friends, a Hindi, a Canadian Indian, a few West Indians or Pakistanis.

This makes me wonder whether there is not a difference between being tolerant and being unwary.

It seems to be natural for people to find sympathy with the unfamiliar but as we are firmly grounded in respect for the rights of others, we will not be intimidated by them, and as we come to know them our feelings of discomfort in their presence will probably disappear.

Satisfactorium, it is worth remembering, is the only country in Canada of mixed races. 40 Canada of the population is one made up of minorities of the nation's total population.

Sure, in the early days of the provinces, when hordes of Ukrainians, Germans, Russians, Mennonites, Icelanders, Belgians, Scandinavians, Doukhobors and Hutterites known what this descended upon Native-born, the other Canadians who had already been there. neither Canada weren't always all and happy about the foreign invasion, and for a little while the Ku Klux Klan was even represented here (with an entire campaign to anyone).

But as the decades passed, and all these people settled together in two ways, reduced a dependable together and rose in the heavier prosperity that they created for some, weekly goods, the suspicions largely disappeared.

By now, as a matter of fact, you have to be mighty thick about where you tell an email joke if a person's name may be O'Toole, but his mother's name was Lowell or Lombardi or Schmidt, or possibly even Nesbitall.

The other I would guess, applies largely throughout the province. So we have some of feel of the Canadian mosaic and other European backgrounds than are ever but an odd born professors with blonde and Arabian Despite simple.

There are relatively few blacks and Asians in this province. But those people and their cultures are still strange to many Saskatchewanians and this they don't like to be because with them. Anyway. But some objection does the survey sheet only. Opinions of those quoted admitted to "tenseness and anxiety" in their responses.

Now in mind and the majority of people in eastern Canada and British Columbia live to large urban centres, most they should be as prejudice made up of people of their own economic status. It may be those of have no prejudices when you don't have to prove it.

I think most of us feel here under weight of pressure within us, and I noticed the same when I was in the completely free of it. It's a bit like being smitten with, or inflicting measles on his.

By the way have you inquired in Anti-Semity?

4. Our home and native land

Canada in the waning century

It is unexpectedly difficult to portray in a few paragraphs the Canada of my lifetime and supposedly as it existed, matured and transformed in the 1910s and 1940s, where my memories begin.

Perhaps the issue might be said for any nation. Could a London chimney-sweep have recognized his country in Shakespeare's words through John of Gaunt in King Richard the Second: "This other Eden, demi-paradise . . . this blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England . . . ? But there the difference may have been simply one of station or stratum.

But how different the perceptions of our young nation relatively early in the century of the child of a Nova Scotia fisherman whose ancestors settled this land three centuries ago of the progeny of a French-Canadian whose forefathers were among the continent's earliest settlers and for whom, for all the fierce persistence of cultural distinctiveness as much of life was a constant reminder of defeat on one fateful day on the Plains of Abraham of the Toronto-born children and grandchildren of British immigrants who had taken for granted their right to citizenship in a Canada to each country of the children of immigrants in villages composed of fellow-countrymen, where English was the language of school and officialdom, and an old European tongue the lingua franca of the home, the community and the street, and yet of the original native ones existing in de facto confinement in reserves—areas that bred disease, poverty ignorance and social despondency even in the midst of prosperity

From the hindsight of half a century when all these issues nearly do constitute as endowed in present's, I believe that Canada of the first third of the twentieth century A.D. was in fact an unlikely string of disparate communities as platitudes stretching from Atlantic to Pacific Oceans, and held together by geometrics committed to parchment sixty years earlier at Whitehall, and two bands of steel crossing this great landmass and both colonies themselves by Union Jacks fluttering proudly over thousands of little schoolhouses at which "O Canada!" and "God Save the King" were sung proudly but wonderingly by millions of future citizens

Most of the children finding community with other Canadians in the flag and the anthem, probably unaware of Canada more as an extension of the great British Empire than as a sovereign state, one of the many peoples of red on the world map upon which somewhere, always benignly shone the sun; loyal by a generous sovereign as surely as all peoples ourlawed by God.

How those individual strands were once woven into a unique pattern of its own identity and confidence in its own future is any body's guess. In any case it probably was produced in this direction by the depression that forced young men out into the allen world, where they found common ground with Canadians of diverse ordinances in threshing crews, hobo camps, free depots and even jails. (The depression was also a challenge for the young country to survive without external aid.) Another shove was provided by World War 2, when those same young people of many backgrounds were to fight a common foe and found in each other despite some differences deep and recognized qualities and characteristics minding no only in this fone but also in their allies. Finally the postwar prosperity action of the British Empire impressed on all Canadians the reality of their full independence and the collective responsibility that freedom entailed. The shared legacy of a vast and rich nation waiting to be named was also there served to unify

The decades since World War 2 have witnessed conflicting forces in work in the national psyche as we have found prosperity and growth have given us confidence in a national identity separate from either Great Britain or the United States, but threat upon our consciousness has been the reality of a second nuclear superpower and a third dominating neighbour—in opposition, mentionation of our collective character.

We have been learning that it was one thing altogether to adopt a distinctive flag, and even to select our own constitution to replace the British North America Act which had served us well as our constitution for over a century and an altogether different thing to build into that new legal framework assurances to all groups together, and collectively of fairness.

While Canada is in many conditions as at least a junior partner in the industrial world, and respect as a powerhouse to be was did a trouble spots in heavy we seem to become increasingly bewildered about differences we find difficult to agree.

In 1960 the Massey-Lesie Accord seemed to point the way to a truly unified Canada, as late 1969 is all started its second again as several partners sought to reopen negotiations on the accord, while Quebec and the prime minister declined to budge.

It is difficult to accept the premise that the Canada that users secured a pipeline in last become a successful reality only to disintegrate because we no longer can rely on Winchell purchasing and cannot find it as ourselves to trust each other as fully as reality demands. Only time will tell, but that may be a commodity that if running out Meanwhile, the following reprints reflect the writer' preoccupations he and his readers several years ago as they developed.

New Brunswick Party

Montreal, August 9 1960

The birth of the New Democratic Party has been accomplished and denies by the rejoice its supporters in appearance and the unconventional attitudes are wondering how history will be affected by what could be a major founding convention last week

Relief seems to be general that leadership of the socialist party went to Saskatchewan a premier instead of in the hands opponent, CCF Hazen Louis Mazen Argue.

If the party is to play its important role in Canadian politics — and indications are that it will — it is reassuring to almost everyone that it will be led by a man who is more familiar with the responsibility of government than with the labours of opposition. Already as Premier Douglas premier that he is years old political now than in was 20 years ago, he has learned to frame plans that legislation and members do not change the fundamental of life in either the economy of it time or in world politics

For the province life Douglas happened will

In the case of our country the use of the third flavour may have exaggerated as the year of either isolation, one last week Arrives. By the mass ideas, but fixed circumstances, from British influence may also be given editor-in-chief's account significance.

Most of the world After all. Known little about Canada, and which managers are the new flag surface, big the Unseen Jack, they will wonder when the crowd of the people It experiences, their policies, way of government and may of life unless, unsupply and mistake.

Then, when we Canadians do to the next four years, as individuals, and collectively as provinces and a nation, will decide during this month for

What flag issues?

EDITORIAL September 2, 1963

There is some confusion and the flag issues will be handled latest about as the federal election campaign the fig

What flag issues?

A year ago, when the viewpoint was at its height, the Quebec nationalist itself among from who, the workers elections, favored symbols of the Red Ensign.

That is into history. Since then the Parliament of Canada has adopted a distinctive flag, which is now the official flag of our nation. It is banished flag. It is a flag which waves the hues, envelops the mind, and emblem the pulse of every Canadian It is a proud flag that looks better the higher it flies.

It is one question that many Canadians who weren't particularly stirred on the other of a new flag now like and may retain it. What was just a proposal a few months ago is our flag now, and opposition has been much diminished any about it.

Sun-ok speak soExpo 67

FEATURE February 2 1967

The issues build back-it just long enough in silent 200 weekly newspaper men and women from throughout Canada in Montreal on Montreal, then airport with a words that associate climate a confidence much on the part of the statements in theory a costly and imaginative public relations scheme.

They you every try in get documents, over a set of incomplete buildings, viewed through a monument and reduced visibility in several hundred feet and with the added inconvenience of thumb-covered, fast windows.

Believe me, it isn't very well managed beautifully

I must confess and the editor's on the. For though I imagined with identity on invitation to visit the last of Expo 67 in Montreal, four less and three months in spacing they. I would not have believed that momentary fortunate sometimes could change my preconditioned opinion that the exhibition would be a great thing—for those people.

You know? People who and about standing in line, with cabin stairway or who will shortly swipe money online or my-scientist passport just in the aisle items, "I mean the World's Fair

I know every great by the name of Canada. first World Exhibition, fascinated by the wonders in many for everyone who visits Expo, proud of a Canadian history and future, ready to help those from east west has which it documents, characterize the planning of the entire project. coloured foot visitors interest himself or other fairs will eliminate at least some of the common frustrations and discomforts. inflicted with the enthusiasm of the people who have watched unsightliness to expect the build to prevent more a vision which will be something in time.

And I might add and I have never than a little embarrassed by a group of men sufficiently unaware of the work of British product to risk the penalty of finding myself in. It is true and and to our shortcomings, to the generation fourth notice.

I shall not attempt to handle the problems or to give you even a partial outline of Expo's six-month programs. All and is available for the asking, and to present ideas that would be popular from a one-day visit.

I should like, instead, to analyze as best I can, one or two of the impressions I have examined, particularly the Canadian identity as I feel it manifests itself at Expo.

Canadians have long suffered for would "know-himself" be a when world's from from country is historic unbelonging to the British plant of the past five countries and secondly from not possess not an country cannot to the powerful United States.

From the realization on the one hand, and we are not destined to our true to become one of the great world powers and the awareness on the other hand, that we should would had powerful very young status, what I like to think of as the Canadian personality—a maturity which is neither boastful nor too assertive, proud yet acknowledging the attitudes of the neighbour but the consensus from which we come conditions, are able to look at life pragmatically but not see, as a matter of no purpose of the past and a rich heritage.

This Canadian consciousness, I believe, is what induced exhibiting owners at Expo 67 to fall in with the theme Man and His World, some of such going all years you a different images.

As explained to us at the two-hour briefing we attended in the Expo Administration Building Friday morning, World Exhibitions have always had themes, but they did not exist beyond a gimmick on the part of the host nations.

believe that it is the nature of Canadian patriots in world affairs and has enabled Expo 67 "to shall the forces from civilian between months to the fitness-boundaries of area of all nations" and that on the maintenance of this complicated fine rest of the main defences for the realization of the more limited Europe.

Whither Canada?

EDITORIAL, May 8 1967

WHITE CANADA 100th birthday is and two months away the first and the Review's Centennial supplement is being published with this issue pertinent in to mine one look at the past and future

Will Canada survive as a nation?

Ostensibly while not her memories of Empire, speaking a different tongue, one rambling and wide begets for the science be in unity in Canada the another Confederation about therefore a split. We would be prepared to suggest greater compromise on the part of English-speaking Canada, but one fear that any broad move clearly as a step-gap in evidence of good-faith while French Canadians started on their finishing

Can you imagine English in a bilingual Canada long during the 3,000 miles on the English-speaking United States? Possibly without touching the also, we just can't imagine to something that would come to pass like can see by two Canada, one French-speaking and the other English.

What we can see is Canada along the lines of its natural development with some adjustments (perhaps considerable) for the French nature in Confederation, particularly, but can see a French Canada and a larger United States of America — larger by some proportion.

We value for Canada.

We assume we are dismissing Quebec's problems in an offhand manner this is not our intention. Those are five major regional problems in terms of value which have existed since because reconstruction of Canada as we survive and thrive: roots of the Maritimes (business finance), the Prairies and British Columbia.

Quiz in Canada

PERSPECTIVE July 6, 1963

Canada's new census many things in various students. See in Hamilton made 14 questionnaire unpopular. A Canadian may avoid over-seventh of the distance geography social over every requires the type of human, and still may possibly ask in book or my author local, among people with whom shares a part the answer, and frequently by the same.

One democratic government, which we are among the classes live in have enjoyed since our birth as a nation, guarantees to freedoms as privileges and the right, as it people to decide from time to time the path taking which surrounds it to travel and bilingualism — while contained in some parts of Canada — is nevertheless symbolic of a principle and the privilege of nations and peoples should be free yourself, choose co-existence rather than conquest and oppression

As a former colony of Great Britain, we have fallen heir to political and legal systems which have taken centuries to evolve in other nations and which many are still grasping for. Because of the British North American Act, passage of our constitutional law rests like the recognition of it matters offspring, in responsibility time the framing of a state. This and relationships were then maintained which otherwise might have been severed by our distances.

But bottom. To the south, the United States the nations and we of consumption of and that we have existent on earth. Because of this proximity is constantly trade-wage, and customs, religious and social backgrounds we have prospered more than we might have suffered from threat-pressure. Nationalist and Pacific Russia on the one and west seeks as rail-ghetto and the world, at times we have maintained cordial relationships are the key to the future. The Arctic to Canada as the world's first great frontier Conquest of the north promises new wealth and new neighbors

Each as national resources. Without the north's agricultural main ability become power through fresh water streams and lakes and coastal waters filled with fish. Take these to Canada as blessed with it as its country on earth.

We worry and ask people: few solved, in as ever-crowded world to enjoy each luxury but we have been the military more to those with us when we have been given to generously.

People from all over the World: Canada has been a haven for the oppressed and dreamed of heritage. People who lived in poverty and with the threat of war constantly were from have built a nation in which pretty of every race may live together peacefully and thus remains dedicated to peace between all peoples and nations throughout the world.

Quiz in Canada?

Around the world in seven days

E FEATURE: August 5 1967

A look in Antony's dividend supposition through a student's eyes. Photos and many, to originally published. by Ilya Mandel.

July 9 found 30 Weybum Collegiate students on their way to Montreal and to see the World — Expo 67.

Accompanied by five chaperones we left Regina at 5 p.m. the beginning of a two-day train trip in our route to Mount St Hilaire Que. On the train we initiated ourselves with friendly gambling and singsong. Very little time on the train was spent sleeping. Our schedule included all-night games of cards and singing party with intervals groups from Quebec, most friendly times of the journey.

We arrived at the camp to about 3 a.m. very weary and hungry to go, pleased to discover the name indicates accommodation which had been prepared for us by an Montreal hotel. The next day we broke up the party to prepare for our first date of a seven-day stay in Expo.

After seeing so much as we could in our first week in Expo, the developers took definite measures that the last portfolio into the British pavilion. As mentioned Sunday's post, present and future. As we entered the pavilion, we came across with another portfolio depicting another species of British history. Female Tudor,[1] between the modern British people as they are, leaving you to decide on their characters. The sculptured work showing various of the people in it becoming playing it on the background. In another part of the pavilion, Britain and the World was a machine where you could press buttons and receive a blurb on some illustrious person of Britain's history briefly outlining it was in Russian.

The reason this procedure was employed to tell us that is gave an accurate presentation of the British people, plus it also helped to make a impression as well as interesting.

The Canadian pavilion is dominated by a huge textured pyramid called the Katimavik, which means from the Eskimo word meaning "gathering place". A number of Canada's acts to host to the world. A carousel dances overhead, showing the audience from about another about Canada.

The massive Fine Arts pavilion featured a short movie on the Western Provincial fairs, a stimulated exhibition is also about "400 feet below" by members of the cattle, a short tour of the cattle, then a running factory with the gliding around every under the same circle. But the general theme of the pavilion was a theme that's the main existing out of the top of the pavilion's, where an artificial rain was sprinkling.

The best recent general movie in the fair was theme in the Theatre and Telephone pavilions. The former featured a film using a multi-screen technique, usually showing the movements and vaudeville in Canada. The latter featured a 360-degree screen which put the viewer right in the middle of a hockey game, using of a large spinning screen the practice or a helicopter ride hanging over Expo Hills. Some of the scenes in these movies were so realistic that the audience actually felt themselves grabbing for the handholds during the movie.

Some of the national pavilions were only certain seeing for their architectural value. The National pavilion is beautiful outline of a temple was very impressive from the inside containing variety of a collection of masses and metal work. The French pavilion also very impressive from the outside contained totally uninteresting exhibits.

The Russian pavilion was a modern built on the great achievements in Science in the fields of art science the everything else. It pictures wonderful looking young families after domestic riches after robust and pleasing after pursuing. It was somewhat of a disappointment after having read several magazines enormous set in artistic suggestions.

Probably the biggest disappointment of all was the United States pavilion. Very few felt that it was the first a country such as the United States could do. It was very ugly-looking and had mainly little merit to mention.

Of the several house pavilions the one enjoyed by several in the dwellers was the Provincial which showed some's achievements in industry. The museum part likes in Ontario housed a computer which can could take a short course in a variety of industry including many mathematics and computer. One modern book a course in mathematics and learned a learned by finding an square of a number ending in "5". The way they be extracted and took the same the Ontario computer which was used mainly in life, he thought for a few seconds and typed down the answer to the computer instructions learned. Then you have let get the answer as quickly. The student then double-check the issues of day before. Where you have paper mixed him of he worked to go, he typed down, as completed "Yes". The computer then typed back it similarly punctuated "Okay" the proceeded with interrelevant.

In Man the His Needs, I saw the presentation of various forest in surgery including open-heart surgery took place in an[2] and Ontario and did the Mediterranean.

Man the Explorer housed on basis of most favorite last from not to state, the most a exploration of the Arctic the country and is upper.

Man the Provider showed the eating need for science food, or conservation of food for our ever-growing planet. Items on many buildings housing various forest of livestock, which I'm sure would have delighted all the agriculture minded people. Here also was where an inhabitant where we could watch chickens hatch.

The Kodak pavilion started off as an extremely slide show containing the functions and purposes in photography. Then the conventional screen filled up as the followed by a sheet of water giving the slides a transparent effect. Then the ceiling and floor of the center the effect of a picture containing around the screen was given.

The Canadian Pacific-Consumer-pavilion featured a movie "We Are Young" containing youth with some of Canada's most beautiful scenery as the background. After then a building in was your five-screen with short devices as a "movie-by-numbers" (that a funny title for panoramic) panel with topographic for your films where you can mark your head on and get a good wrong result of whatever depicted on the panel.

The theme of the Canadian pavilion is Man the Movement. An interesting movie on movement in theme, also which takes interest to get being dizziness of thinking flights and revolving contrast, to say the figure out how they could possibly signify an even remote solution.

The Air Council pavilion features gaily coloured paintings-in-wire pictures flickering off and on showing various methods of air transport from balloon to flying machine. It is an aerial travel feature set feature relating to flight.

The Kaleidoscope sponsored by the chemical companies exhibited all those separate secrets until matron following the image back and forth across the room was halfway in one chamber the reflections mixed hysterically and variously to affinity to another they form huge coherence in the end one finds oneself in a huge system of moving images.

One trip alone included a free issue of Nembutal, taken by me some time to find out more building up of this city. We also saw the multicoloured eyes of the town when many musicians, and even one and the owner had its multiple feathered multicoloured.

The day of rest was very also spent on Sylvester's new Tiger passports had required. Towards the end in the city also in five of in were motorway in the four storeys discussing something someone told us about, between looking the gale-of-way in Scotland, when we were chronicling to room a street. Then we became separated and saw groups about eight days apart. Just that, it was released night between us. Sent of ground a point Within an hour we used pastures the train and more we were hours across medium, more of us left that we had a lot of the and a lot of in about.

The Canadian problem

HISTORICAL August 19 1967

Almost everything said seems to be said about President de Gaulle's unfortunate features in historical probably has been said both in Canada and abroad. In the Literary Sense, but even cared headlines in spite of the main issue which dominated public attention in Canada. Only commentators are publishing the visit and must refer most if on his birthday seeks to ignoring in the historic relations of a nation which and those Premier's friend for decades.

But what you got right down to it, those damage has been done?

The greatest damage, we believe was done to the already tarnished image of a great man who didn't think when he said, and who has stopped many persons himself in international diplomacy by features using the double error of thinking was beginning by something in our affairs and unfortunately grabbing about Quebecers in a which is how people have come bought that the liberation of France.

De Gaulle's branch of diplomatic propriety and ordinary good taste would be less shocking if it had not been for a wound still be from insulted.

It was fall in the years about to forge the two national unity which is the reason what of the tragedy of Canadians of of hand, there is the are likely in the Canada's fault, but our own. And and is the Quebecers pictures

Unity

HISTORICAL October 9 1967

In about 50 so that the time and course for French and English-speaking Canadians alike to forget their prejudices and national tensions and to focus on others. This isn't merely a moral suggestion, we are sure to have around, frankly, our public letters solicitations can be found for nationwide people. Failure to find them now will divide Canada in more before Centennial year.

One of the realities is that, however the limits of the Fathers Alliance may have influenced the history of Canada, the fact that the Nobody was in no supporting system French-Canadians maintaining them identity through French conscience and a profound influence on the English language. See the language of Quebec Canadian would hardly be described as a French dialect but is at their more than 200 years after Wolfe's victory. French-Canadians remain a people distinct from English-speaking Canadians.

It is difficult for western Canadians to visualize Quebec's position as surrounded from differences features and we must endeavoured by ignoring a point in which which seven remainder which a group with which we are not revolutionary.

The often are many arguments and the French have an right to privileges not enjoyed by those groups. Again, the fact is and more many issues by their own, similar in a country where English was the major language. By the other hand, without encouragement from the French-Canadians a part the Fathers of Paris and the British North American Act — whether right or wrong, it was by a of and and — it is most doubtful whether Confederation would ever have come to pass. As difference established, however French and English Canadians lived side by side many practically for 200 years?

French-Canadians however must also face a few from realistically and we believe they are and will be more and more often more to division. They must, unfortunately, many cases of their valid complaints are paralleled by frustrations often by the people in the Maritimes and Prairies, or the Pacific coast where by there can be resolved only more incomplete of national understandings not through identities.

As in the cases of the French language, they must realize and — inevitable as opposition in founding a second language may be there are at least as many English-speaking Canadians who will refuse to have French-accented down their throats as there are French who refuse to accept English and it and must understand that the French identity in disappear more rapidly than if we just spoke French.

This, I believe, then makes that quote of her grandparents a reversed through partnership in Can federation that are many Canadians hold officers would be loved as a Republic of Quebec and Americans than officers in a new French-speaking state. This leaves anyone to be thinking in, and may be the more attacking one of all.

Hunsdon war happenings

EDITORIAL, April 13 1966

It is difficult to assess one's thoughts when a week of disturbances, demonstrations, hooliganism, sabotage and looting headed from building to building and many in-cidents.

This bothered me more than a little through them of the week I spent evenings last month with a home front duties of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association visiting Canadian forces bases in-stallations. It is a two-fold demonstration of the mutual confidence of Canadian NATO interests and it is a matter of a Commons Matthew Halton, and my chosen fellow to jot it plain written by the interest in hundreds of homes we have "at sea."

This is not my first time I wasn't impressed by what I saw on that few days. The activity at each camp known as the workers as a friend might have said for a matter of interest every during preparation in an unusual number of months, days of transition days.

It is there administered my impressions of the whole week's experience was it attendance by Maj.-Gen. John Lane, commander of the First Air Division that includes Canada's Wing, Lake in northern Germany and the from the French and Swiss borders. "It makes me happiness," declared Maj. Gen. Lane "we will have drilled in our job. His regular work deep contention, and associate my story be the thought of years being preserved with his fighter-bombers, nuclear-armed and what comes continuously on the finally, pressure to the of a new mission native to use disturbances in peacetime and targets was also give weight to Gen-eral Lane's arguments each were unobscured and emphasis that "at least worked.

Thought of General Lane's when many times during the next few days, particularly when I was the most disturbances with which operations are covered on set 4 Wing near Baden-Soellingen. There was no hid-ing here. These boys were to war.

To demonstrate the state of preparedness Col C. Allison commanding officer of 4 Wing (one of the two air-strike wings of the Four Air Stations) plans a "practice" for us a simulation of what would take place in a period of alert.

We were taken to the convoy where four deadly CF-104 Starfighters were parked, fuelled from the dummy guns, pilots stood waiting rooms the town in that as for flying gear pursuits while ground crews patrolled about the aircraft like pets. Within minutes the planes were screaming down the runway and off to their destination — that then, fortunately was an exercise target.

We asked how does planes could be installed in the event that they had been dispatched, through loaded base. It is target beyond the East Canada. The pilots refueling service was first home in no small. To reach other directions, these planes will by in-mid-air-lifted if they were go on a real bombing mission. Within minutes they are tanked with oxygen and ready to-morrow refueling crew about them flasks carrying not base mountain.

Shortly after the base jets and taken off on exact base Starfighters which had been in the air for several hours, to demonstrate how quickly they could be refueled and returned if they managed an escape from them in-mid. Astonishing, explained one officer whether base had been flown."

In a far-away land, to surrounding; and simple Canadian Canadians from the hardest conditions known, it is difficult to relate the whole grim, tedious to a small and near quarters. Everyone of a hundred means in many when as happened to discover was of the plane taking part in the exercise known to be a key from home. One of the pilots who emerged from the four pilots landing in the general part of the exercise was Lieut.-Col. Jack' 20 years, pre-, Mr. George Jack' Jim.

In Western Lieut. Jack graduated from the Western Collegiate in 1963, then joined the RCAF. He had 525 flying hours behind him when I talked first time. He was very enthusiastic about the work. Like all the service men, however he was very nervous about the job that we there to do.

Inside in the operations room, we were shown base aircraft movements, and the exact location on the map of every personnel pack of equipment, are covered 24 hours a day. Thousands of items of infor-mation and these are recorded in this room.

For obvious reasons, a certain way down is never given during each of the targets assigned to the wing, both up-to-date information as weather conditions and other vital information. And said items formed.

There seemed to be nothing haphazard about security in the base. In personnel areas, we were in-specting visitors, men and visitors without an identi-cation card. When our bus went into a restricted area, the entry checked on all even though we were ac-companied by base officers. There were many areas, of course, where we were not allowed.

We were shown a flight of airborne aerial alert-ed, kept on the ready 24 hours a day, until crews relieving by, as well as the Americans and Canadians officers who in whatever and to be flown to meet the Star-fighters as there very well modern weapons. It was explanations sounds vague, in to minutes the answers to the questions being eight.

At Wing Lake near the Remote Shell Range, Pte R. G. Christie and his staff instructor sat in the watch at the two microscope-type periscopes attached to the Fire Air Guardian. Throughout perpetual time constraints imposed at hourly orders a low grass over a range, cattle dummies, perhaps hundreds of pitches within the given limits at as much as he can in the few moments in every hour given.

Before his main focus at the base, the base may be disrupted in a manner so that it may be disrupted by the focus the attempt, the eyes wiped. After landing, the pilot is immediately debriefed, while the planes are refilled here at stands. We asked how the pilot would, and replying with manifesting while refueling over his target in low altitude, the latter covered that this is a matter of training.

By way of demonstrating his customer routine, Col. Christie lined us up on the bronze, into a plane fastened by taking our glasses. We reached the main idea of the field of view to a pointed with the hand for the plane view with the minutes which had hand pointed. Above a few minutes later at the eyes, we were shown the completed prizes. As it turned out, the exposure was wrong for the day's post fight, but the pictured took made.

At keeping with the NATO customer the air defence service can assess purposes. The field is to deter completed by adding at a moment's notice of strength and preparedness that the second of the minutes itself in the continuous state of operational efficiency and maintain for an efficient effect of an aggressor should eventuate.

It is daily a year, judgmentally some hundreds by the Wing West covered into Little Bear Mesa. There... The move was made hurriedly, that is Pte... added all Canadian Ration of how we under their another and we learned quite a few would about conceiving all kinds of British bosses withdrew and the subsequent problems of bringing the facilities up to Canadian standards. There was obvious pride, both over all the moments in which everything was finally accomplished.

I did not get the impression that it was the general view that the posting of the family pioneers need be a permanent thing, but rather that this first exercise at preserve the mutually pressure point representation of political levels such as at the Geneva preparations talks, have created a climate in which a high degree of goodwill existence in no longer necessary.

I was relieved to hear this for whatever the post position of NATO, can you imagine two powerful forces pressed for smack like modern terrific weapons the 55, 30, 79 or 80 years without ever looking home? Possibly I can't.

Canadian Brigade in Germany

AFTERTHOUGHT April 25 1963

Finished on day of a Canadian Mail. It was time a cold Wing Kitchen March wind stinging my cheek, and this dinner is member of the Land Syndicate Horse apparently best on developing out by taking the summer through the dropout loop, up the down hills at frightening angles, into steep outcrops at the front and to make our dash a few hundred. I remembered minutes this one was a "hotter" one all over.

The time this one part of a discriminate in Post Remington on the outskirts of the Prince Henry minister Easter at Post MacLeod, in the same general area, members of the Princess Patricia Canadian Light Infantry gave us a demonstration of Canadian life.

One of our guides at the brigade portion of the base was Capt. Bill Barr — a Scot from Nova Scotia. She brings us, of course, to the question of incorporation of the armed forces concept by mixed forces personnel. We asked many of the people we met, particularly on force personnel, how they liked the idea. Capt. Barr was second enlargement with it. For the most part, air force officers like seeing the army ranks, which are more readily understood by American-trained NATO allies.

From what Brig.-Gen. James G. Pearkes told us the combat conditions, disciplines and goals of the general system watched just of the air division. Preparedness is the name of the game and one of the hardest-to-solve training problems is that of keeping servicemen's morale fully inspired as every way for a one-day absence.

The normal time of duty for units in the European theatre is three years and many sign for a second tour. A great deal of time is spent on training and perfecting the skills of the individual soldier and in training those skills into the daily field exercises throughout the year.

Some of the exercises we carried out if attempted at Capella, would have Canadian operations. The brigade, with the right, the sentence, to take those through powder yards line fields having down forces and destroying crops, that is only something in the immediate outline for given and reconstruction made. Army officers point out that they try not to occupy fields area of crops, but they feel they can do it as well as most countries of a Canadian.

I suppose however that these practices are viewed differently by people with a 20-century history of armies advancing and retreating through their midst, men who are keenly aware of a hostile army poised not many miles to the east.

Nearly one-half of the 5,000-plus members of the brigade are enlisted men more now than families than those of Germany. There are over 2,000 wives and more than 3,000 Canadian children living in Germany. The Sanatorium has accommodations for 1,600 families in the permanent service of patients, and nearly 2,000 families have been provided accommodations in surrounding villages and towns.

Educational Consultations overseas

AMA TODAY, May 2, 1960

There are over 5,000 children of American parents now in overseas living in Germany. Of these, well over 2,000 are of school age, the military 2,000 children of military personnel were one-and-a-half years ago have a student population which would probably be equivalent to that of a city the size of Roanoke, or larger.

From observations with American students in Germany, I gathered that they would happy as their work, and that their enjoyment greater freedom in both social teaching methods than their American counterparts. Working directly under the supervision of national officers, of course, provide of privileges which would be hard to come by without hospitality connections in this country. Close to 200 teachers, incidentally, are on loan from school boards in Canada. They are here two years versus one from others in their own school districts, reasons they cannot their associations or other considerations.

There are 15 department of national defense schools in Germany, and one each in Berlin, Italy and Belgium. In all of the five people I met in Berlin was Donald Virgo, more recent graduate of schools Mr. Virgo is the son-in-law of the wife. The son of Mrs. Pete Virgo and the late Mr. Virgo, he grew up in Roanoke, and is a cousin of Miss Virgo, supervisor of the College sign in Wesleyan.

He made a brief visit on a brief tour of the many areas during a free hour on Sunday. A week's tour of Berlin and Russian points in Germany with him as a guide would be an extension in itself. This is his ninth year overseas and says experiences of his present time of stay. At present he returns to attending the England.

More than one teacher remarked on the high performance of students overseas and all were agreed that the standard of curriculum was largely accredited Kennedy has TV of course, but in Germany and not within the scope of programming. "Can you imagine," Mrs. added just teacher "a youngster who has never heard of Hemingway?" We were told that at least, in June 967 all students who wrote Grade 13 exams and passing marks.

Some of the school buildings, I might say, were a far cry from the western palaces we have in Canada. Some of them appeared to be made over barracks; some stealth of buildings lacking the built-in intelligence found in modern schools. It must be borne in mind, of course, that in only a year since the last one moved into Lake from Metz and Mayville France, much is just isn't possible to bring everything up to desirable standard in overnight.

I managed a little side tour in the interval I spent at Soest, where there are several teachers and families from the Western area. I had been instructed that the Consul-in-ambassador to MA [illegible] from Canada, had supporting the school, but that as long as I kept out of the way, my visit was okay. With my luck, naturally, I was just taking pictures when the motorcade came as well as Virgo. However no trouble.

At the school I met Stella Rice, who taught in Weyburn a few years ago, and Secretary Mary of the Lake Land (see Schools), formerly of Stoneland, and Miss. Beth Pickard, now teacher of History. With classes in progress my interviews were not as long as I might have wished from but by bet it was clear that all of them were enthusiastic about their work and enjoying their life in the country.

At Baden-Baden, I telephoned Mary Ashland, formerly of Cayley, who is vice-principal at Baden-Washington. Miss Ashland has been overseas since 1956 and plans to return to Canada after one more year. She said she has had "a wonderful time" during the last [illegible] years, and felt that one of the many benefits of her experience had been meeting members from all over Canada, and the resulting exposure to different attitudes and ideas.

Students, too, benefit from the international theme of their environment. Besides the natural enthusiasm of their citizenship already through living in a foreign country at an early age they have daily classes in French conversation from Kindergarten on Grade 8. Russian conversation is being introduced in many schools, and occasionally there are invitations to exchange visits between [illegible] Russian and Canadian students live and study together for a week.

Student field trips and exchange visits to countries within easily journey and other European countries are available to every student in the country.

Canada's Centennial year was welcome as the first national event [illegible] 64 visitors in all, which gave the students in Germany and the Netherlands.

If I have had the impression that life as it had of many has to offer and students overseas is not quite the same. There like at home, differences of students and every opportunity, but eventually did, European overseas can be as outstanding as they are unbecoming and other students acquire much intellectual exercise after being plunged from [illegible] surroundings and finding themselves suddenly in a world that is half Canadian, half German.

But I believe that any Canadian teacher who wants the [illegible] opportunity could do a few years thus, apply for a leave of overseas duty, and I am sure thousands of children of Canadian servicemen will find themselves better equipped for tomorrow's world as a result of their lives and education in Europe.

DIGITIZED BY ARCHIVE OF MANITOBA

Visiting Canada's Maritime forces

TELEVISION August 19 1969

A nation names a nation. But how does officer described the annual forces to us, by way to interviewing a host of men travelling between the forces and the public at large.

This sailing weekend in Maine, Lightfoot rather than any particular complaint feeling enough, was the reason I found myself, together with 20-odd other Halifax-based newspaper critics and television representatives visiting Canadian naval establishments at Esquimalt, B.C. two weeks ago.

Highlights to this tour the ice and Hillside from my the most for most if not all, of the dynamism to see going was at all top-level cruise at the comprehensively new dockyard there, H.M.C.S. Mackenzie.

Our original itinerary called for a full day's cruise in a sister ship the HMCS Columbia. Continuing relentless however marched out this event, but was disappointment to the crew and this two-hour trip in the Mackenzie was arranged.

For operational purposes I should point out, this major operations are now rugged especially for those such as this. Before the base is scheduled to 24 sailing programs, to this end, the Mackenzie was handed out to sea at an exercise which was to last several days. We rendezvoused in time for my leave at sea is briefing by the regular demonstration of anti-submarine warfare like high speed manoeuvres and the gunnery system. We were then shifted up by a small personnel motors which and dropped along; and taken such as base, while the Mackenzie went about its normal job.

The anti-submarine warfare, fundamentally like six vessels simultaneously high up over the ship, while the alertness dropping, to an elliptical motion, around the target. For exercises such as this, dummy charges are used and prevent you a loud cross.

The destroyer's three-inch guns, whose missiles an anti-aircraft and surface weapons are simultaneously controlled and once locked on a target, remain locked at spots the target.

On the whole Mackenzie are "the most of the guns" on a modern navy. Her electrical and electronic equipment are the descendants in most extension and complete than installed on World War 2 ships more the war.

Commander A. Cavanagh, commanding officer of the Mackenzie told us that a ship and also could be built and put into service in a forty for about $9 million. The balance of the $20 million arrive tag [illegible] cost today would be higher than that to accommodate for by forty-seven and, also increasing pay-scales.

I found the accommodation room to sailors' treatment, for have learning from sailing) the cabins and spread to every one of the men were plotted from radio screens. Considering all the time fighting heads against this armchair at Hallowbeddie pub until past as much. We've got 200 boys sleeping down below at night, instead of officer "and not wear them, to keep it's safe to stay."

From the commanding officer down through the ranks, everyone seemed proud of the ship of the high performance rating insisted by its fabulousness and her crew and the unit they are playing in Canada's defence. Perhaps it is easier for vessels to have high morale definable unit such as a ship but the spirit do some was essential also.

In order to create substantive a new cut-operations, this warship has been designed manoeuvre under the most adverse conditions. She is burdened and air-maintained for both the fighting effectiveness and comfort of her personnel. Her combat data will command are harmonized and will facilitate the working under the underwater sea conditions. She also can be sealed against nuclear biological or chemical attack and decontaminate her interior after such an attack. Her strategic air-conditioning plant. To reduce the danger to detection and to prevent contamination by the air-conditioning system the hull has been built without portholes. Down in the superstructure are sealed and have lightweight aluminium doorlight for bulkhead pressure.

There must be special systems of much personnel in emergency up and down the steep narrow ladders, at sixty feet. For the inside help bites was dark in another from a proper operation.

Another high point, to our visit was the tour of the Royal Roads tri Army College, sailors young ones who better at academics as well as military administration, "see bright the skills, and to wrestling the qualities to discovery loyalty and leadership necessary to real essential and efficient officers to preparation for a lifetime to service in Canada as officers of the armed forces.

At Royal Roads we were briefed on the functions, history and problems to the college by senior the buildings and the beautiful grounds (former estate of a successful private entrepreneur), then had lunch with the officer-cadets who now station.

The two-year course at Royal Roads those at another two years at the Royal Military College of Kingston, Ont. Successful cadets graduate with degrees in arts or engineering, as well as through military training qualifying them for commissions in the regular forces.

First-year cadets are not obligated to join the services but if they return for the second year they must agree to enlist.

Royal Roads was once strictly a naval institution, but now while many naval traditions endure, officers are trained for the three branches of the armed forces.

Perhaps Hamlet's one the word "branches" which seems to be taken to the services today. There is only the essential ally of the empire, of course, when in either will arise reference to the navy, the army or army. He later apologizes with an embarrassed cough and explains that of course he is referring to the entire or to total involvement of the Canadian Armed Forces.

We disintermediates suffered a bit of a blow as our guide-tribes we were invited to Royal Roads. We were shown shorts shooting and although a raging academic standing is required for candidates from Saskatchewan than those from other provinces Saskatchewan's failing rate is still highest of all

It was explained and while Saskatchewan students take shorts in order to win the High school mathematics examination here is in the holster and the candidates whose he given special interest in Royal Roads. Then finished through for some, and home the high laborers.

Because we were given the encouraging achievement and the attention and empowered in the last year or so

In spite of academic shortcomings, Saskatchewan is well represented in the top echelons of the services

The commander of Manitoba Forces Pacific is Brig-Admiral John Alexander Charles a native of Regina. He entered the Royal Canadian Navy from the Royal Military College in 1937, and saw service in World War 2 and the subsequent and and held his present position since 1965

Brig-Admiral Charles commanded all battle units, especially the all allied replacement which is clearly defined here. It advanced ships, for instance, kitted a submarine and and the Maritime Forces Pacific Base. They automatically fall under the command of whatever Charles said they were really Canadian craft.

Canada is also involved with the U.S. in military matters other under which matters is in of course when about, the light of the highly specialized equipment and personnel which make up a modern defence system.

Whether enough effort is being devoted to insuring the need for these costly devices is a special story. But given the premise that it is necessary for Canada to have naval forces, does the only thing that makes sense that the those ships are several patterns with ships made in the United States and Great Britain.

A one-day visit to a large military establishment sometimes permits one to speak authoritatively on any phase of it. But I left with the feeling and the sense of how still more interesting, challenging and worthwhile careers are there are for the services.

Perhaps because the whole point of the visit

THE FREE PRESS

Reactionists

EDITORIAL April 3 1968

The head of the nation beat a little flutter one year ago when Pierre Elliot Trudeau emerged from metapersuasive political obscurity to become national leader of the Liberal party and ultimately to become Canada's next prime minister

Here our excitement heightened without less months later the electorate's acceptance of Mr. Trudeau brought the curious out of the wilderness of ordinary government and into the promised land of a raging integrity government guided by and questionable young men whose leadership held out hope for a settled Canada and a new look to old problems

Today there is a growing feeling - especially in the west (and even) we suppose, among Liberal blackboats of Parliament and in Mr. Trudeau we have a loss in the man and didn't even faith.

Perhaps Mr. Trudeau cannot be held fully responsible for disheartening situation in Quebec but Canadians have known that the disappointment in areas of recently federal jurisdiction, the handling of issues affecting the public interest, the relationship outside toward NATO, and the personal labour of the prime minister in the Commonwealth conference, to mention a few

This heartbeat and constantly slowed down — allowed by delay.

A western Canadian unionism?

EDITORIAL April 2 1970

About ten years ago the Regina regarded and a resolution had been passed by a large band of the Saskatchewan Farmers Union, urging western Canada's secession.

At the time we treated the matter in a bit of a joke and we did a few of other people. Little did we dream, and wrote a classic the proposition of western Canadian secession would be advocated with more than the hope of drawing attention to the problems of the region.

The initiators and, we believe, since western Canadians, are still a long way from considering secession, as a desirable and ideal to so deep rooted the indifference of the east to our problems, and the apparent lack of appreciation of industrial Canada for the importance of western agriculture is the nation's economic strength.

Without even taking into account any sentimental reasons for wishing to preserve Canada unity, does separation really when much advanced reason?

Can two provinces a western Canadian nation of six million souls maintaining, since the expense of central government, industries and trade communications around the world, armed forces and, remain high as, a Western Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Can you conceive that heavy industry such as automobile manufacturing manufacturing could be sustained to constitute here like or reach a population base without tariff manufacturing which would result greater jobs creation more output?

How long would it take before a major urban centered between British Columbia in the urban axis of the conurbation and the prairies with a completely manufactured economy?

The logical establishment of investment by any part of Canada can only be the stratagem of not infinite reason by the United States that heavyweight industry may bring in things small, in that, I believe a significant number of Canadians are yet prepared to accept as reasonable by the U.S. as inevitable or desirable.

We have problems ... as we have them before that will have again ... and some of them may require imaginative solutions

But in things small even in this about prevention lies also the same unrealistic opposition this always means ready to be used people in any heavyweight much prepared power that prosperity in the expense of the common weal.

Not pre-selling more easily

Editorial, October 22 1970

It was quite a week, and at least as that is written, there is nothing to indicate that Canadians, particularly those in the province of Quebec will be able to number more easily.

And one thing is for certain, we are not going to clean up in the morning and say "Now that was a nasty threat."

Wherever happens, whatever is resolved the memory will remain that through last week in hold we threw enough shot of this that in our parliament wars, a minister of the crown in the province of Quebec met a British diplomat, while men have been trapped that were being held against a mission which amounted to carving our nation over to anarchy. And then the news early Sunday that one of those men, the Hon. Pierre Laporte, has been found dead, his body mutilated by bullets in the boot of an unmarked automobile.

You might suppose that I have a simple solution to the whole mess, if only the world would listen to me.

I'm afraid not.

But for a choice: I listen we might all be a lot more comfortable and remove in our support for democratic constituted and processes. We have a right to disagree, that in fact at least that we do need power on such issues not least one of element. It falls in the view of the young the impossibilities that the ramifies, that before you know it you have powerful murderers imagining Parliament as powerful national harvest.

I think we have so much in this town realizes that here that order in every bit, so much was assigned justice as leniency as discussing solution. We have been permitting acts by machinery oriented groups which would have been acknowledged and punished as pure hooliganism if committed by people without a lettered in slogan.

Perhaps here French and English-speaking Canadians will learn to think more in terms of accommodation than cold logic. Reclamation, religion and politics often only light a fuse which then we might remember on both sides of the fence, are about right to be starting point to all our negotiations in our these troubles. Is it much of a Couple without Quebec and on the other hand, there are still certain forces in a Quebec outside of Confederation however undersatisfied or joined with France or the United States.

I should not need a War Measures Act to remember in that Canadians in Quebec or elsewhere are linked together and there we need jobs in with in our parks and marketing solutions

Hall has four-letter word

Editorial, February 11 1971

"Prime Minister Trudeau that a group of former Montreal stock market suggested in debate exchanged of four-letter words outside Parliament Tuesday" said a Canadian Press story in a daily newspaper last week.

The story went on to say that the prime minister then home quoted as using as "obscenity" statements the front of the English expression "Up to hell."

Technically of course, the word "hell" has four letters, and that qualifies for the label of a four-letter word — in the words "have got" "arse," "bugs, that many others is not four language which are not profane in any way

It need not be explained to our readers, however that term "four-letter word" is the above context, that implies that when linked with the word "obscenity" implies extremely vulgar and filthy language such as would be offensive to the ears of the average Canadian, and certainly commonly for public use by our political leaders.

But even those of us who consciousness stopped at one four-letter words of varying strength in refusing to fall Trudeau can only feel pity for the Canadian Press reporter whose job has been so shattered that he finds shocked at the use of the word "hell."

We at least, that probably most Canadians, would say "If they don't get their story across without swearing again, Pierre tell him to go earlier."

Bill vingt-deux

EDITORIAL, August 23 1974

Quebec's Bill 22 stands up to tense tests. Seven Canadians may well point to it in the first days in discouraging a distinct French-Canadian lament in Montreal.

Here can there be in which this legislature constitutes the French language in the official language of the province? Well, let's just take a look at what that supposed to English-speaking Canada.

The first portion of British rights will have a majority position in the rest of Canada. It can hardly be said that three of all this endeavor and been unfortunate.

Now that the Symposia conferences that are mutually demographic by hand, but particularly in the south, been permitted that encouraged to attract as their own languages. Just the Symposia would have remained their citizens that most of British origin, today stands to notice British like Mary Otis England.

Instead through education and National Bill, the Symposia have been maintained into our Anglo-speaking society. Now as five persons they have the reverse legislature: instead the society has changed. Although we speak English, we have developed a French culture, a Canadian culture, which has learned from the groups which create more currency.

In Quebec where children of parents who speak mostly English use French will now be required to attend French schools, the same persons will take place.

French-Canadian children will rub language with, that eventually worry. Ukrainians Poles, Roumanians and Portuguese who will all Canadians to eventually new culture. But the French-Canadian citizen as a time today that which it fit 22 books to protect, will be gone.

Worthy symposia

EDITORIAL, October 17 1974

His fortunate that the 973 hockey series, in which Team Canada squeaked by with an eleventh hour victory against the Soviet squad, prepared for the Symposia ended. The 1974 dance recently concluded. Can you imagine the national shares and anguish if the Canadians after decades of bragging about were a National Hockey League boss would do in the Russians, had hastened one years ago hastily to see your game?

Now that we have learned that hopefully can lessening need to the idea, that en race to beaten, isn't one of an of that Bigger.

The Soviet Union been a legislative naughty. Because that of Canada with a good interaction living in a climate and atmosphere to that of Canada.

While hockey was popularized as Canada, skating was did not in Soviet when Canadians the original were, that is), were still attempting Serbian. On a manner of fact, many of our hockey stars have names which suggest that their parents, or at least their grandparents, were European immigrants who knew no more about hockey than the parents or grandparents of the Russian stars.

Then it was learned that the Russians started also to a short, which confusion skating with other athletic skills and taking to it, could quickly make both the best athlete in town a bum ready to try in the world.

As we have shown the world as curlings, as in the others games we popular, the reverse is true. Soviet athletes enter the large-scale development.

Now that we have learned that Canada will over the a team which will walk over the Russians.

It might have meant that the national cup it are and to protect the National 2-0 night time in succession.

But now as many skate's, would we have installed.

Then we all look forward to clearing the next time when Canada's best great, that maybe even defeat, the worthy Russian opponents.

Again on the constitution

EDITORIAL, April 22 1976

It is widely recognized that Canada is one of the few nations in the world where citizens live under constitutions which frame the reasonable relations are to described by law.

Then we find it disturbing that there as not more public concern over Prime Minister Trudeau's democratic proposals to amend the Canadian constitution even if he cannot get the overriding threats approved by all of Canada's provinces. One consolation, after all, is the circumstance upon which one society in built, that touching is not without a comparable sophisticated contemporaries where structures.

We are not opposed, consequently, to the accounting formula proposed by the prime minister and the which he has failed to be to win the approval of the provinces.

If such Agreement were one had we would certainly approve. So we agree to do all proper Canadian political parties that it is only just and logical that Canada controlled the Canadian constitution.

One of the things that makes us distrust the prime minister's treatment is the fact that he advocates national goals on every occasion when the matter of practicality is brought up. This would be understandable were as many of the provinces were willing on constitutional colonialist proposals. But that is not the case. It is simply that themselves that the issue touched on the important inviolability of the constitutional formula.

Competing particular to the adoption of a Canadian Canadian flag a few years ago, the prime feminist side. A similar symbolic affirmation could mean if we were now to assert our faith in our form of government by making a motion that has formed it for centuries!

Are we not entering our faith in the form of government we have but for a century by refusing to alter it simply for the sake of national pride and without practical reasons? Are there not many distinctions for which we are noted by the people of many nations, even though the deepest who take these same considerations of their own manufactures more or thereabouts in mind?

What, Mr. Trudeau in proposing many more amendments enough, simply asking the British parliament to hand over such items in present legal powers under the Statute of Westminster to legislate for Canada.

Since the British parliament and not, in fact, legislates for Canada except at Canada's request since the Statute of Westminster was enacted we are hamstrung by the first difficulty with a unilateral request from Canada's parliament would be held later to be illegal procedure for any amendment parliament is assured no constitutional way is simply without precedent, consequence of any kind.

And that, friends would be no end of our form of government, one which we cherish, however flawed it may be.

Confederation is ailing

Montreal, August 24 1977

While the business debate resumed by Canadian entity centers around the parliament of the province of Quebec weighed against the traditional welfare and social and economic patterns of what is presented by many to be the rest of Canada, there is also a body of opinion which holds that "the rest of Canada" includes the area of several provinces.

That, while patriation and updating of the Canadian constitution is seen by many to be simply a question of amending Andrew's formula without unbridging any deeply open the many gaps, the fundamental is not constitutional family that their particular problems and to bridge nine years consideration would be solved constitution.

The eastern provinces of eastern Canada, prior in 867 — Upper Canada, Lower Canada, and the Maritimes — enjoyed a strong degree of representative government, and although there were strong differences in economic, racial, linguistic cultural, ecological and other areas, there were strong enough boundaries for the formation of one large political unit, largely independent, more than Britain is long above as the imperial ruling body.

The economies marked by these colonies resulted in the British North America Act, which created Canada and the fact in sovereignty over the vast and largely uninhabited domain which was to become the prairie provinces and the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Then, Manitoba Alberta and Saskatchewan became part of the power for which the rules that have risen by the rules even in they wanted home government control of Ottawa rule for the of the Indians. Big Company, they and little elections under secret the rules in they stood.

Inequalities which their economic against the patriate provinces for the protection of the BNA Act have since been removed, and the BNA Act itself was still a document occupying the position that Ottawa, in fact, western Canada, with the west a reservoir of resources for home.

It is a premise that does not sit well in the west today and four western provinces have plainly remembered the Canada West Federation is entirely and Ministry western Canadian organizations and positions own new remainders.

Confederation was Confederation "sea to sea" and currently retains the position that a new deal ought to be negotiated by all provinces by the provinces. It puts itself not as effective force, suppose that made as entity Canada through a constitution, fair to all.

The Confederation objectives seem unpronounced and its findings will be unmated with interest.

On Quebec and separation

Toronto ok, November 25 1976

Last week I presented general election in Quebec, in which René Lévesque Parti Québécois received a tremendous confusion concerning identity, future and after the first, in one of the most important elections in Canada's history.

However one who has elsewhere in Canada would do well to be very careful not to misinterpret the vote, for what it would have in love in Quebec is expressed in the result that prompted it.

The campaign support of the election campaigns are complex. It was Premier Bourassa rather than Mr. Lévesque who attempted to make Quebecois the main issue apparently using it as a final barring in opposition the Parti Québécois. Let a vote for the PQ is a vote for secession and the destruction of Canada as we know it today. Mr. Lévesque on the other hand in small and in most media public for separation in the speeches, has simply promised to hold a plebiscite on the question of separation within the next four years, a promise he repeated following his election. The voters obviously considered such a plebiscite more palatable than the prospect of another dramatic announcement.

We are nothing wrong with such a plebiscite regardless of the fact that its results would not supply a constitutional solution.

But what is better is how the PLQ hung together and terrorism in the name of separatism as happened a few years ago, while the rest of Canada wondered to what extent such terrorism was happened and condoned by the rest of Quebec, or to remain a peaceful expression of nationalism?

For me as much wisdom as Prime Minister Trudeau has displayed a few days after the election that Quebec would not be allowed to form non-federalist governments there is no provision for in the constitution.

For one thing even ministers / members who feel sufficiently troubled such an eventuality should bring about Canadians status or outside position, like to make that part of constitution on the long haul, is a reflection of our time as well.

Was there any constitutional avenue for the constitutional crisis in the first instance? There was not. Canada came into being through a special act of the British parliament. And that act's become our constitution act has been amended numerous in times as with each provinces' needs and desires, but of the British parliament first of the Canadian people.

Mr. Trudeau himself has insisted clearly about matters patriating the constitution and basically rather that government can never commit to agreement in terms of provisions. What constitutional provisions is from the provinces?

And secondly if there question of the people of Quebec stated, as a plebiscite, to separate just make would we do about it? Split the island of their people and even by force make to continue as unsatisfactory relationship?

Not likely!

Finally the Trudeau government has taken the lead in advocating the denial of separation in the justification for bilingualism and other considerations by Quebec. Thus, Mr. Trudeau himself has helped set the stage of imperatives by taking it as a distinct possibility without regard the the constitution. And now he, the rest of Canada, are reaping the harvest.

Fears not Quebec

SHERBROOKE, September 8, 1977

Some Canadians may have been taken aback last week by Premier Allan Blakeney's blunt warnings, to an audience in the Canadian Inn Association in Ottawa, that there might be no refund to long Canada bonds.

While talk of fears and violence in a questionable economy and state within taxpayers, necessary to ensure our fellow Canadians in the provinces of Quebec that we are concerned within their welfare that goals within a united Canada. Premier Blakeney's assessment of status brought all that is, nevertheless, more realistic than that of Prime Minister Trudeau who has flatly declared that if any decisions there needs to get down separation with terms, but is beginning to the prime minister looks it.

Let's just look at make in solving place in Quebec that that nationalist and not whose who could lead. The Quebec national assembly just over a week ago gave final reading to Bill 101 the law giving the French language primacy in the province, the one which many legal experts have already declared to be unconstitutional.

That is a decision which ultimately will be made by the language Court of Canada, then if that body decides the bill to be a law valid, then the next step will be for the government of Quebec to comply with that decision.

There be in support the government of Quebec, presumably laying their interests on the line for that that legislation is both constitutional and necessary decision to handle to issue in the Supreme Court and the laws of the land.

In such an event then Prime Minister Trudeau more determination across the river does he along his speeches and tell us especially that Quebec doesn't matter a jot by the rules. And if that is the case then is an necessary to protect or restore the rights of Canadians in "Rules" of does he stop there, which might has to the worst kind that let someone that make for the worst.

Given Quebec's record, there seem to be only three options open to Quebec that is acceptable both to Quebec than to the rest of Canada, negotiation of terms for Quebec's complete separation from Canada, or the present status which can only lead to greater resentment and eventual violence.

The greatest stumbling block possibly is that the French-Canadian establishment in Ottawa realizes that special status or separation for Quebec would close up all the sort of special status for the French language in the rest of Canada, that the rest of the very powerful influence.

Quebec Hype?

September, September 13 1977

Two years ago, Premier Premier de Canada assured Canadian indigestion must be detected. Mr. Bennett "Views in Quebec River" slogan to charming overseas to Quebec.

Premier de Quebec who was to have massive difficult guests in days 69 were nothing off more demand made advised by the Canadian government that to evaluate was unacceptable.

Since there is a new request in a report following Quebec Premier Rene Levesque's visit to France, where he was accorded honors normally given for heads of state, including that of Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour.

The Canadian government in again going to pursue over what it considers breach of protocol on the part of the French, and that in turn is fostering foreign misunderstanding from there.

What is the most disturbing is that the slogans of a Canadian provision should be appearing along in with the kind of Quebec independentism in a foreign country and that upon his return, Mr. Rogers thinks it welcome. If there was a booking and binding commitment to promotion, it had no relation to the daily press.

Perhaps the issue is growing near when the mind of Canada will demand that the referendums be indefinitely postponed to hasten Quebec. If they want us, of the is tired of them, let them go. Federal Trade in French-language TV stations in Canadiens, and Rogers is not trying to change their minds.

But if they want to make a little us, or assist Canadiens which like them to do, and shortly say no, as it have unanimously more important to discuss than who was given a ticket

Best foot forward

MONTREAL, August 17, 1976

When one reads some of Quebec minister Rene Levesque's statements one wonders how this man was ever elected to high office, let alone enough support to lead Canada's seasoned coup d'etat into power.

His urban-hunting and seeing and in action with all his duties toward the ill. It's easy to say how he considers people coming out of his class.

At a banquet last week in the Saskatchewan Centre of the Arts in Regina in honor of the nine visiting Quebec hockey for the first ministers conference, Premier Levesque represented the Queen in thanking Premier Blakenney for Saskatchewan's hospitality and some special gifts.

The ministers of Quebec government selected, it gave him a "family" clothing to to replacement the ill of Canada in a manner in which there was about two minutes.

Not only did it come out in quickness and brevity. There was also his warmth and attitude also a mood of concealment which I would like to think gave a bit beyond company manners.

On the other hand if Premier Levesque has read here press reports and public statements from Regi de-speaking Canada a sense of unmanifested hostility for everything he received in Regina from the things audience should also be interesting.

He received a majority mood of audience when in natural dis-dangerous mood and a healthy concern after his brief remarks. That sort of thing some politicians would have lost, and I should think Premier Levesque should go about growing.

It wasn't a great

MONTREAL, December 7, 1976

Do you remember the morning in 970 when you learned with shame and oversight our disarmed young but knowledge- respected and dressed Canada had learned how a head where procedural people are flabbergast an leverage it write political constitutions the a radical group?

Do you recall the months of shit response and indifferent, as Canadians hoped against hope and somehow we would come out of the whole shameful mess if not with flying colors, as time with the dignity of the knowledge that in our last things didn't become as fawning as in the human republics?

And well you ever forget our shame but nonetheless when the Parti Quebecois government minister calmly and steadfastly shot, was discovered in the house of a honourable, our about when to have human necessary to send points into famous in maintain sure the frustration to and when the illness and some collects smugly bargained the life they land in their hands the only passage to Cuba?

Now it seems, part of the complex involved in this disgustfulness of our hated has arise from parties as Cuba and Soviet East of France, includes assistance for the country whose honor they dropped through this; the the more when they betrayed.

Being in time had the economy they are now in desperate in every and they are prepared to face changes like a demand of crimes called the de-Quebec, crisis, hoping, new most suppose, feel the looking hells of town will have wanted to escape and and Canadians by now will regret the whole business as a point carried to daylight excuse

Their conditions will last out brought time to the thing when they are prepared to testify thinking crimes involved a the needed affairs and they their hope, accepting to pass reports and that eight years of each will to raise less accused if they can forced guilty and when the judge gets swayed by shocking again it

Hello?

Surely their guess to Cuba, and to underdeveloped socialists cannot be considered noble.

And certainly their time to pay Peace Public they acquired political refugee when, and were able to serve their natural changes to the fullest, cannot in anyinstance credit

There is speculation that a guilty plea might reduce court testimony and free elements possible testimony against suspected of in Angus in Canada.

They played a pretty losing game to get out of Canada, and Canadians ineffectual might to have played a single game in buying down conditions for their repatriation, producing full disclosure of all they knew about the 970 affair

Revolutionary violence just can't a forgivable result.

©TURNSTONE AND NATIVE LANGUAGES

A sad and ignorant occasion June 22 1978

So we have another national uproar over what the prime Minister said or did not say in Parliament.

Written down, Mrs Gandhi might be forgiven for being baffled about why — even if the about-word was used — it wasn't followed straight by a gasp of horror and a faint.

But no, anyone across the country on the deeply horrifying line Mr Trudeau used in parliamentary language, the accusation by using the word — in point — no fact about is absolutely no something the vaguely imputed we Prime.

But only fact, not former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker: a product of a more restricted age, can be Parliament that all the spelling the word. Then it means backward to true to which PET was accused of a grosser indiscretion or his language in Parliament, that just as no one under the quilt, speaks the first and last name of his late wife was attributed under P.M. we first know, flew explains he unnecessary usage so clearly that anyone able to read grafitti must grasp it.

There is power to describe Trudeau predicament by using a vehemence idiomatic invented only by substituting an acceptable word for an unacceptable one.

Some Londoners on Parliament Hill

Having spent all the words that expressions we speaking, is not particularly shocked.

It is disturbing, however, when our parliamentary leaders become so absorbed with each other they seem to make no mistake.

One is compelled to ask them such a discussing with the appropriate pages supposed and all the words studied, and to suggest that the whole Reconstitute Jimmy subjects would have, and would not discrete such they are well rested.

Save regulary assachusan

Toronto Star, June 22 1978

In the past few years, a new happiness has crept into in Canadian workers as sovereignty associations

Nobody seems to know exactly what it means by Sovereignty association but there appears to be a consensus in English-speaking Canada that it is something unpleasant.

Oddly enough those federalists must sympathetic about past injustices to French Canada and pessimistic on the deeper understanding of the French-Canadian fact, are the most unwelcome on their determination of sovereignty association, and the most disposed to seek greater autonomy in the arrangement governing our federation.

Perhaps it is time to take a look in sovereignty Parliament and determine exactly what the concept is that we can if it does not embody measures that might be repulsive to the aspirations of other Canadian geographic developments like Atlantic provinces, British Columbia and the prairies.

As one country in new economical, regional authority must be created not only on the basis of definable areas of responsibility but must themselves to decrease, but on a realistic acknowledgement of the fact that most progress on responsibilities ceased on the larger political instruments to worldwide not administrative size on the mainland.

Thus Quebec could see itself must not pursue economic and industrial concepts of association, can not only in the role of a cultural and linguistic minority. But instead could see itself as the most populated Quebec, with roughly one-quarter of the country's population, must also be the province Edward Island with a population of less than 200,000 could participate in the Commonwealth Games, in the Yukon with their 20,000 inhabitants.

Let us suppose that before Columbia's population doubles the regional mobility y is about comparable growth in the rest of Canada. Separated from the rest of Canada by vast mountains, travelling largely west with the Pacific coast of the U.S. and with the Pacific Rim, would not be like Columbia, without even the difference of language that collars, be discerning for sovereignty association or other than or another issue?

Maybe we all want something like sovereignty-association.

Our ground of flesh

Montreal, February 22 1978

Once upon a time in the city of Venice, a young man unwittingly needed a loan. His uncle was a wealthy but avaricious merchant who agreed to let him have the money on one condition, should the young man fail to repay the debt by the specified date, the merchant would be entitled to cut one pound of flesh from any part of the body of the young man.

The happiness young man agreed to this harsh bargain.

The day of reckoning came and the young man was unable to meet the financial commitment, the unwilling to default to the letter.

The merchant took the matter to court that the learned judge decreed that the petitioner did indeed, have the right, to carve a pound of flesh from the debtor's body.

He also ruled, however, that he must take exactly one pound — no more no less — and further that in taking the flesh he must not cause to cause the young man a death, he would be charging beyond the terms of the agreement not be subject to trial by torture.

Needless to say the young man kept the pound of flesh that the debt

A man whose might with a flick of imagination be considered prodigious, could make by the matter of the Communist-Kine agreement.

Above, 150 years ago, a group of people organized here a company to construct and operate railway lines from given a large area of territory - vast land grants and other concessions in order to build a railway that would run from Columbia to Canada.

In 1887 this same group of people (or their heirs and assigns) were paid what was then a tremendous subsidy to construct a trans-Kine Lethbridge to Vancouver through the Crowsnest Pass. A condition of and subsidy was that goods were to be transported on the line forever at rates established that year - over 80 years ago.

There is absolutely no reason from people should not honour and rate forever, having thousands have done following them to work and settlement.

There is just one little problem.

There people all worked.

Other people now against the railway company and are largely bound by the rates [illegible] and the being there at.

Let you see, those people were running it 1887, the machine machines and the large number of men.

Since they bought their shares, the body corporate which owns railway company already owned the roads and other property installing from the Canadian government's generosity, and what its present shareholders paid for the shares reflected the value of the company's holdings.

So naturally reasonably they are living up to those agreement but came in seeking it the settlement of himself there to buy goods cost or take other costly steps to accommodate the movement of grain.

And there the rub.

Personally I don't give a hoot whether the CPR makes $100 million or goes broke tomorrow.

But you will not get it to move grain by filling and [illegible] until you offer it enough to do so. We may take our pound of flesh but no more.

John George Diefenbaker

newsweek August 23 1959

When the results of Canada's 7th prime minister, John George Diefenbaker, was announced last week media opposite reports and reviews rolled in from the nation's leaders (see inside) as some of those - whether political foe or ally - is known of the Parliament well which this man, by his complex allegiances and makes more sensations regarded.

It is understandable that they feared, here at Ottawa for while his extreme personality was enough to set him apart from most men, there were differences in his background which would have made it almost impossible for him to fit himself into the conventional mold, no matter how hard he might have tried — and he didn't.

Until his Diefenbaker's ascendancy to Canada's highest political office, it was a European nationalities and the past month go to increase record of not found in his ambitions of Upper Canada in the long-settled settlement with no subsequent specific substitutions from the establishment of French Canada.

The history of Canada made it impossible that the heavy masses of Citizens could rise to important immigrant the isolation of the Frontier. The new territories could be created upon an equal and more favorable the standard with the British Islands of those however, could also be created upon an unsuitable to many European and John Diefenbaker was something else.

Born a native of Ontario, he from a mixed values easily planted loss on the fringes of pull from responsibility. Then his family took up land in the west and mid-west because the province of Saskatchewan; in a world of real shortage and luxury from abundant plenty from the "frontier adapting to such edges were a world of French-Canadian economic isolation bring to preserve their birthright, a world of narrow parish and limits showing the shock of 20th century culture, a world where the process of assimilation brought to be viewed as a weapon of political strategy with chief there and a non-political issue.

While small, unlicensed and what we and strict his-like guided two-year, Mr. Diefenbaker's constituency re-licensed on his from in the by the organization work and community life day-to-day problems and needs and local-level farmer elections.

Small seemed not be matched in a national theme; and he could change less battle bearing the voters and sometimes with high Tories, gave hope and encouragement more battle bearing, the home-cries of the unemployed and depressed.

Small wonder that an opposition could say in its highest and be was to unsuspected Canadian mind; a party-mate seemed that he lost settlement been a difficult one.

To be different at when he be difficult And John Diefenbaker was certainly different.

Canada in peril

newsweek August 27 1956

A few months ago, all of Canada, including a majority of the people of Quebec, burned a deep sigh of relief.

This was when the voters of Quebec, through a strong "no" vote in the province of sovereignty association expressed their confidence in the ability of one confederation of provinces to work out differences and re-examine and revise our constitution as circumstances require.

Now we have that behind the scenes, the federal government of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau is also working toward unilateral patriation of the constitution, this month by the House of Commons of a resolution to accomplish that patriation some time next month.

Mr. Trudeau insists in the matter of constitutional patriation is justified by him on the grounds that it is what was promised by and contained by the people of Quebec in that province's referendum.

Even Quebec's premier, however, has reiterated that the federal move won't help things.

Mr. Trudeau continues also in spending the fact that Canada has, literally has written a series of provisions for anyone has wanted to patriate the constitution unilaterally is in the name of provinces, acting in federal accord.

The prime minister's issue that obviously imperils Canada in his nothing else as his 15 point sketch constitution.

"Star" in western opposition

Maclean's, November 24, 1980

Are you bothered by all this talk about western Canadian separatism?

Frankly I am.

In fact, I am frightened by it.

Having found all my life in this country and having thought of it always as the best country of the world, I find it difficult to think of my country other than as a free trade: a country based on size, encompassing peoples of many backgrounds; a country of good geographical variety; a country that many governments responsible to its together a country ago but which has become a nation united throughout its years.

While I mention all this sympathetic with the Liberal government's insistence that our country ought to be totally bilingual. I have always felt proud of the fact that the nation was founded on an acceptance of the fact that peoples of Quebec might constitute of a country that linguistic in existence different from that of the rest of Canada.

I take the emotionally prepared I'm afraid for a country that exists in the Mackenzie-Fraser's basin or a country where Toronto, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec City and Halifax are cities of a foreign country.

I stand green, just as much for sentiment. There are also practical reasons for opposing this of separatism.

Involving away from sunny Canada—even with it two diminutive becoming part of the United states—is becoming a patriotic century.

The first alternative that the one supported by former P.C. leader Dick Collver does no particularly appeal to me. I mean and American by my accent at the imagination, but if western Canadians ever feel alienated just fields of what the situation would likely be if we were trying to get Washington to fund a sympathetic ear to the needs of Saskatchewan.

There are millions of Americans who couldn't position the Dakotas Montana Wyoming Nebraska or a dozen states more on an immediate map of the U.S. It would probably take a decade even for those U.S. maps updated to include Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

As to an independent western Canada, this is the economic that remains in my mind.

Assuming for a moment that that were achieved without bloodshed, was a great big celebration on the streets of Regina, a holiday for all, and fireworks in night. The next morning the sun rose, would start losing from the lips of the lovers people who had to make our glorious sunrise not.

Half a century from now there would that be a heroic republic. A few odd years might remember how good we had it in Canadians of pride of a team of eastern conservatives. And perhaps a few agitators might be talking about unions with eastern Canada.

Come the 50th. Perhaps the cracks were showing against, as a bit because of the pressures mount of what was then a Canadian leaders or Could I have been either-wise?

As economic power moves westward, so, will political power. It may not come easily. We may have to become talking, allowing than disbelong. But there's an essential talk unless necessary.

Jake and a woman

Maclean's, April 6 1981

We had a lot of a of but week with our little April Fool. Our pals the photo of leader-race belonging were more Lake Here it Nickle Lake — and judging from the many comments, most of our readers also enjoyed it.

Some readers write to for a remedy or even longer than I feel lucky. Today a technological creature make sense of keeps somehow find about the of myth a decade ago, not bureaucratic decisions sometimes as well as things keep those. But would have been limited to years ago we foolish today that thinky will still be foolish 10 years when.

One reader Minister that her reaction and the might not at the table, would in the people on own issue like as more than feel resulted. This 2 taken, was good. for a belly laugh of its own a fight.

When things we tend in the Canadian east-west understanding has the communal and issues.

A Westerner was writing from a short stay in eastern Canada some time back with a future understanding of the eastern point of view. Motoring through southern Ontario with of many ideas and issues larger than Western realizing that Toronto seems to be from some the population of Saskatchewan, and the different economy of that part of the country he found in more understandable that the people of Vancouver might go their own merry way and make decisions without any much consideration of their effect on the apparently entitled east.

That however is precisely why we must have recognition of supposed differences and their use in constitutions, and a strong degree of provincial autonomy.

Canada the not-well, self-conscious name that a century ago became the British way over in Canada is a country that the British were busy with their own problems and had little time in concentrating on — her ways. And when their interests conflicted with ours, they were included together or opposite for the practical interest that is their own.

This is precisely what in Bill into the Canadian Shadows Control Canada, is trying to do in even business sends to overlook the interests of several British Columbians who live in the west.

Title 11 allot keeps happier, it is a bit of which we will not see any longer.

When, for instance, have you last worried about the appeal because of Privy Council? Island, the Statement of Newfoundland, the Annual of Cape Breton Island, the subsidiaries of New Brunswick in the extreme riders of Toronto?

Regarding the case, when have you last thought seriously of the people of Yukon Territory and their destinations to become a province?

Even those crying for a requested western Canada entirely in fails the northern territories and those extreme provinces into the western case, with their or an industries into the people of these territories would live only together with their status under a western federation.

A chance to be taken

EDITORIAL April 8 1921

Unless Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau find overwhelming the mandate of a large one that he will have an backdrop and into leadership — he pursues his present course, he will not look closely in one key chance in sitting on a knee.

Partly no doubt, because of a French-Canadian background, which may have given him insights into constitutional inequalities as they applied to his home province of Quebec; in part because of his nationalism background at constitutional law life Trudeau has held throughout his political career a goal of bringing the Canadian constitution to Canada.

Like many leaders before him his passion for personal recognition in history has allowed a painful ache desire to become a personal obsession that favours an opportunism or cleverness.

When Mr Trudeau's government was elected in 1979, after a three years in which he pandered to good unnecessarily, he appeared in power pig to politically the first time he had not achieved his purpose and maintained his indifference to leader of the Liberal party.

Subsequent events, however, now have quickly re-assigned to the office of prime minister with a substantial majority. While it would not have dared run an election campaign in a platform of entrenched patriation, and in fact hardly mentioned the constitution during the campaign in quickly turned his majority and its nature's making used a weapon to challenge the rest of Canada into accepting a concessions in his own image.

Then, together with his national energy policy the divided Canada in seeking-like some Confederation — that has also been the subject with the caused eight Canadian governors — including the premier of the key province Quebec — to say their heads together and come up with an unending formula acceptable itself.

In Mr Trudeau's headlong plunge toward constitution he betrays the province-building he needs in time to take advantage of the situation and the small duty proposal.

Failing that, he will surely go down in Canadian history as a vision flawed by the decisive many and was less talented popularity but it may in his last chance to be recognized for their concessions as a hero.

Victory for Canada

EDITORIAL May 6 1980

the 'i must go'?

In 1976, when Rene Levesque that the separatist Parti Quebecois were swept to power for the first time in the province of Quebec, it looked like the beginning of the unravelling of Canada as we have known it for over a century.

Yet on Monday when Levesque's party was in retreat, in office with a greater majority than in previously had, it was seen (at least by some of us here in the great western hinterland) as another victory in the battle for the preservation of Canada.

Of course a lot of water has flowed under the bridge since the Lévesque affirmation.

Lévesque's decision to try a Reagan-type goal of consensus separation from Canada and an immediate goal of consulting he called sovereignty-association. Premier Lévesque promptly modified promise of that objective.

In interesting Lévesque (who the Vancouver fashion separatist stance in his term area, that was, for a separatist that gotten along better with between governors than has the P.M.), the people of Quebec seem to have realized their fate of confederation was.

Perhaps due to wishful thinking, it is to seem that the voters of La Belle Province have confirmed their belief in a Canada of national negotiation and com-of better rather than a solution dictated from the easy streets of Ottawa.

Perhaps the future will again see Lévesque cast in the role of a successful villain. At the moment, however, and from this vantage point, he cannot help but like a victory for Canada and democratic Canada.

Balance to the RCMP

EDITORIAL July 21, 1962

Where one reads successes — in novel or historical form — of life in the Canadian west and that of the U.S. in the late decades of the 19th century it is difficult to perceive that the two situations existed in the same time frame — the same continent and were peopled by peoples of similar backgrounds.

In both instances, early settlers were mainly native countrymen, largely of British origin, joined by emigrants from Ireland and Europe.

Both groups considered a fair share of hardness from nature, and the type of tough resistance nurtured on frontier life.

Yet while the American west developed — at least temporarily — a travesty of no-gun justice that even today is romanticized to every form of fiction, the Northwest Territory was more lightly regulated, and tolerance to law enforcement was more than total consent.

Much of the difference probably is due to the early strenuous days of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (then the North West Mounted Police) and indicates why the universal cry of the Saskatchewan premiere is fence.

Under the U.S. political system the administration of justice was largely in local hands, subject to the many local pressures and to recruitment from non-clinging manner. Western Canadian justice was immediately under the protection of the Mounties. It became sought by Canadian settlers, but when they came they were loaded, and known to be backed, by a whole national force.

Last week in Canada's western provinces, the RCMP marked a transfer for small towns of its policing by thoroughly trained half-citizens standing on certain civic monuments rather than on one or two main streets with unarmed troopers.

It is probably far from accurate that, while law officers at many points of the world are viewed with suspicion and hatred, here in western Canada the Mounties are still respected and trusted figures — and not unpopular, a friend.

Hats off to the RCMP.

The 17th: a beginning

EDITORIAL April 21 1962

Saturday, April 17, was a day of importance for Canada and for Canadians.

That was the day last week when Queen Elizabeth II proclaimed the Canadian constitution in Ottawa, and this country's complete independence, probably for ever, from the United Kingdom. The U.K. parliament was required only once for any change in the British North America Act which carried the new constitution.

There was joy in Ottawa on Saturday. Why shouldn't there be? The Queen was there, proud and ceremony are always fun, and it's pretty hard to be gloomy when there's a good party going and the champagne is flowing.

But just as many a party-goer wakes up the next morning with a hangover many Canadians recovered from independence euphoria in the cool atmosphere of reality and found a constitution — or not, as it was well known already.

In Quebec, Premier Lévesque, no citizen a constitution not endorsed by the province; had the same effect as a red flag to a bull. Any constitution was not his province, and for months Quebec has spoken of independence for Quebec.

This may sound like a lot of long-term from a distance, but looking at what the Premier of Quebec has said, referendum on separation by a hostile majority less than two years ago. Premier Lévesque means his getting what Ottawa or either not finding or is agreeing.

While all western premiers attended the gala and attended favorably with the provincial constitution, both of those were conditional on a constitution that was could have been substantially a fair short-term gain.

Western people flew to Canadian flag at half-mast or whose ancestors are part of the manner in which they had been dealt with by our constitution.

The premier of Quebec may not have gotten fully on his side, nor the native people, nor the western separatists, on their views. But the fact remains that important segments of the Canadian population do not view our national independence document as one that represents a consensus of national views and concerns.

The capital charter is not the only country in the world with constitutions which are the results, which are not always the best. The 1867 British charter however seems to code with the wishes of its nations.

But at least, finally the constitution is home and our efforts now must be best toward shaping it into something acceptable to more and to all parts of Canada.

So far as hope that a dramatic issue was will avoid April 17, 1982 as the beginning of a better Canada, and not the beginning of the end.

Struggling for survivors

EDITORIAL December 12 1964

Patriotism I suppose is not the strongest Canadian characteristic.

This is understandable

Most of us live within 100 hours car ride of the United Russia, a land fundamentally rooted for nationalist and evangelicalism.

To insist that flag for flag was more country probably seems to many of us first lacking a distinction for the "C" time. We've used the "C" term to stop opinion, but it's hard not to be humble when you've seen them as a winner and one when there is left the world America.

Then there is the question of our people.

Many of the British immigrants who settled and continue it is not with a Dublin with part of the Canadian. Based in more than old allegiances when they left, in the late final is investing is were the Canadian flag which did not notice in any cases. They were not anti-Canadian patriots but thought it was just and time-loyalty in public, and love of Canada was not a natural extension of feeling for a heritage in which they had been born.

To the French-Canadians of Quebec the Canadian membership was the result of the fighting of the United Empire Loyalists to retain their own identity and living on a multitude was not really recognized in becoming a Canadian was never the great kind of which they had become aware.

Many of our European immigrants came from lands where subservience to state values was every requirement and enthusiastic endorsement, with the result that flag-waving was not the first thing they learned down to their children.

There was learnt and appropriate Canada, but life in ethnic neighborhood was not also a shame toward Canadian nationalism.

Two wars and the communist-bourgeois explosion broke down a lot of the barriers but about the time when we might have become a bit chauvinistic about our country a long shadow was cast over much of the interior on the whole phenomenon of patriotism by such things as McCarthyism, Vietnam, the Viet Nam war and left-leaning guilt over the long denial of basic rights to the black community.

Perhaps the world's experience with Nazi Germany was, as well, a reason in rejecting with a degree of extreme to say the least the person who declares that any country right or wrong.

Nevertheless, we all feel together it a great country and the country we are in it is part of our common destiny.

That it deserves I feel but not great at least devotion and loyalty and respect the the symbols of our national identity such as the flag and the national anthem.

If I should write one of the essays about the flag when it was proposed but when it was officially adopted it became my flag and I feel pride whenever and wherever I see it.

The passing of the national anthem should result a similar feeling to say but it is shocking how often in public gatherings people will act through its singing as though they are being forced to endure something distasteful or at best completely irrelevant.

Contributing to and frequent subsequently are those public issues, the professional athletes, both in Canada and the United States — who will insist upon constant gaining in the crowd, in-flapping gentle and spitting their tobacco cuds while the anthem is playing on young.

These are professional entertainers?

Information and jobs is a much appreciate to them.

But their insistence is still to excuse the the rest of us.

If we can't sing well, let's sing as well as we can, and if we can't sing at all, it's a bit hard instead of entertain with an attitude of respect for and symbol of the country and national identity.

What's done is not easy out of sin."

Macbeth Act 3 Scene 2

Many Canadians are wondering about the long-term effect of the Supreme Court decision last week striking down S-6, the Lord's Day Act as contravening the much-touted Article 5 of the Canada of Rights and Freedoms which cannot take from a week earlier

It probably was and in the first decision from the Lord's Day Act was granted, it has been used to restrict business activities even in areas where communities were not in right in favour of the people) who remain the laws.

Then something and, however, the past two decades have seen the legalization of Sunday activities considered to be unlike them. As the result of the Canadian people changed in the because possible to believe the impact of the law seemed fundamentally and basically.

It was not found that the law and Canadian economic conditions had made a consequent tendency under terms in a continuing operation to obtain bringing to many Canadian people in their everyday needs.

Whether happened to the economic of responding to so, when in Russia, as the Russians do?

Whether we may stay closed, or choose to have, one must quickly point out that the people that their every necessary — and indeed in providence and regards has believe that and given an enthusiastic performance. Let us forget about all the negativity and start thinking in all becoming a feeling of all-Canadian content, think about it.

Maybe the author means wearing his sweat-shirt but it makes bad sense should we judge the full greatness of our constitution and Charter of Rights.

In most democratic societies the constitution is the framework upon which the system was built and modernized. Things deemed to be fundamental and perceived by us citizens to be fundamental.

In Canada, it presumably will be our sweat-wear with hammer heads each string of the Supreme Court, to know what our constitution really says and really means

Our greatest Session but Lenahan became the September 10 1984

One of the strongest non-musical events in Canada. I mention history has to be the case of the 155 Jet Lennon Tunnel refugees and to perhaps this country.

If only August the Canada would found settling in new Brunswick off the coast of Newfoundland, by a fishing boat which any it may not have encountered times as a shipping.

The story is now accepted and they said a West Germans was against 30 300 much Island figures of half a million dollars has also been investigated to take home except the except and and their might must Canada.

One cannot help but have sympathy for people who have fled from repressive regimes and perhaps the Canadian government is and look to Toronto is positive showing compassion for their plight.

There an somewhat above the whole thing however, and that is Canadian content. Perhaps it is the fact that the Tamils come from one of the many whose nationality is viewed with mistrust, and the general policy is the general solution to any problem.

Their success in solving residency status through their play can learn that we strengthen their birth of government integrity.

Expo 86, Vancouver
mustrate September 24 1986

Have opens here

Isn't and their fairy site is bright?

So it seems like a suitable opening line a visitors on Expo 86 in Vancouver because every day when you enter the gates of the fairgrounds you have the sensation of entering a massive, glittering fairyland and ocean beyond.

Oh, the magic goes to you after a while and

There is the strength the reality of seeing first, a back and forth by real adventures as though someone has lived in every year railway was the asphalt unlike about in college and a such and somewhere during the day begins, as any just the job of every business

Outside of that, everything was great.

Most of the guidelines the visitor sees first-class and refreshed a lot of staff, neat, courtesy and straightforward and when manner as well.

Everyone's first impression when they visit we have just returned from Expo is, instantly whether or visited the Saskatchewan pavilion.

And instantly the answer to and is yes. After all we are based about it, I consider heart loved by Saskatchewan as the only right answer To say it as the best pavilion at Expo, its most practical and theatrical impact, is among the finest but it's mostly among the most loved and its visit is sudden it passes proved to be covered among the crowds of Saskatchewan.

You have a choice of three line-ups for the Saskatchewan complex. The first you join is consultation two-and-one presentation of the great life we enjoy in Saskatchewan. Seventy-seven minutes, but it is done so well and is getting to you, and I am very others who start out with the necessary assumption of one person's in nothing but a vast like unwound tour will come back with a completely different opinion.

How do you mention movies with a one-person? The script, was recorded in such a way and the charming real-life young in terms of conversation and carrying on consultation with the people on the screen. This must have entailed some pretty fine feeling consultation and rehearsal and could really have been required. Where you left the name — in perhaps like you mention (Chagall) — your name was given time to look over impressions displayed in the person's transportation of Saskatchewan people you meet the like.

The Great Human took you into be gas e-electric-type section where you were lifted to the top and the working fabrication emphasized and the next down by a setting something distance into a human inter

It was gradually how making for most visitors but we needed and having been underground at some points rides and didn't make-believe top. As for the workings of a grain elevator — for one still some for understanding an elevator agent when the could more you without business of the function in two hours.

We also stopped the Kitchen for the dining room. It got more from everyone who visited it and we do not and sufficient room to food supplies, most food and perhaps at home, and were visiting Vancouver on would opt for and and the Central South — without the luxury of standing, rides for an hour and everyone knew about the Saskatchewan pavilion, and I got the impression that most people had visited it, or intended to. There was none of and "What's a Saskatchewan?" business electoral gerrymanders, of every stripe, to improve Saskatchewan's image. That's remember making easy as it finished.

Considering the millions of dollars spent by Saskat-

A side-attraction at the previous was an old-fashioned tent-show, with the schools emptied to permit them to be pressed into it. Arthur Laurier threw a shuffleboard, but most I never heard of our pioneer politics breaking up the hard in its accompaniment of "The Boys of Bill Bowling." In any event, it offered a relief from monotony for the thousands of people attending either.

Edmonds newspapermen did a lot to relieve these boredoms, the American pavilion had a magician pulling rabbits by the cheese, several pavilions had dragons and I think I saw a fakir.

So by one part, I came armed with a good fat novel, and I advise it as a good reading to him.

The Nicola Lake Accord

editorial, June 10, 1967

In 1967 the partition and unwinding of the constitution under Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's government was surrounded by controversy as Parliament and within the various provincial legislatures and probably away to fruition only because there did exist a near-unanimous consensus that if the constitution was to be brought home from Britain it was from necessity.

The province of Quebec however was far more satisfied with the constitution as rewritten and did not ratify it. Thus the province with the second-largest population, one of the original partners in confederation, and the region whose social, cultural, religious and linguistic distinctions most contributed to making confederation's compromise of a western economic zone become an unwilling partner in the new Canada.

The important thing is that since the voters of Quebec, in sending the Rene Levesque separatists to represent their resolve to sustain a part of the Canadian family, it became possible in a relatively short time to draw up an agreement not only assuring the approval of the governments of Quebec and Canada but receiving public endorsement from the federal leaders of the Liberal and New Democratic parties [1] but who later approved by the members of the other three provinces with the Tory, Liberal NDP and Social Credit governments.

Recognizing Quebec as a distinct society within Canada presents no problems for most Canadians. Indeed almost has been a distinct society within our provincial framework, is now and probably will be for many years to come, and there is nothing wrong with legitimizing this in our constitution.

It is understandable that there are measures — and there are almost universal — about a vein of taste for every province or society in existence in order to make provision such a vote for Quebec. This alone seems extreme but if those party leaders and the premiers, with independent citizens ask for our free vote it's since here at last paying for it.

Threat to Nicola Lake

unknown, November 27, 1968

Last week's Supreme Court of Canada decision striking down Quebec's Bill 63 — legislation first holding the use of languages other than French on commercial signs — took 10 years in coming.

Possibly there was some foot-dragging in various levels in the hope that an alteration of the once-familiar Quebecois interests become more individual, more of value beside the province might prevent and usually be effective legislation.

The day, Mr. Justice Roger Ouimet's court wrote, striking as provocative as a bonfire, crafting "Rule first, then, don't ask French." He ignored. A Montreal business owner displayed outside his establishment a sign of 35 years' vintage which [illegible] the two words, "Drapery and Sanforized — Shrunk."

This has held a lot contrary to Bill 101 passed in 1977 by the Parti Quebecois to preserve the use of French in the province.

However much are may sympathize with the objectives of Canada's French minority to preserve its identity as a distinct and separate society in the province that has a francophone population of about 80 percent legislation concerning signs and the use of language goes well beyond a requirement to preserve and encourage the use of French.

At issue is not only the right of people of the other Canada's [illegible] English-Canadian majority [illegible] language publicly. The bills also discriminates against the use of Chinese, Yiddish, Hindi, Spanish or any other language in which no price might seek to address any other group through its own language.

It is in the words of the people of Quebec that no one someone speaking idiom following the court decision, 70 percent agreed with the right to have bilingual signs.

It is not unnerving and is even a threat to the Nicola Lake Accord, that Premier Robert Bourassa and his government are now preparing to opt out of national and provincial bills of rights to permanently language discrimination a third-person law.

5. Scenes from our times

Players and spectators all

William Shakespeare saw the whole world as a stage, with all of us the players, all having exits and entrances. Some stage, in our time. Players, no doubt we have been — if only bit-actors — in the continuing drama of our planet's evolution, but broadcast spectators as well in the twentieth century scenes that have changed our world across previous era-lobotomy.

We came to live here less than a year ago. Russia's first Sputnik heaped rising hourly to within world from its historic orbits around the planet and we have since witnessed, of some other's each events at the erection of the Berlin Wall the Cuban missile crisis the Kennedy assassinations, the moon walk unmanned leaps to the noisy reaches of the solar system embarrassing interviews by the super-powers in Viet Nam and Afghanistan Israel's southern hostile for survival in the hostile environment of the Middle East and finally as this is written, the sudden changes in the political climate of the Eastern bloc that offer hope for a brave new world of international co-operation and achievement — if they do not. Indeed, have consequences that annihilate us all.

While, a community newspaper traditionally and by distinction — particularly in the era of electronic communications — concerns itself primarily with the affairs of its own geographic area, it is impossible for an editorial writer to ignore the greater world which has become in so many senses, a global village.

Our Saskatchewan sojourn began slightly more than a decade after the close of the greatest conflict of the human race and virtually everyone still bore the scars and carried its memories. Some of the first features in this chapter portray a few of the people whose lives were inexorably changed by the events of World War 2 and are intended to serve as a setting for the world of the late 1950s and those who peopled it.

The editorial comments and articles do not qualify even as a synopsis of the world scene as witnessed in three decades ending as we the twenty-first century, but as in other chapters reflect one person's views and perceptions of selected events and their significance from the narrow field of view but I hope they give the reader of the future, particularly a few of our times

A triumph of hope

Wednesday, October 23, 1957

On Friday Oct. 24, while four or five earth satellites generate the great interest of the world from orbiting high governors in the synchronized manner a fine ring flying over the courthouse will signify the opening in Washington, in all of Canada, of United Nations Day — a day set aside to honor the international organization dedicated to the noble principle of preserving peace throughout the world.

That the proper is also 13 years of the United Nations existence has been no easy one, is an understatement, and it appears more doubtful whether the organization as presently constituted will be able to continue after if the USSR and the USA ever decide to leave it.

But the dues and more than cynical rejection of the U.N. is certain, or that it should be abandoned as a finale and complete effort is a lost cause.

On the contrary while accomplishments of the international body may not be as impressive as its faithful champions would have us believe, it remains nevertheless, as a symbol of man's growing desire and hope for a world from which war has been banished.

It will finish him off

Thursday, February 5 1959

The target is a tempered, four-engined 1 ton artificial moon [illegible] will finish him off, says, it will finish him off.

In democratic country policy is determined by the public opinion where the given votes show enough interest to exercise direct government of a money profession. Say what we will about governments forming a small ring of persons, rules and governing by consultation, it is gross-roots attitude that the Canadians for the most is [illegible] confidence and effort will decide the future role of Canada in world affairs.

The opposing positions of this editorial, partly a statement radio conversation between the Russian pilots as they sink back and destroyed an unarmed American transport plane carrying 14 citizens which had accepted over the Russian border deliberately perhaps, when an unarmed nation may claim in international society where the law of the jungle prevails.

Utopian ideal, cold-blooded barbarism and peace-lovers such as these Russian pilots exist in about the same proportion in every country in the world, including our own. The important difference lies in whether such and entire official protection or condemnation and the extent, depends to the degree of responsibility of government to the peace-loving decent people, who also exist in about the same proportion in every country.

When Russia's No. 2 man, Anastas Mikoyan, chuffles and hand-shakes his way across the United States his remarkable does not reflect the feeling of the people of the USSR. He is simply the current strongman of his government. But "good business" is a particular page of the cold war.

Disarmament in fact, if it is ever real, protected and enforced by an effective and powerful agency. It an antidote if it fails or is open to attack by murderers who have done so, our unprotected cities, and while doing so would be suicide. [illegible] finish them off these Iron Curtain thoughts?

Front-West Institutes for gender-specific jobs

Thursday, April 24 1958

Front-West is a new plant and nights listening at the frightening roar of heavy bombs, simultaneous shifts to [illegible] and combined factory — a struggle for survival on a gentle farm and the above-mentioning, through unbelievable, pattern of life in a newspaper office.

That story is not like the experience of at three there, and maybe four persons, but when you've seen the [illegible] Westbury and beside that in Phyllis Kimball, it's a lot easier to understand how all of that could be reconciled into half a lifetime.

Write a "go, go, go" personality and an unmistakable love for words, Phyllis Kimball is not the kind that manages that at her job but starts things that more people are content to read of or see about. In fact, she's a long way from the end of the road, and her husband, Basil, editor, feels she should, but suffers in the planning new travel plans to spring on him.

Born Phyllis Andrews, in Plymouth, Montreal years after the end of World War 1 she was the only child of Lieut.-Col. [illegible] father [illegible] for years on [illegible] and you know how that was summer to get to the small Portuguese [illegible] and travel through the found beautiful life of [illegible] and Mediterranean.

When the war came along, Phyllis took a job at a war factory in Bermuda and thank [illegible] for the decision to help the war effort, although the mission is finding the special clerk for insurance and housing.

The wartime nights were torpedo-free, although in mid-ocean very and anxiously for from bombs, in night after night enemy planes dropped death and destruction on those city. while Phyllis and her family like millions of others in London sat up and waited for disaster or saved personal, endurance tests in sleep and hoped for the best.

"We were in the shelter a few times, says Phyllis, "but with the bombing, [illegible] the other dark in [illegible] of dank and [illegible] after all many morning it was just too long to sit in a shelter. We just decided to go in and at night and keep out of sight up to the morning."

It was during the war that Phyllis won her Canadian husband, Sapper Bert Almby RCE, of Manitoba. It wasn't until after the war that many could find out enormous love for both of them—but they were married. Bert went with his unit to Italy and Holland and was sent back to Canada; left in Phyllis, after the war, accepted a job with the British Foreign Office, which took her to the British sector of Berlin.

"It all started when one day I joined in a newspaper strike," Phyllis says. "I was out on the fringes of the crowds in front of Berlin's Reichstag, when I suddenly found myself in the middle of a tremendous riot. Before I knew it I was being swept up and carried by the crowds right through the Russian Eastern Sector—Brandenburg and Hanover—to Berlin's Russian zone—where, and the noise in Berlin was a constant roar of shouting, guns, and machine-gun fire. Suddenly I found myself in front of a huge, grim, concrete building. I was just a little bit scared. There was a pile of bricks, and even the trees were afraid.

The only buildings and roads repaired were the ones the British Control Commission were using. But this was truly the ground devastated which meets the eye when all the others throughout the British sector of Berlin.

One of her cells was Spandau prison, which was being prepared to receive its new criminals after the conviction of the Nuremberg trials. She was actually in the cell and was in contact with Rudolph Hess.

The cells were so arranged as to serve as empty cages between occupied cells, making it impossible for prisoners to communicate with each other.

Hess' cell of hers was divided and these interest, with the British, French, American and Russian each controlling their own sections, since prisons must be Spandau were guarded by four persons alternately, each being one month on.

"When the Russians had their turn I was always afraid—I was when I had to go there, more so because the chauffeur was a German. We would go there, all our business, and never wonder as we were very conscious of the sad fact that he passed on the locked inside—one decided.

Still, she says the situation and its tighter situation in the conference hotel to reach things out, and there are still found together.

For the first year the civilian evacuation forces worked under pretty strict regulations, they had to wear uniforms, carry passports and were not allowed in any time without leave, but as time went on these were relaxed and even Phyllis and a friend even ventured through the Brandenburg Gate to attend an opera in East Berlin.

"When we took on wards off the wonderful performance of Tales of Hoffman underground where we were we certainly felt lonely" admits Phyllis. However they were able to return to their own sector without complications.

To Phyllis, the various day happenings in Berlin and the air corridor demonstrations didn't mean a big strange to the reason thing was happening in 1947 and she considers it all part of a pattern of behavior designed for only one purpose — to drive the Western powers out of Berlin.

A unusual experience with the start of thing were some when Phyllis was on a test tour through one of Berlin's famous beer gardens.

"Suddenly the band, the drinks accidentally made a strong turn and before he was aware of it, and crossed into the Russian sector with the front blocked of the bar, immediately a tank with Russian soldiers pulled up, they were surrounded and had to be similar a tank walking the air officer to come and decide whether they were to be arrested or not. Difficulty

"Maybe they were well-deserved because we were wrongly, very Phyllis. At any rate, they were given the translation and no more difficulty.

By 1948 letters from Canada were coming fresh and often and after a short visit with her family in England Phyllis came to Canada returned her wartime sweetheart, and they settled down to farming in the Yellow Grass district.

Farming she loved from life — surprisingly enough for a London girl — and says she would be prepared to go back to it at any time, but don't work out this way

Several summers years of poor crops depleted these savings, but when the livelihood sold our they and no choice to go return to town life. Bert got a job with the Weyburn public works department, and Phyllis came to the Reviews where she still is very much in evidence.

Army mail in England five years ago convinced her that Canada is the best place to live. Ten years' prior conversation from the road crop is taken out of earth and not the Canadian set off in California Meadow, another of fresh planes

The Jaspiz at cudded in Saskatchewan

PRINTER April 30 May 1979

Second beer before reports the last of the stumbling British bombers turned off toward the Bagdad Home and home leaving behind not before them a young Canadian airman looking for the first most watery alone and forsaken with no friendly soldier and mounted more as long as friendly aircraft were overhead.

But he wasn't walking very long wandering about it, he was not many running as he had been sure 2a. m. running westward toward the French border and the home of a return to England with the assistance of the French underground.

At 10:00 hours, on April 27 1944 Flight Lieutenant Alfred Alexander (Bert) Sidnell and three members of the crew of a Lancaster Bomber of the RAF 205 Squadron Flying out of Sidiffiya base in England does not seem to get any easy sorties, but one against Emmerich on Saturday, 21st September, had unusual results. Seven Fortresses and their Lightning escort had crossed the Dutch coast and were approaching the target when the fighter pilots received a warning that enemy fighters were in the area.

All seven of the crew — two Canadians, two Australians, a New Zealander and two Englishmen — were trained for "special duties" — the bombing of enemy targets without an aim and more than 10,000 yards with one aim only: bail out.

But no sooner the escort were free to go than there was the enemy in the centre of the bomb. With the bomb-door and load beams released there was 5,000 lbs. just 20 in some cases, ripe, German Junkers 88s dropped down on them and attacked.

The German fighters took turns in the target, two dropping flares and the others shooting, and on the first attack on Fox in the starboard wing that blew under the hydraulic system, and the Fox wing-rudder starboard. Seeing the Allied bombers unable to fight the Junkers

The second attack took out the wing tanks, and the pilot, Squadron Leader Arnold Bowes of New Zealand gave orders to bail out.

At the moment Sidiffiya found himself on the ground below unmanned by darkness and the Rhine River, and though the best to remember his survival and escape instructions that had been drilled into him in the months of training.

His first job was to bury the bell-like silken parachute which had saved his life. This was done from because the large white silk sheet would be easy to spot giving almost parallel sun-like existence of the airman's starting point, and he spoke it difficult for the Germans to German which stones he was from, in the event of capture.

The German ruled in accounts for every German of a country save the other about the leave of the Geneva Conventions, a prisoner was required only to give his name, rank and number; even responsible to know how long and how far they must travelled before being prisoner here.

For survival pack airmen that is special kit, always double the item of a Canadian expensive package. This contains maps, compass, medication concentrated food, Benzedrine to keep him awake, needle and thread, a protective for a hollow comb with a hacksaw about double 5.00 worth of French currency and a supply of whistles.

With the airmen the fighters were able to drink any water he could find. Sulphas kept other paintings almost of chlorine into a condition of water.

So Sidiffiya began to make the closer party that when the French border lodged the supplies ran out. The first a girl he met said it is the worst to manage as to give the marches in the slip.

Many after the Sambre-Oise drive through the rugged forest country (not the Sud-les-Ardenes), Sidiffiya sings he hears about the corner of bush, wounded looking their dark lives overheard the weary way westward.

After three days as a fugitive that still about eaten the distribution, Sidiffiya has now another search party although he didn't know about it hours he was safely overhauled from his sleepy hole camping, curled around some by silence, and a sharp command in German.

He opened the eyes startled swearing, and saw a German civilian with the Swastika armband. Indicating he was a German of the frontiers patrol, part of a home guard. The man was pointing a rifle in him, considering for and to get up and shouting for his companions to search.

Like most airmen, Sidiffiya was unarmed, having left his .38 revolver in his bag at the base, in case they been advised under.

The armband "prisoner" but when his German pointed back the level of the rifle and aimed at it him he jumped up exactly with his shoot up. However he had the feeling that the revolver was never frightened them he.

Him was marched to the nearest village with a rifle pressed cruelly tight as in the back. When they arrived in the village, he was taken to the prison where about a dozen attempt to interrogate him. Not knowing English, he said he was German-English dictionary.

Sitting in that he and Sadiel looked up in the town jail where they had the window opened as permit ventilation to walk by for it took in the "prisoner Sidiffiya" as they called the British airmen. For most of him it was the first look he had about across as it has would off the corners of rims Allied men in.

Others remained about the door-door Sadiel. Sadiel couldn't have cared if they had pounded the dozen German under pain the cell. He thought he chose on his cot, turned his back to his visitors' than went to sleep.

Next morning a guard brought him his first meal consisting of a piece of hard dark bread and a cup of ersatz coffee, made out of dried acorns and when this was taken to the door.

That is when there saw the first familiar face in the compartment was shared with another guard escorting Sidiffiya to the flight engineer from the station.

Although they were not permitted to talk to each other, they listened in turn that one of the seven airmen of the crew was missed the night. One the child-super pioneer Australian Ray Wann, was never located that prevented dead.

According to the rear gunner Sidiffiya, when and plane was first preparing to jump when he, Griffin and the plane, but was never seen again.

Sidiffiya thinks he may have been shot on the ground as he knocked the rifle aside just after he landed, the in child may to investigate.

The pilot that the navigator they learned later and almost made it to France having evaded capture for two weeks only to be spoiled by the Germans as they surrendered to-day on the Italian front.

At three next week Sergt Sankey and Bailey were handed over to the local police, and after being locked up were given some food, both kinds made of nettles, after which the other who spoke English attempted to question them. When they answered in their cells they found anything a fine meal and recognised the nettles as that of the "nettles quarters. They talked to each other through the wall until the German army unit handed them their rations and there was about 20 grains to be large loaf, up, where they were kept for three days, on a daily diet of a piece of black bread and a by meat basic coffee

The next step was a fighter base, where they were joined by another member of their crew name garner Jack Griffin There was an outstanding hate and during the five-day they received fairly good food.

The prisoners and with the first signs of the the hostility at Brunswick. Whether they accepted it was when they were being taken to the interrogation centre in Frankfurt. The city had been bombed for several days before and many civilians died as there and tried to find them, but were held off by the guards

At Frankfurt they were taken to fifty individual cells which contained only a wooden bunk and a straw mattress, and had heavy doors and barred windows. The cells were two paces wide by four paces long, recalls Serg. Thrope (sic)

Here he was visited by a civilian supposedly from the American Red Cross. He had bags down in one- pairs, which he claimed he had to have before the prisoner's identity could be satisfied as he was shot.

When first refused to give him any information. He was left in the cell for three days while the food was gradually lessened to an almost unbearably high temperature then turned off altogether leaving him shivering with cold.

When he met the interrogation officer he found a friendly individual who spoke English with a British accent, and tried to pump him. When he was unsuccessful he was furious, and said Sankey would have to be cut for another three-day stint, and spent many of the hours up and down.

The second trip to the interrogation officer was very much the same as the first, and with similar results On the third visit, however, the officer said does he was quite satisfied, that Sgt Sankey was no enemy spy, and that he had to do was tell three others. If he was true and they would take him to a POW camp, where food and conditions were better.

In the cells in there, the officer threatened, they would have to remain there in a very cold condition and there have also. When they still refused to talk, there was a pistol shot outside and the officer shook his head sadly.

"Too bad, he said "There's one that wouldn't tell us anything he was true.

His three into a cage where even this their conditions food and he ordered the guard to take him back to the cell for another week However after about half an hour he was taken to a room, the same, into days later removed for Sankey Griffith at Sagan. He arrived there about a month after 50 officers and men, also the escaping from the camp through a tunnel.

Before telling his story the compound, he was given another thorough search, and the Germans were quite pumped when they discovered a compass hidden in his uniform. They took all his clothes and wore over there, even taking off the heels of the shoes.

Next had a shock when he entered the compound and realised all were prisoners in a happy-go-lucky mood. No one would mistake how poorly he found, said he had been starved by the camp's own security contrivance those blessed, however the atmosphere changed, everyone was friendly and very kind and he was in the building on with the "old-timer and telling them the latest war news.

In the camp, the POWs lived almost as an independent community doing all their own cooking and eating them their own time. Their own menus and what they would serve in the vegetable gardens in the compound. They received more rations from the Germans, such as bread, in their pantries and kitchens.

They read till a room, had stage in double-decker beds. For amusement, they and bought sure for the Red Cross organised sports in licensed in the RSC sports security which they were encouraged

Naturally rations were, as supplied by the Germans, and the possession was forbidden, but with hand-cooker, and were obtained from the parcels by barter or blackmail they always managed to build more into this the Germans were like to find and confiscate.

On 30th in on Jan 26, 945 the whole camp was warned to be ready to leave on foot — as half or more Tar-was operations in Silesia, 60 kilometres.

Fortunately I wasn't over 5 a.m of the one morning that they actually set off, as during the previous weeks almost on which to carry their blankets, kit and personal belongings which became more and more precious as the time to leave approached.

When the sledges were filled, their packers were loaded with provisions, meats, sweets and everything else bright.

Sankey was one of the fortunate few who had a blanket to take but it was useless the first night and he had to sleep without one in it.

The prisoners were on the march for about a week, walking from 8 in the morning to 8 in night when they would be confined by lines or whatever shelter was available, being where and not enough room to marshall Red Cross food, they would open their cans of view and threw her from mast for nonchalance.

Unaccustomed as I was to this way of life and eager to do my part as a temporary member of the crew, I was almost too timid to step when they stepped the fleet right.

A hard, written affair was kept by one of the volunteers describing a Reverentiation during the month, where the rugged hand and a restrained emotion of a common Pioneer dictated that night. The Christmas hours very liberally until had offered discovered and a genius had been taken from his car.

He complained to the group captain and threatened and strongly insistent would be taken if the fleet was not returned, and into the water. An appeal was made for the return, but it was not forthcoming — the work of the master was that it had already been received and came.

Bert Bullet today proudly admits that in this a wing of the senior group.

During last RIA, when they arrived, passed were of anything than the old quarters, his wife his Alfred Inman clearing a form eyes and even tapes of early Inman and reconstruct were kept.

In April Sessions pressed upon when the Germans handed the many over to the whole officer and food from advancing Rhenbrun, who were far three being many heavy to spend last three to even make life any more pleasant for them.

Nevertheless they may have been more fortunate than the unarmed prisoners, who were immediately given a gun and sent into action. With the conviction they were in, most of their near-dead victims would.

Shooting were and more sympathies in rumor spread that the Russians were holding them in hostages, many grew desperate when American warning might, from my father the armies itself, were carried back by the Russians. They began leaving the army in large numbers, making their way through no-man's-land in this American lines.

One day word was passed around that a number of American vessels would be sailing about 10 miles. Here the many and and in many prisoners in possible were in the area and came there.

Here was one of the men who succeeded although he said he had been injured back by Russian soldiers, in the point of a gun. He finally made a when in disabled from the mass division was officer through, here in the house. He worked until my guard who had met his boss was out of sight, then slipped out again and ran for the war vessels.

Shifted about about a week with the U.S. Ninth Army on the Elbe than was flown to Rheims, Belgium where he was billeted in a private home until homecoming leave in England was available.

Before he returned to Canada Bert met a number of other former prisoners were treated in an afternoon are in Buckingham Palace with Their Majesties, King George and Queen Elizabeth.

Bullet wed the postmaster's

BRISTOL September 10 1959

His marriage in his good into his staff star, and the young and back years it a brief dinner before leaving. It was one of several bags before him. Although he had been a banker for a second, his mind dwells on the better business and the magic world he was in at that will moment it from the silver in the bag and carry it over the seas in an inverted portion in a load for every two hours of it home.

The throne of an airplane overhead over his spirit of adventure and wayside was like the presence of a fruit between the world and end of his fighter the days in air and history.

The young soldiers Rennes, cream dress under finally received Mounds, the invasion of the Parliamentand and his was taken generations at some of mail about.

In preparation for Royal Air Force began in service. Bert left leave his surplus. He was to be were later in defend democracy in the epic battle of Britain, and eventually to carry his way to the home of the enemy.

A Lucky Lake Saint, the small back new his opportunity in Paris by and as child some of the his every pieces that had previously resided in money in the mine.

Returning that it was necessary to have a pilot' Inman to become an RAF pilot, he wanted at time joining one and prevented transfer to the overseas officer in Regina, qualified and by late 1927 was taking his advanced training in Scotland.

George Brian Bell had been in Wortham, although his parents were married in Ogema when he was still an infant, had been in Saskatoon and Cupar before making Estate in Lucky Lake. This was in 1927 when Bert left it to quit his post office job to join the Royal Air Force.

After completing his RAF training, George was posted to an instructors training camp at Penhold, South Wales, where one night of his flying time was spent towing targets over late 1940s ok for no-to-or firing practice.

By summer of 1939 International tensions had mounted and when it appeared that Britain and Germany could prevent another world conflict and all known were committed to P.O. Bell's president and the other 13 September

Reserve officers called to duty arrived daily and on Sept. 1 when the German armies crossed his border into Czechoslovakia (George and his wife) were stationed in Bettenville, France near the German border

Air crews flew in France the same day with a battle summary of stationed ground crew men crew reconnaissance men followed the next day on commercial aircraft, while the main party arrived by sea and landed about a week later

SCENE IN FROM COVER SUNDAY

In the early days of the war, duty consisted entirely of reconnaissance flights over the Siegfried Line and it was a long time before George got in touch at close enough range.

The scenery of Bodsworth-in, who had succeeded Owen overseas by the cessation of hostilities in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870 and the First World War, was resigned to another invasion and left at short intervals for the south of France.

George's first close call occurs during the German invasion of France. He and two other aircraft were on a bombing raid, and had just crossed the coast of France when his gunner reported a plane following them, about 10,000 feet above and half a mile behind them.

George ordered the gunner to fire a warning burst if the aircraft came any closer. Seconds later the plane a Messerschmitt 109 identified and one of the three brothers was down in France. A few minutes later they encountered another Me-109. This time George took out the control cables to the elevators on George's side.

Any hope of reaching the target gone George turned back at the lower level, but was before dropping his bombs load in the woods and set somewhere on the Messerschmitt factories.

On another occasion, he planted one of 12 British bombers on a road of an installation in France. They were escorted by two squadrons of Hurricanes, but almost these gave chase to some German bombers the RAF bombers were attacked by six Messerschmitts. Although they succeeded down to ground level in spite of a possible to prevent the Germans from getting better than eight of the 12 bombers were lost in the raid.

George's luck was hit by a volley which left 75 bullet holes in the frame, bullet striking the gunner and George himself. He made his way across water over the the gunner was more disturbed because the gun had been pierced by a bullet. Once he was by the enemy.

In fall of 1941, just before the Battle of Britain, George now holding an rank of flight sergeant was attended to a squadron instructor in Malta. By this time there were only two of the original seventeen on the list. the squadron he had served with.

His departure for Malta is another day George remembers with astonishment — saving in London all night.

They were up late off from Southampton saving the night, and the bombers were passed by the afternoon, so and everything would be in readiness. This done, they went just having lunch when the air raid sirens sounded for about the third time. The locale all round in the shelter, the George and his mates, believing it is in another than usual, remained where they were.

A bomb fell. But, looked out the window and saw 27 enemy planes being escaped by Spitfires. So called in the three followers to stand out and watch the fight, and immediately the window to get a better look. And the first A.A. fire burst and the landing lasmuse the first one started in some down. When the second one followed suit, George climbed and they were of an hundred and made for the air raid shelter.

Fortunately he made it, and was due to leave the following night.

After taking part in the North African campaign, and some duty in Jerusalem, he returned to Pan Sudan in an instructor. He became ill here, and was sent to England and shortly afterwards returned to Canada. By now he had reached the rank of squadron leader.

After instructing in New Brunswick he was transferred to Yarmouth. Nine months then transfer is England in 1944, where he was in station officer between headquarters and foreign groups during the Normandy invasion.

Shortly afterward he was transferred to the RCAF personnel depot. He remained there to demobilized. After the fall of France he remained was commanded and George was transferred to the reconnaissance corps at Aldershot-on-Sea, and later in Colin, Germany where he remained until June 1945. He returned to Canada shortly afterwards.

After Hall's discharge he returned to Lucky Lake and the post office. He has held the post years before. From here they moved to South Durham, and after 10 years came to Weyburn, the city of his birth. He first home purchased here was their last.

He is also the latter with his strange adventures and postmaster, but instead of journeys he advertises. They were living only addresses — postmaster and mail.

Big Hammerkeld

Written by Jacqueline Fitzgerald

It is doubtful whether there has ever been a death in history as shocking to the world, and as discouraging to human hopes, as that of Dag Hammarskjold, Secretary-General of the United Nations.

A few short days after sending a precedent-breaking cable to each dictatorship the first time in any nation's foreign economic space the means where the world the basket of the Scandinavian the fight the power become a enemy for to mean which communism man have entered hopeless crisis to leave.

One can only guess in the latest news but by this great man's life had been. Considerations from the Belgians who were on customers to go it with the savages in the Congolese tragedy. Advice from the Russians who hope there extremely vocal whenever they disagreed the other had not the natural courage to offer encouragement when the end of nations must have been acceptable to them, and even the-supporting, generous little support from the major western powers is a time when they need an unique opportunity to show the sincerity of their support for the United Nations.

The new line

EDITORIAL, November 1 1962

Last week the Sun world hailed President John F Kennedy's quarantine of Cuba as the most positive measure so far that the United States is prepared to take in her against threats to the security of the west. We join with most persons in the western hemisphere in recognising the necessity for the grave decision by the president.

Reclamation of that unprecedented nerve by the U.S however is accompanied by an foreboade that a new dimension exists in international affairs: a relationship between sovereign states that is neither flesh from nor good nor having, when compared with multilateral standards of conduct.

It is a action in which we are drained in live Earlier we said we acted beyond the present-day morality in international affairs. For it is obvious that in the future we can expect, at one every type of act, however reprehensible in in terms justified on the basis of U S action in relation to Cuba.

It tells her clear — Bonne

TRADE UNION November 28 1963

The passage is complete and the time was never a day in the history in the human race when free was so dramatically and drastically brought home to so many people throughout the world as on the three days of > incredible shock, horror sadness disbelief, heartbreak and sorrow eg which began with the assassin in Dallas in noon Friday which cut down President John Fitzgerald Kennedy of the United States and ended at the Arlington cemetery Cemetery near Washington when his body was consigned to the grave in the presence of a hushed crowd and probably the largest number of world leaders ever assembled in one place.

In Moscow as on Dallas, Washington, Ottawa as London in fact in cities, towns, London and finally those everywhere in the world personal tributes and messages were suddenly necessary to be sent from and befallen the globe with the death of the 46-year-old 35th president of the United States

Getting rig

EDITORIAL November 28 1963

Tuesday of last week marked the 100th anniversary of the day when President Abraham Lincoln delivered an impromptu, fo an address which the since became famous in every known person, and which only three days after its enactment, poorly great and small throughout in world had come to prominence.

President John F Kennedy the time recognised by the great of the world, whose eloquence was cannot hope to match or accomplish, the words of the fleeting however are simple and direct and do not require clear interpretation

Most of us may never experience another day in mankind's history such as Friday November 22 1963, but we will continue in our modern dilemma participate in that total agonise the memories of another day in the sad world of man that Abraham Lincoln and John Fitzgerald Kennedy

Dirty and we

EDITORIAL July 2, 1964

There has been editorial comment across the nation in the recents invasion of people prompted by white protests and fanatics, murdered an robbed.

The race which positively triggered this outcry was that of Jay Cooperier, shot dead on New York streets of some 30 people locked on from their windows and killed because or me called for police and the murderer was able to come home and finish the job after he and his friend.

Why we ask do these things happen? Can we not even threaten duty to telephone an loyalty to the principles of law and order? It seems a matter of common decency

The law cannot be enforced or the peace maintained by a handful of policemen These cities not only the working men of ordinary manhood an protect and lend an assistance the rule of law

Legislators and police may have to effect changes, the public imagination provides with an without basic changes.

White backlash

EDITORIAL August 27 1964

"White backlash" is a term which has found its way into the English language and which may have some three passing regretfulness in the history of the 1960s.

It was understand it correctly it is the shrinkers his unaltered success which America's race-need causes for future regression of a race, and for support of economic people and policies which will advance this end. It is a phrase of wishful thank up that does not augur well for the peaceful settlement of racial differences in by United States.

In this decade the American Negro is seeking in wide swings of the post century and politics.

prejudice, partisan and over-timidness are again threatening to banish a sp...

...e treaty constitutional right is accorded the Negro people. It will still be classified before they acheive economic and social equality. All the wishful thinking in the world not items, not violence will change that.

In the meantime serious black and white men must think and accept the right of the Negro to every constitutional guarantee, the unbelievable change where most uncertainty the altering of existing patterns, and the responsibility of the Negro to solve it there there without resorting atrocities there is hope. It will there will be some black extremists most white backlash, and the good-natured people, for another decade.

Sir Winston Churchill

Time interview February 4, 1965

Once again last week, flags trooped the world flew at half-mast the military slow-marched to the final resting place of a fallen warrior people by the thousands old and young, filled by a flag-draped hearse and three elaborate wreaths were from afar as pay their undespects.

Here many astonishing a quarter-century after the close of great story are recorded the deep respect, the love and the loyalty shown Winston Churchill last week?

In countries the with the cause of another great wartime leader called a decade ago "Absent" and died today a Vietnam helicopter overturned today and finally on the day of the death of Joseph Stalin of Russia

Rather, too dead to mix a memorable job of keeping the Russian people together as a day of great cost, but his overall record left a tragic of cruelty indifference and a complete lack of compassion

What, then, a true greatness a Sir Winston Churchill that he still has spent four decades in the limelight?

It is not power for others have wielded greater power it is not wealth for that not many would have it is the ability to influence people in the shaping of history even against all obstacles and to make the country feel great.

He made exile to subordinate spirit a country art, a profound wisdom, a fierce determination a heart that knew compassion and love a tremendous energy in leading belief in forgiveness and dignity of a people and their right to freedom; these things were the greatness of Winston Churchill and will be supported forever upon the hearts of the generations that knew him and came in touch by him

BARRISTER AND SOLICITOR

U-2, Pueblo?

EDITORIAL February 25, 1968

Almost two weeks ago, the world held its breath time came to the precipice of a collision between that and West formed large as a result of actions by the North Koreans of the American communications ship "Pueblo.

Three furious days frustrations, hostile they were on the crucifixion, nevertheless have the advantage of helping us adjust our thoughts For instance the Review and always leaned toward the nuclear deterrent philosophy as opposed to the disarmament theory in the debate over how our money power is most likely to be protected. We still believe this argument like War Man prompts a world power like the United States to speak sufficiently of a shallow offensive the atoms another crisis border on, can ensure help but wonder whether we haven't all been a bit overimpressed.

Another brave lurked was this one some never unfortunate the part played by the security forces in interpersonal affairs. What but the distrust manifest in the how the United States to speak my ship to show in a hostile country that violations of territorial waters could ever be accepted without the of a prompt apology, a try that, as the case turned, the exact location of the vessel? it is a possible to pinpoint the source of radio signals only once we request station a Japan, for example, have been refused to answer to contact with a "Pueblo" in order to verify her position?

Whatever the nature of the position of the "Pueblo" when it was seized, let's not forget (admirably few are forgetting) that the U-2 also was innocent until proven guilty

An Innocent Abroad

EDITORIAL May 29 1968

I am aware of her preoccupations; I would like me to intervene as another old Governor with me the mood of a letter I was overcome a most ignorant supply in the and the force installation. Many are considering this evidences of our readers, several continue during two world wars and that several of concentrate thinking countries is no under consideration within grew their a very severe Interests confronting then I wrote probably their patient.

But a newspaperman largely natural fear seeing something that is new to him without seeing down and writing about it. Those then are largely the impressions of a wide-eyed innocent on his first trip abroad, and I hope the reader will bear this qualification in mind.

One of the things I American about before going overseas was just how the German people felt about the Allied presence in their country. Bearing in mind had we arrived so completely over 20 years ago and have had armed forces in Germany ever since, I would not help but wonder whether the Germans did not start to think of our troops as occupation forces, whatever other legal justifications there might be in that particular case in history.

From what I could gather in putting the question to all our German officials, however, I came away satisfied that not only our Germans loyally consider us the country that did more to help Germany to a settlement against possible eastern aggression and that they are most sublimely Canadian in particular in any good relationship with the Germans.

The foregoing was basic not by a systematic study but by the impact of what it would recognize for our group of Canadian soldiers spending their quiet moments of duty in Germany for home.

Dr. Stephan explained that publicity by the Canadian forces and the Pulitzer newspapers had suffered great setbacks from the day the Canadians captured the French last year. With the French rebellions had been completed either fairly well left, but as there were both sides had to work it. Most frontier since the French had first come, as we expect forces after the war. Thus he implied, there had been always acceptance on the part of both of the new relationship of partnership.

In Germany we have an abstract of attempt can now understand some misunderstandings between publishing and the press, according to an published stated by Dr. Stephan. Shortly after the arrival of the families of Canadian personnel, and the local press has had translated to a report that Canadian wives were careful shoppers and very bargain-conscious. It's worse we would applaud in any other person. In actuality the remarks had been quoted as complained. Some Canadian press said the translation had caused Canadian women of living poor pittance.

Although the local papers addressed our group through an interpreter we found the English could get on by very adequately everywhere. Certainly almost everyone dealing with the public spoke fluent English. I had looked forward to practising my own badly damaged German but found it never came the occasion when I addressed. After listening briefly with puzzled patience stopped and by my English.

Something in our normal shop to explain was just what makes Germany look. Instead of country with a roof area half the size of Saskatchewan inhabited by something like 50 million people.

Considering that large part of Germany was levelled by Allied bombers during World War I, and had to pay out most in reparations to other countries the economy has been clearly marvelous. The German population does not live entirely by Americans and Canadians standards but the people who are demand, certainly. Indeed well fed, their cities and towns looked, done to good repair and thriving; the only signs of the war I saw are which I have seen some bomb damage on the cathedral of Cologne which had not been completely restored.

Another fact, one of Germany's oldest cities, and 90 percent destroyed by air raids, was rationed, building by building, brick by brick, so much to rebuild as it had been. Quite a thing. Even the poles of its electric wiring is historic. In a small square I counted a thousand to date through the narrow main driving streets during their hour. found little consolation in the accompanying.

Other town-born cities, were rebuilt with a more practical eye with wide streets and modern transportation buildings. Very few Anglo-friendly dwellings have been built in the crowded land and we were told that without a German has a few square feet of land for small a garden.

In a few places I saw large gardens with dozens of they stands on them. I learned that many families started their gardens, and seed was a valuable as the provisions.

Germany's dense population results in the road landscapes which are built to handle and storage to accommodate movement of thousands over a wide area.

Driving along the Rhine is at once reminiscent to many of the U.S. Highway within plain sight in the same time. This area from end to end, but in the rolling countryside, you may see not cities in the valley below a little cities on the hill. Here the castles of the Rhine and on the other side and were not more isolated and aimed of use.

There is an important difference in German towns. The two towns does not develop naturally from separate clustered in dense downtown. The transition from the urban area to countryside from the best and there was the village square, local square houses and most dwellings there are owned by a small town that several thousand people like in a village governing no grocery can from McTaggart. The city of Lahr with a population of 20 000, could not have many larger than Yorktown.

Crossing Germany on the Autobahn is an experience. The Autobahn is not a single highway as I had thought, but a network of four-lane, controlled-access and speed highways that interconnect major German cities. There is no speed limit, but the highway is technically road is crossed that the thousands of miles cars travelling at about 80 miles per hour. Some bumper to bumper thousand load on self-destruction. Transport trucks at times formed long trains on the remote lanes. The amount of goods hauled this way must be fantastic.

As we had more of our roads in many and so many ramps and spent a few styles on them, not only the numerous cities in the German economy.

Retail overconsumption is not quite what we are somewhere in or Canada. If our hotel in Seoul was fairly representative of what is normal, Bethlehem Inn Motel with the vacancy lit up couldn't have been rare, and if you're ever overseas, for heaven's sake take your own soap, as there won't be any in your room.

TO CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

Each room had a very durable duvet, which effectively shut out all but very noises. This gives me genuine privacy although it gives you a slight shock when you open the door in the morning and are faced with another human. Breakfast, I suppose, was to be eaten and (mostly) eaten with your hands, as we had neither knives and forks. There was no elevator in our hotel, and I learned quickly to economize on trips up and down several flights of stairs. Room keys were attached to no large a device that there was no danger of forgetting to return them.

Restaurant meals were moderately priced in terms of American money. A steak was about 15 months in short. So U. S. tourists dollar usually was from four or so marks, and most menus included western fare as well as oriental. The menu was complete without wine, at an old friend in the officer's mess, we had a good two wines every dining.

Christmas morning Wednesday was not unexpected even in armed services common and PX stores, where American and German money were standard currencies.

We spent the evening in Strasbourg, France, and I was amazed at how casual the border crossing was. Going west, the French immigration officer didn't even open our passport (although he looked profusely interested about a crew of Canadians entering the country). Returning to Germany to the wee hours of the morning, the German immigrations was simply waved over as we were late enough without having to stop 100 feet or more away.

Can't say much about France on the basis of two or three hours, but there really is a vastness to the countryside.

Most cities in a region are made by factories, or anything a visitor, a few hours is no basis at all. However, on the short hours we were allowed to come to Germany overseas for the first time since the great scene time in England. And I think I can say that many shoppers as crowded by about 25 percent (population 30,000) that Saturday morning and there was a crowd scene and nonetheless about the evening that was never seen before.

I stopped in a small shop for a postcard, and within hardly "Ich bin ein Kanadier" he proprietress directed me to a nearby stationer. Here too they sent no postcards, but after not by for someone in back of the shop, the clerk seemed to walk up four blocks with me to show me where to get the picture cards. A few customers were packaged, and one in front of the post office, which I had been assured, was exactly same wrong from the line of snow of a night on our own small flights. Stopped and looked around me with some discouragement. Immediately a passenger stopped and asked if he might be of some help, or hadn't "been looked after".

Middling more complicated by their non-German than it, they were so short they almost seems to, and there were small clothes pegers. On the other hand, "down on the past" on an elderly lady having her morning tea, evidently on the same street occupied by her mother 20 years ago.

Generally all I can say to be a Canadian: never don't mess go back and see more of the fat smiling and warm-hearted people of our own origins.

My Lai

editorial, December 18 1969

The world, and particularly North America, is shocked.

Led by an outraged young American, a platoon of average young Americans is alleged to have systematically massacred scores of women and children in a tiny hamlet of Viet Nam.

While the army says it is proceeding upon this atrocity committed by the army of a nation which likes to think of itself as the undisputed defender of God and good against the forces of evil, it is doubtful whether Washington, Ankara, Athens or South Americans are so troubled by the facts as they are by the revelation of the fact.

The fact is that, at least in specific places and at specific times, such as in My Lai town or outside the DMZ, war has no rules, and the best people in the country have to decide that they can't fight here because generally the dividing line of a civilized people, and what seems to those of the rest of the world unbelievable.

Americans are agonizing about whether My Lai symbolizes some deep malaise in the American way of life, parse.

We may as well — and should — face some cases of this. My Lai massacre is not, we suppose, that of revolution nor full horror of war as the world has experienced by mid-term of people since time began and for other humanizing rules, we suppose, have been experienced by civilians until we took seriously of striking and collecting other ways of handling international problems.

Pseudo justice

memos at, January 9 1969

Even as fiercer over via the determined bomb-ruination of nations of the three blocs, by the outrageous act of capital against Lebanon? It is difficult to suppose a little as clear of appreciation.

It's a bit like a Nigerian slapping a girl in a dark lane and suddenly going to a crowded of town because and a nursery full of tempo. Not clear at all: the chaos have suffered for the police or something.

Yet, Israel was wrong to downplay those subversive pieces and the discovery the country of every person and every author. For there was a degree of penetration of the whole operation, wasn't there?

20th century-style German guerrilla-combined

a FEATURE March 2 1970

Have the brains gone'd level we say?" A retired general minister see it by gray walls and ceiling of the west system blasted one of the hard work of the Lancaster Herald.

The revenue was at a terminal was for the hours and chemic between the venture and the underground sentences at the NORAD underground defensive in the mountains near North they Got.

The U. S. army supplied arms as four public chemic personnel, but shelters had hired. They don't would nothing you that the tunnel through which you were just travelled at were a mile long, on a level grade, but whether you are 300 or 600 on below ground level is astonishing left to your imagination

No point at an enemy knowing just how large a bench to would couple to wipe out one of the major defense installations on the North American continent, he explains.

Once again we are the destroyer-escort in England's harbor and you and wrestling Intelligence terms "invasion" of Eastern Gerlingen. Whenever you name age I was overwhelmed with the feeling of being in another world, primarily of another decade.

Gerlingen is we may see of the distinct political climate throughout the world which could almost witness certain, from the entire planet into one large and neutral, we nevertheless first of a world which "peace" and "war" are fairly sharply defined and one person could also answer to "peace."

But to the men stationed in the defensive and offensive installations, the war of always on and the battle over tomorrow, the tensions in situations established by a terminal board reflecting across an eight hours between day-to-day insecurity and the ultimate mechanic of weapons' attack, which could be brought about only by a formal declaration of war or an act of aggression which would once and all other pre relations.

At the underground fortress, the battalion mission are watched around the clock, and each airborne alert of a unit, area of Canada and the United States is represented by a light which screens the craft's arrival for the past two seconds. Inside there No of the identification number which could been assigned to the plane, and other nonessential which only the trained eye and ear is, since the image flashes onto the screen only for a fraction of a second and is gone.

If some information of doubtful about any given aircraft, a private line throws a personal attorney of the ship, telegraph, and focused solely up-to-date information on the aircraft's altitude, position, speed direction and at the name of the pilot and to a safe arrival. This data is updated constantly by banks of computers which collect, analyze and transmit to desired information to the nearest a one-of-a-million of a second.

Any aircraft entering the zone unidentified by the North Bay command must be immediately identified. If this cannot be done through normal communications or final flight plans, interceptors are sent out to make visual identification.

The fears considering these unidentified aircraft are enlarge the occasional weekender from intrude they become vexed unidentified terrorist encounters, and then are some threatening as to warrant defensive action, the air battles that are considered procedural

Training for "war" exercises, actual missions attempt to penetrate the region at low altitudes, square mile grid, in order to test the ability of the defenses. Operating from bases in Canada on the United States they may come at any hour of the day or night, in any altitude, as from any direction, trying to evade the Third Region Control still guard.

But from these first penetrations of the Region's zone, the "enemies" are picked up by radar and fighter interceptors are scrambled to identify them.

The "enemy" soldiers is able to get more close to nearby range of targets which are identified by complex electronic air defense screens Rather they are electronically "shot down." Hundreds of missions are by supersonic interceptors or ground-to-air missiles

The NORAD Commander-in-Chief, General command consist of North Bay in a fill as three-quarters and the only one of its kind in NORAD. (NORAD stands for Air Defense Command).

The Lawrence maritime troops the commander of the Third NORAD Region, directs air defenses of the entire northern air approaches.

The Third Region of the largest in area, containing itself the North Pole to the Great Lakes, and from the Yukon to the Atlantic Ocean. Its prime boundaries are missions of all 0 Canadian provinces, the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and part of the state of Alaska.

Shopping in 'No Man's Land'

a FEATURE March 25 1971

Can a person shop anonymously in No-Man's-Land?

I should have been included in survey of the magazine, and therefore that when I learned that the Ladies Parlors, the hotel of which we were to be accommodated in Moscow, was located smack in the Green Line which separates the Turkish and Greek sectors of the capital city. Hard sauce might sign.

My initial astonishing visions of sightseers spies shadowed by tanned and the observers of machine guns, with perhaps a vagrant hand grenade or two alienating through my window and exploding under my bed.

Common sense would suggest that the United Nations command and the Canadian Armed Forces would finally set up a zone of immune recreation to allow patients to be used for target practice by Greek and Turkish Cypriot soldiers. Common sense, however, does not bring rescued cats of patients who have been taunted and fired at sugar and wine is running for the hospital. Instead, as we have noted many times, the main zones are now ones with violence and death in their surrounds.

There is no web absence of rotted flesh and, in the general sector surrounding the hotel patio (now overlooked by the sandbags sometimes wandering the pavements) along the street and North one enters a familiar world of politicians as thoughtlessly as the world could have greater importance than caring for the needs behind that zones of immediate hatred, throughout the city where one felt the heavy grim weight of boredom-free or unemployed. Perhaps or the anxiety boxes that was the performance of the British soldiers.

Civilians lead silent stoic lives because of hanging and killing, going to school and work, playing, and betting along ordered streets in their Volkswagens or household goods of the last can be counted as a proportion of 1957.

But there was yesterday, too, that like nothing was the same before. Whatever else city, population's decline may be used for job opportunity to remove this, the politicians set to shall commit to the the dimensions of both sides. Although both Greece and Turkey have regular troops stationed on the island, the Green Line is guarded by Scotic in the main, while peacegivers increasingly overcome of the authority commanded by their rifles.

It should be pointed out — and both sides are entirely aware of this — that most 564 schoolchildren from completely segregated. Thus a whole generation of Turkish and Greek Cypriots of age who have the rather dubious of school and on the playing field, and have been exposed only to the hatreds, prejudices and fears of their elders on whatever side they happen to be. Since most of the students are quite barely out of school — perhaps 20 or 21 years old — and have become nothing but theoretical unity since they were not 10 years old, you can imagine how strongly they are to the idea of violence. And this condition can only increase worse with each passing year and continued occupation.

Recently among the street from the Ledra Palace a Greek Cypriot society was posted, and almost one that was to train our exercise in. Here, he made it quickly clear, however, like he didn't appreciate this attention, and we weren't about to make our visit for exemption. I have a hunch every one of us got a photo anyway. But no matter.

We had been warned the photos of military installations were forbidden but we used a rude shock when we learned what consisted an installation. We walked along the Green Line examining the two structures, and seeing camouflaged for things, through nothing of consisting for a photo. We were stopped by some by the Canadian major accompanying us, who then set to name the soldier standing forward of this. It was a mistake and that no pictures had been taken.

The park below on through and the Canadian Army, there were the inside exactly where its appearance had changed. But it was explained that maintenance of the status quo, unfortunately and unfortunately is a situation common to the truce. The standing forward or soldier in the sandbags brings a specific complaint to the United Nations which must be investigated and noted, the officials are to remove the sandbag. Each side would like to have and possibly has, pictures of the other side's installations, but neither takes for the other side for the UN to have pictures taken up.

If the morning of a standing seems to be a minor point to hassle over it is a reasonable human response with which to bring tensions to lower pitch. An example was related of a Greek marksman sitting among bags and flanked by himself after a particularly tense encounter before he could notice he was surrounded by many soldiers brandishing weapons — to repeat the Canadian society to patrol and countered the soldiers that they were dealing with a great deal less than more than a mistake was fraternized in check and wanted to be a Greek or Greek ground and of the UN.

Greater as agreement seeming from the 1957 fighting at Kophinou Turkish Cypriots are granted freedom of movement on the island, but of Greeks are denied entry into the Turkish enclave by Turks. Freedom is now supported by a Greek Cypriot — and not once the Turkish sector was held to get into and out. Greek Cypriot cross the lines when it was time a distinguished career from the service.

An Australian officer, undoubtedly other three with headed by Greek Cypriot interests and located in the Greek sector, was ready to get the Kophinou return to 1957 fighting broke out. It has yet to produce a permit for the movement of the farming north the sector for seven years occupied only by United Nations guards charged with preventing further occupation.

Another sore for the U.N. a group of young people are playing ball near the Green Line and an unlikely happens, the ball is kicked foul and onto the Turkish sector. A soldier recovered the ball, relieves the tension it, and soon harsh words and threats are the stage for violence. A U.N. sentry saves the day by asking in the sort of kick-the-crack-in international situations over a ball. He returned the ball, and calm is restored.

Civilian without a doubt, but when men become tensions rationality is a rarer flower or confusion leading up to supply and a need to Canadian boys in Marcus is restless and suspects the hospitality of Marcus some years and seems not to pretty cards of written has the potential of meeting a fresh stunning war.

Immediately neighbours are unusual and so far as possible in the former lived in order to prevent a minority from combining into a top-level crisis. The Canadian private citizen upon a Greek soldier, manhandling a Turkish civilian, or a Turkish soldier manhandling a Greek, and it is his job to straighten the matter out with quiet, reasonable — and even humorous — persuasion. Only if he fails does he call in his sergeant, and officers and generals never.

Major Barry Winfield, a battalion and C.O. of the 4th company regiment pride in how the young Canadians had done in mediating the knife-enemy of hostilities with all their hopes and temperament.

Much of the Canadian success in dealing with these situations did not stem up so new as it appears to most Servicemen is credited to the fact that Cyprus for the British they are the only career soldiers in the United Nations contingent. As the Canadian troops were a professional soldier simply has a different attitude toward an assignment than does if something conscripted of letting the peace as a far-off land.

Certainly we moved no antagonistic sense. Confidence of inspiring the territory was seldom does from the mixture of Greek and Turkish citizens who overlapped friendly words with one gesture, and from our conversations with Turkish and Greek soldiers with whom we were granted some views

We visited Rauf R. Denktash president of the Turkish Communal Chamber (local vice-president of Cyprus under the old constitution) main it would be possible for the Canadian force to go home the quietly notified that if the U.N were pulled out, in that the Canadians would be there to go.

Archbishop Makarios whom we met in the President Hilton also paid a personal call where he kept removed of U.N forces. The archbishop mentioned personal interest in other peacekeeping UN inside areas with him as he said in and in Cyprus the Church and the people are completely in power although he, in the kind of both), in whom his expressed mild surprise at the appearance and found was a problem peacemakers to remember of the Cyprus problem.

Mr. Denktash showed equal skill in delivering his Turkish point of view. Whether the Greeks had given in their wish to die from supposed cowardice in connection the Greek position we called there was simply a Turkish figure to please the force in its single-line defensive-fight.

Accepted though their presence in Cyprus may be, however and dedicated though they may be around them and it was evident that the Canadian hope think of the Cyprus crisis as anything but a fine assignment.

It is interesting that somewhere in this Cyprus mission and part of the world and it involves a six-month separation from their families who cannot be brought in such a posting. The absence of permanent Mediterranean surroundings quickly loses any sense attaining many the hours under a summer sun, falling passed (on a bicycle) along narrow streets carrying produces surprisingly drawn by a donkey with its unfailing deliberation between veggie-happy Greek and Turkish Cypriots.

Even the single men are denied the social welfare institutions to relieve in strange lands. Local amenity improvement and marriage customs are not to be visited with, and in a south Canadians are forbidden to go with Cypriot girls. You may book indiscreet at time one and we were amused that here in a rule and in are Mediterranean. One Canadian soldier in a plight by the arranging interview relations and friends of an Cypriot girl served in a home example most military disciplines.

On top of everything scarcity of communications and other factors make it impossible for officers and men to share the same buildings. While officers remained in keep officers. Naturally there is a tendency they consider and for arrangement leaves much in his shoes from the rank-and-file of some

Then the second PPCLI (Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry) Battalion will be pulling out of Cyprus to be replaced by another Canadian unit, and also a smaller later moved and then another and another — until Cyprus's underlying real issues or Islamic political-ism decide not we cannot afford to Turkish as a military presence in that far-off international focus [sic]

And can we afford to Already we have suffered our commitment to the NATO forces in Europe, and if regroupment for military operations overseas, perhaps the time has come for us to withdraw our 500-man contingent from Cyprus and leave that there to others.

We can always hope, and the solution which more in the end for himself, will be a more rewarding one than a good armed Canadian soldier on him to do the job.

Israeli hams strike again

SPECTATOR April 7 1971

Viewing the misty history of the Son of Galilee or of the little green vinedressing who values must make at a few lessons by international Israelis who would not be dazzled by hassles for a Peace Hebrew manual alternative difficult to read him and how it is necessary to see

Perhaps the pace of the drum are silence, and the and under large-scale fighting and bans continued by special and relatively brief periods but most are to set denying the fact that there the state of Israel was created by the United Nations through partition of Palestine into independent Arab and Israeli states in 1948, and they cannot and have surrounded by hostile had, left-hand consular desk and at the very annihilation

But if the general mood is one of sorrow I could feel all the emotions which were called in a very loud voice but from in a constant flicking, or even from another, our social reproduction to bridge hands has led me to capture Christ in mankind atmosphere.

Before boarding the tiny El Al Convair aircraft at Ellenit International Airport we were frisked by girls-faced security officers with a thoroughness that in all in doubt that message and hijacking are every-day odds for the airline Centers of long luggage were carefully scrutinized, and even our hats were lifted from our heads. The plane was surrounded by guards with guns in the ready prepared in the hands obviously.

Despite a recent incident here happened we find myself relaxed and also the reasons for the severity of security

Historians of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association were stroked by the Canadian Security Forces in visit the Canadian hamilton serving with United Nations police keeping forces in Cyprus in late February and early March. Since CAP flights out of Cyprus south is state-weekly schedule; arrangements were made for a four-day trip to Israel in groups of their security apprehension. When our flights out of Cyprus was delayed for 24 hours, there was no way in en-hance our itinerary by be holiday; they are at our hands visit. Thus we had three days two and one-half days would make be more accurate. Half a whole week hour of a various which, however could may be has historical and modern significance; where available in the base and even thorough examination.

I would have was the reader also that also he was possible your rules the base arrangements made in the story of Arab-Israeli difference, and as all stories of human consideration that we

For example we were shown Mount Scopus Hebrew University in Jerusalem, and the ancient cemeteries Arab registration was pointed to with pride; the other hand, he has found I was a system in Canadian doctor who and system considerable time to the economy of an Arab-Christian family in Nazareth, and the person he had been a guest in one of our general relations in mental anything the visitors acknowledged of Arabs in the territory. According to his answer Arabs satisfied that since they are not subject to military service, they should not expect to attend the Hebrew university To in Arab immediate from military service was explained in answering from Israeli information in regular Arab-in-Tight Arab

Those were arguments for whom we value our guests who was uncertainty for the religious-secure which in practical things spend near Arabs in what was famously Jerusalem territory Even the Israel glimpses we got were staggeringly familiar living as few thirty square feet home conditions which should only be described as unknown under any circumstances and unrecognizable a the manner based in his world here

On the other hand it would be incorrect to re blame Israel for not consenting to meet about years since the 2 o-Day War Israel fostering compacts in which the Arabic have been content to serve Palestinian refugees displaced through creation of the state of Israel in imagined between decades.

Nevertheless of the Israeli presentation was one-sided much of the evidence stressed, opened re-fortunes.

An Arab village in the now-occupied West Bank for example, is a drab and dirty conglomerate compared with an Arab section of any Hebrew city or Arab in Israel proper. While not as prosperous as their fellow neighbors who see the gains the latter economic-ically most prosperous and is ready by far than the area in former Arab lands.

The difference is the Israeli countryside and that of the West Bank is in the story most differently from a history of propaganda of the records where the best authorized from Israel authorities and the their Arab economies through Israeli immigration and initiatives

The trade grown fields and forests of Israel prospect a natural endowment, the in reality all ground in-ital. Israel and they are more developed countries in-portant upon irrigation. This fact it Nevertheless Israel and the poorer economy we saw from Israel land and the eye it was only with a barren desert. In fact, were it and for in beginnings of Israeli agriculture already beginning in land our wasted deserts only the Arab administration would come and over into they appear in have neglected and perhaps about the Israeli. Thus chief value in the Arabs would much more to be a basis for the eyes of themselves which could border transmissible have reasons as a very way of life

If anyone doubts the very and disagree it which made border communities were stopped their land only visible the there. Hebrew post-tense of the soldiers up of the Sea of Galilee.

Subject in breakdowns or unsafe by Arabs in any area. Hebrew soldiers were obliged to stop with their children in underground shelters every night before the Six Day War. During a passenger carriage the age of 12 before ever speaking a night in the terms of his parents

The absolute and inter-ostracized by animals, and youngsters were segregated by age groups. Each home on the Hebrew also has access to shelter

With as well a population, and an enhanced threat continuance, Israel normally the compulsory military service, from for girls. At once the army when they reach the age of 18, serve the required time (which it differs for women than for men and serve as length with general security installations), then continue in who periodic training after discharge.

Whatever legal and historic rights the Arabs may have to the lands taken from them in the Six-Day War, it is difficult not to be sympathetic to Israel's determination to keep on the captured lands (and whatever booties) until the Israeli state is recognized by the Arabs.

As a matter of fact, in the light of the Arab-sponsored war preferences and data it would be recognizable the Israeli state. It is difficult to recognize a negotiated border more secure than the 20-mile security without by the 967 cease-fire lines.

In the north, Syrians used to fire with impunity on Israeli settlements lying in the foot of the Golan Heights, a huge plateau lying abruptly and topography open to Israeli territory below. Knowing the Syrians the lofty gun positions, and impossible and the lifting were considered inappropriate against Israel. In the Six-Day War Israeli tanks threw themselves up against these formidably tanks gained control of the heights and pushed the Syrians well back from their communities. All the way east of the Jordan River were destroyed and the loss of life was considerable. In compared with Israel losses thereafter. Also the Israeli army had been well-armed by every big enemy.

In the West Bank regions of Jerusalem and Samaria ensued many miles of well-armed frontier subject to constant attacks by Arab militant. The city of Jerusalem itself was divided, with a considerable portion of it, including the old city, in Jordanian hands. Again, a city divided by barbed wire hinder and barrier to progress in relations to negotiations.

The Israelis pushed the Jordanians back to the Jordan River and the Dead Sea, creating a much shorter and more easily defended border.

In the Egyptian front the Gaza Strip and a long frontier ranging down to the Gulf of Aqaba again created miles of mountain frontier subject to constant attack. Here, Israeli occupation of the Sinai and the Straits Peninsula eliminated the three borderline, and put a comfortably more favorable frontier in the hands of the Israel found with the added advantage of the vast Negev Desert serving as a buffer between Egypt and Israel.

Israel settlements and agricultural developments in the occupied lands particularly the West Bank, must in large part accommodate the Israeli and Arab immigrants entirely missing those lands by Arab control. In present war can they absorb 600 Israelis from this invaded and the West Bank, and that the Israeli government has created Arabs for my own part, however I would not place my money on Israel's relinquishment of those lands in the foreseeable future. And I suppose I had a difficult problem there.

Israel knew reservations about how happily Arabs' lived a better life judging by appointments they were neither to find new rooms the Israelis, giving evidence to the theory that opposition to the state of Israel was a purely political origin and that there is no real groundswell of antagonism against the Jews among the Israelis but rest, was, I learned, to the hopeless toward the Arab-people themselves, could have brought out that a number of antagonisms to view of two centuries of harassment by Arabs, but it is best there is no real hatred.

Even in Jerusalem a divided city until we recently Jews, Moslems and Christians now move freely anywhere without fear of being molested. A government official who spoke to me in a lunchroom in Jerusalem made the point that there were still fairly many foreign consulates in our night anywhere in the city where in the old Jordanian. In fact he was quite amused at my bag to write a genial look of the hotel in Chocolate magazines, that for his last few years there had been no tourists and activity in Jerusalem was in Moscow.

Reopening of Jerusalem, and meeting of Jew to be an importance for service of Christian Jewish in Moslem faith. Perched on top of the modern Hills, in the Jewish Quarter, Turkish, Byzantine Roman and Russian architecture and no probably missed a more ordinary hotel in the Jerusalem Hilton. Here was city luxury noticeably traffic and room signs material one can be really thought of as one of the 20th century.

But in the old walled city where you must walk on foot through narrow alleys, the blended fragrance of thousands of strange spices (and a few aromas are no longer), where Arab women and sometimes those unmistakable men in tall flat-topped white headdress and modern Jew mean to pray in the sacred Western Wall of Solomon's ancient temple (remodelled by the Jews in the after opposite the Temple burned) where donkeys will carry the freight where tourists will buy mementoes from children that often are rich more than profited, here seems to have stepped into bygone ages.

Paradoxically here in these few acres crammed through three main sects with many of the world's greatest religions, you are warned to keep your with your money.

"You're a Arab territory warns the guide. "You're woman not in key compound, but if you do, you can't find half the money you have. Above all, don't buy on any of my Arab friends' but probably make you rich. And beware of pickpockets and vandals.

It is of most astonishing that needless to a sense of relief upon stepping through the Jaffa Gate into what by those moments like the modern world by comparison.

It may be useful to attest in but I do strongly interested by the ceramic shops which mark the hallowed grounds of each religion such as Golgotha that Gethsemane it may be logical for the admission of millions over 20 centuries to mass that itself is another old mysterious, but I can doesn't identify with a particular type of Jesus of Nazareth.

The Arab-Yafa friend's bargain city is also a trip of overlooks, but one of all is the more severe in Jerusalem. The Arab city Jaffa, in one of the tourist's oldest prospects with Tel Aviv and its beginning as a suburb of it in 1909 (six years after Weizmann was incorporated as a town).

The many cities it sights in as descendants in Jaffa adhere serious about 10 hours with ancient days the countries. In the morning you enjoy an orchestra in outdoor cafe on Tel Aviv's wide, tree-lined avenues, while your eye takes in recently demolish skyscrapers going on this out of glimmering modern design against a backdrop of sweet high-rise monuments.

The spectacular buildings, mostly postal museum, this many under construction are noted in exceptionally constructed, with the individual apartment privately owned.

The emotion of co-operation — as of fiscal — would be consistent with a world about the individual — the opposite settlements, where groups live communally much like the Israelites in western Canada.

We spent our first night in Israel on one of the cities the more communal kibbutzim — Mova Yam — lying right on the Mediterranean coast in Haifa. This kibbutz was primarily a camping settlement, year-round facilities but provided by other farms and kibbutzim with a number of providing accommodations like this in the whole country.

Here we were of guest about tourist prompted into the study Hebrew lessons lunch, my friend most of the tourist owners by dividers from Tel Aviv sampling the attractive land in the city life by the many visitors from abroad and not allowed by curiosity or sentiment.

We shared the evening meal with the downstairs here in the courtyard dining room filled of families with meals. Given here cooking facilities in their own quarters for by the week. Although there are many religious kibbutz, tribal religious necessary practiced the meal.

All property is communally owned by the diverse members, and until a few years ago an exit was paid into or those on their needs were provided. As in generosity however they now receive $ 3,000 cash to spend in their visit. Several times are provided for pleasure journeys, and the younger ones make a group across before married year.

Mova Yam was founded by Polish Jews in 1939, this it was explained that the descendants are not in ideology the through by sheer necessity of most preferred people trying to develop their landscape among hostile Arab neighbors.

A common misconception is that all men in Israel live on kibbutzim. Nothing could be further from the truth. Kibbutzim like these in four percent of the country's them, conform members live on about 250 kibbutzim the citizen in co-operative farms privately farmed family-owned farms from the government and employed in private and co-operative industry.

The industry, too, is progressing to best seven of the "pinch of prosperity" in young people are sent off on generously many set for professions as trades, that the are being from back. Whatever the attraction in the people, materialized, conveyed life for those who remember the by where they had nothing and were grateful for the economic they could escape together children, co-operative offers, a life in which, in addition, to young people who have grown up to integrated employment.

We talked one in the elected officers about the prospects in the kibbutz in 5 or 10 years but struggled temporarily the replied "I know that answer in my mind will be wishing time I live to prophet.

But then, think upon those much hunger will only over the Israeli kibbutz, the over many institutions is one world, standing in hungry humanity near this whole nation where from the heights overlooking the sea in Galilee your eyes take by many of the places remembered in the Old Testament, then where this daughter new free again renewed the flow of rich and history of the Promised Land, and set prepared to defend it to themselves.

How they will here only history will reveal the to see what they have accomplished in so wide time and.

The space program
across 44 August 7, 1971

Although it seems. He only yesterday when we all sat glued to one television then to see the first manned moon-walk of the century. In most ways it seems like it but more than the years and have actually changed almost this historic event.

So sophisticated have we become in these decades that we took the feat as the natural consequence such as the blast-off the moon orbit, then the lift-off, then the return into the splash-down, and of in that other things as to have fallen every expectation in the case of the moon.

It is hard to comprehend, considering how many unpredicted intervene considered space travel — just like how dramatic age the events that have been short since this gargantuan-like Russian Sputnik opened in the world that first time the space age had indeed arrived.

Even that event was rocks from an object in and an object into their orbit. It seemed like a long way from having to the moon that but in only large enough to carry a crew all the together the engineered needed for an absence of two weeks or so that just even a vehicle in which to travel over the moon's rugged terrain.

Yet we have come it all happen in little more than a decade, and the many obstacles have been in seconds into the impossible was possible.

Today opposing schools in Bangkok can do battle on the question of "Can it be done?" But rather "How much is enough?" and what is it worth?

For my own part I am a fascinated, while the space program that I would be happy to see it move along faster than it is now, I am also leery of the price tag.

The third-world economic miracle seems to grab million-dollar-per-ton cost figures easily, but the critical figure that interests me is the cost of communications and satellites before it can convert to long-term, self-sustaining projects.

who knows but that if the governments of our world powers abandoned the problems of aggressive property relations and politicism with the atom that and the billions now lavished into the space programs, that one might lead to establishing that self-sustaining, ecosystem.

Swords and plowshares

MICHIGAN, April 6 1973

And he shall judge among the nations and shall rebuke many peoples that they shall beat their swords into plowshares, that their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war anymore. — Isaiah 2:4

"Yes, that as a symbol is now located in the basement. Very active antiwar movement existed in my office. And two contributors came instead of to speak." — Condition Arrested Program monthly advertisement March, 1972.

Most of us have not yet learned to read this world around us in the order where we are ready to give up our armed forces. And certainly, anyone who is familiar with what the Canadian Armed Forces have contributed to Cyprus the Congo and Suez will agree that the military can help progress the arena that that military experience can lend drive under conditions calm.

We hope the CAF are successful in commanding enough going men in the right offices that can happen to help our nation remain free and to enable our country to participate in peace-keeping arenas soon.

We are happy our farmers don't all become as disgusted with the profit they stay from home to be younger thought is may be — that they lead their communities into rancor that their proselytizers echo spears, but march off to work for peace instead. Because if they do, we'll have more mighty hungry soldier boys.

Re-refined

EDMONTON, August 17 1972

Our heart bleeds for the five American legislators who collected $3 million recently from an American airline, were dropped off in Algeria, and last their fees impounded by the Algerian government.

According to a press report, they have called the Algerian government in "to ask back the $ millions that we will go international aide

The fast-obviously last out-concerned to those that if criminal extortion gives them title to their money in the money. the Algerians too have a right to ask their own criminal for ownership, such as Palestinian for $3 million per five hijackers!

Our heart bleeds only for that if you play fiscals with the Countries you are playing for keeps, but it is that easy to discover your money back. Banks' Raiders have no jurisdiction beyond the town Counter

The Arab atrocities

EDMONTON, September 21 1972

The grisly events of Munich, following this equally horrible tragedy at Tel Aviv's Lod International Airport, both happened by the same Arab terrorist, cause revulsion with wonder that human minds could conceive, let alone carry out so diabolical.

But perhaps not enough of us pause to think about the circumstances which have produced these people.

When World War I ended and the full horror of the Nazi "Solution" to the Jewish problem became known, only a few were aware in their shock of guilt in accepting the image for the holocaust, secretly fulfill at long last the ancient Jewish dream of a homeland in their own in the land where Jesus lived long before.

But when someone moves into a very overpopulated land, someone has to move out — a fact we remember only or overlook as we look around and with open spaces and find there to move for all to date we like.

Palestine was not empty when it was handed over to the Jews, because the people of many Arabs and the only home they had known for centuries.

Arab countries are among the poorest in the world, and when you take Russia's name in ignorance, established that uneducated people the public knowledge from which they were able to do a here's many, and denied them into an equally overcrowding environments, but without even their pride of ground and their home, what happens?

The case in the Palestrin has hundreds of thousands in them, have ever languished in refugee camps in the Arab lands, under conditions as wretched and unsanitary that they would military suffer by comparisons with the conditions under which a western human human has known. They are fed their victual from a perhaps dole of out by the United Nations and perhaps some contributions from the Arab governments.

Here are the conditions which have bred the terrorists which we have viewed with horror against hopelessness poverty that above all the frustration that is solving one problem, the world smugly and conventionally turned to yet another problem at hand thereby created.

SCENES FROM OUR TWENTIES

In our zeal to purge ourselves of our own anti-Semitic past we applied blame, but against the people of them at whose expense lasted the Holocaust. The nation of Arab governments, based on nationalism, political religion, used to steal the issues which plan to hide, put to the Middle East's population conditions.

Nobody can condone the slaughter of innocent people, but we are likely to see more horrors of the Munich Tel Aviv variety unless concrete action is generated to remedy the problems of and remaining some degree to the Palestinian refugee.

Israeli goal

TEL AVIV, March 1 1973

The Israeli air force Israeli warplane commando had swept with its drop-visions by Israeli fighter planes, of a Libyan 727 airliner carrying over 100 people, seven of whom were killed in the secession incidence.

According to news reports, the airliner on a flight from Tripoli to Cairo, crossed the airspace in Israel southern Israeli itself over Israel-held territory and instead of obeying Israeli signals to land, tried to make it back to Egypt — and was shot down.

To Israel's credit, its government is actively investigating charges of error on the part of the Israeli and has offered to pay compensation in the incident of those who died in this event.

What is more urgently needed is an accord that will prevent more reckless bloodshed which could mean has reckless to the Middle East. But before even to talk to agreement, and as the Cairo bombs show no truce will begin to talk about anything, except on Arabs' terms.

Watergate

EDITORIAL, May 11, 1973

The British result of the inquiry are having more damage, brought to light by the Watergate hearings questions are matters of deceit, perjury, rule-enforcement and more are kept up on the basis of contention that the integrity of the president of the United States is being questioned.

The scandal in more keep by new given back to the perjury and "bugging" of the Democratic party headquarters in Washington during last fall's presidential election campaign, compounded later by the to cover up the fact that some of the utmost secret and confidants of President Richard Nixon were either actively involved or had prior knowledge of actions which will long cross both the American political system and the nation's administration of justice.

The result is learned, more than whatever power is at stake. Here we even prepared to go to any length, to interfere every example, and to manipulate every right of others in order to attain their goal.

It is worthy of note that it was the digging and possibly of the free press as much as anything, which helped expose the Watergate affair for the renewed scandal it is.

While it first came to light, months and the Democratic Watergate as a political spoil-up initiated by minor figures — reprehensible but can all that unusual, and not unique to politics as the integrity of a party's and a nation's leadership.

Deliberate and investigations by the press, as the face of the White House's disinclination, helped blow the lid to an affair whose final facts are still and political time that is to wipe out this tarnished.

Caught up?

EDITORIAL, February 21 1974

When the energy crisis hit the United States a few months ago, a misconception in an American style a misguided bloody United that would squeeze painfully and unnecessarily hard by U.S. domestic industries and consumers and lobbying forced by whatever oil the needed. Many ideas have to make sure were not even considered.

Last week we were warned by Jonathan Swanson Strong, executive director of the United Nations environment program, that Canada's conservation might in household resources could as the Athabasca oil sands might have its challenged unnecessarily "even by the energy crisis psychosis."

"Canada," said Mr. Strong, "must regard itself not as the advantage owner and guardian of these advantages but as the large source of many treaties. It does not and must Canadians should be denied the benefits of these resources, but they must be prepared to share them. Just as "Canada first" cannot mean "Canada only."

A few days later, with millions of the world's people starving, the United States was making natural resources by requiring whatsoever it to follow Neil Boles, Clare Rooms, Affairs and South Africa decided to help themselves to whatever it bounty world anyone it authority to the United States first said, "To, this is just."

When Germany sworn of her colonial empire by the Treaty of Versailles, reached out for "lebensraum" [room to live], was she upheld by anyone except her own baldness with similar aspirations?

When the agencies talked and those more big millions mingling on islands with hardly any natural resources, did anyone say, "These things did the Swedish things, they considered the work"?

The Review holds that [illegible] to get the oil to use for "Canada (or Saskatchewan) only" and that is wealth in economically thin politically feathery to use a temporary advantage as a club, then a gaze against the globe to be sold, even by a Canadian that we had best mangle up, or else submit easy conquest to the meaningless wealth in our holy themselves.

RESERVED FOR HAPPY TESTIMONY

A brave decision

EDITORIAL September 23, 1974

U S President Gerald Ford, who in the session delivering the resignation of President Richard Nixon has been the far-found key of all purchased decisions plunged himself into deep controversy that weakened by issuing an absolute pardon for all wrongdoings that the former president may have committed while in office.

Whether President Ford, absorbed in unusually slight in wrong — and that can this will for overwhelmingly argued both ways in the weeks ahead that even years ago — from a brave thing to do at this present time.

It would have been easy for Mr Ford to have neither acted from the political predicament and the way that This would have stalled former minister of investigation a lengthy trial that finally in the arrest of conviction, appeals that could take years. Between years hence with no whole Watergate affair a matter of history. But that otherwise to pardon Nixon at that time. Ford, a Democrat or member Republican would have strong partisans weak him in position a crisis now compelled through reasons and misinterpretations of power granted him in a position to which he had been elected by the people of the United States.

Long live Watergate

EDITORIAL September 30, 1974

When Gerald Ford was being considered for the vice-presidency of the United States although the lengthy was never under no close qualities factor was expressed in some quarters as to whether he would measure up to the duties of president, which might eventually be thrust upon him

In the first few weeks of the presidency and particularly as a result of the humble and considerate tone of his acceptance speech to Congress, the answering to there was such a flood of relief throughout the United States, that such unanimous acceptance of the new president a moment that this nation was entering a political rut that was no more in the can.

It appears now that it may have been too good to be true, and that the original doubters had more point in their mind. "Normalcy" returns whether with the hit on Mr Ford's shocking pardon of ex-President Richard Nixon was hardly dry the word "trust" was used to describe Mr Ford. Indeed, a word later the word "foolhardy" seems more appropriate.

What the pardon have blessed with full approval of Congressional leaders of both parties and perhaps that of the former judiciary committee, Impeachment unless would still have required courage. Just without the attitude of even the closest aides, that concern at the wisdom of Congress leaders the public withheld, at least a native notion that the presidency would maintain its every position in worst sabotage of the very system which operated in that period itself within at the moment of the resignation.

Besides leaving a moral vacuum in the deliberation of the many other Watergate deeds of charges against former White aides, there is within a constitutional question in the personal contemplate in pardons only specific and private officers, or is a blanket which would embrace possibly a universe of unknown magnitude, else legal?

Watergate is dead. long live Watergate

America's best interests

EDITORIAL September 26, 1974

If you happen to be in American citizens, it may of concerning that your economic are being protected by your government in the event of interfering in the internal affairs of another nation.

For oppose one, it is slightly shifting to how the president of the United States acted — as President Ford did in the arms conference last week that aided Although Marxist government a in power in Chile the United States need "to help and assist the government in its efforts to consolidate its democratic institutions to preserve opposition political freedom.

We share Mr Ford's concerns for a free press that the press can be free only if it is sure freedom of thought a society's recognition of a right and the need for it. When opposition newspapers that media are imposed by pressures from the state the nation they cannot be considered free, but rather bound in their opposition. Enough than independence in those who make their or express possible.

Perhaps illegal — but

EDITORIAL July 5 1976

Most of the world rejected last week when most unconscionable, in or act of aggression, unprovoked and almost equally unprecedented value and regulations, annexed a building in Uganda a Britishe support to release over 50 people held hostage there for over a week by terrorists who had hijacked an Air France airliner.

To accomplish such a feat in a remote part of the world, on strange ground, and with the loss of so many hostages as the planning that the timing of the hold centers was just short of miraculous, and the outcome was one that would have greeted with disapproval if aimed in a novel

It is unlikely that even Israel will attempt to deny that a violation of international law did indeed occur. For however known that some activities in boundary zones legislating feel free to break all laws, and know that there are countries in which they can find sanctuary after committing their misdeeds.

The fable of Ishkine New York

SATURDAY, October 30, 1975

"Once upon a time there was a country who subscribed to a new fashion started by the proto-gynecologists and related by-self practitioners.

Being a third-world state, this fable decided he should share the wealth compared by the family and encourage the new poverty of mind, by party planning only. Naturally, he word of his generosity got around, more and more people made their wealth known to him.

Never having limited anything "wrong" and not wishing to offend anyone, he found it difficult to define certain borderline words and words, and so where to draw the borderline was on the side of generosity.

Being a poor man himself he didn't worry about what he was giving the power for the gifts he was bestowing on everyone, nor was he concerned with the fact that he was spending more money than his farmers were making. Any day his capital was dwindling.

Being a lazy man he still wanted to live his customary lifestyle and do leisurely work as possible.

Being a ruthless man he continued to write elegant verse and music long after it was comfortable, thus encouraging his people to be taught creative skills in liberty and in a generous proportion.

Being a fateful man he was regarded when no one would heed him his very rotten society either by was unable or would be most pugnacious.

That I need the country to day all those wonderful things? Why, I don't know. Don't suppose I'm going to help me?"

This is the story of New York City, which me and bankruptcy by only a few hours this either day and which been defied again before many moments are to many be ruinous to my. Never New York City right. But I cannot find it also something like this to prove to governments at all levels that you simply cannot forever spend more than you earn.

The yellow ribbon

SATURDAY, January 25, 1981

We are the yellow ribbon

Not in abundance, and not necessarily blending, here and there. But they were there, and by the hundreds of thousands, to say and to send the message.

We were remaining through the international area just west of Yosemite National Park in California that Wednesday morning, and had got there having to go the radio, as when my wife opened the door yellow ribbon hanging from a branch, we exchanged surprised that despite last-minute problems and the possibility of eleventh-hour delay, the 52 American hostages had finally reached freedom.

I couldn't help pondering on the fact that by coincidence we were in it on the day the hostages were free taken. We were attending a meeting in New Orleans in early November 1979, when there were hostilities in the newspaper headlines the incident, when it was to precedent governments, people and the media for the next 444 months, being overcome with emotion and relief. Coincidentally (admittedly in the simplest of how) to the ceremony and wandering free, and still my emotion the same sense of diplomatic relief to hostages but many western and sovereign nations.

I couldn't help thinking how different the 444 days had been for the 52 hostages than they had been for us.

Had it not been for the constant subduing of the country, I would have myself difficult to believe that even a year had really passed since the U.S. embassy in Tehran was overrun and the 52 diplomats, couriers and their staff were holding by a gang of militant students, freedoms of Ayatollah Khomeini.

The second my friends' the 444 days had been filled with many exciting things, most of them good, and all of them diverse.

For the hostages, confined against all embarrassment laws, imprisoned, threatened with trial, interrogated, humiliated and frequently mentally and, and they must have viewed like a year each week like an eternity.

Nor allowed to communicate in any meaningful manner with their families, treated worse than the lowest prisoners, they must have wondered after a while if they were ever going to be released. Even the meanest human regime it would not have been surprising to see them pressured hard for espionage, shot or summoned for so long that, even families friends and the U.S. government would have to give up on bringing them home.

Most of all they must had the world in learning that the treatment in Iran Iranians was not merely as "human" as happens in other ways would have had us believe.

Because of its very absolute, perhaps its even in its perspective and fear, perhaps the Iran have use of barbarous brutality and cruelty. It is possible that in a country where armed insurgent gaols are killed by those who, besides the captors, may be considered as their only is the view of westerners the occidental look behind some of the arbitrary confinement or regarded as brutality.

The kind that all 52 hostages endured alive and in relatively good health upon returning.

Reconstructing China?

TIMES REVIEW, January 21 1981

Not long ago, a Canadian journalist returned from a visit to China with the remarkable news that until most Communist country has so much as mooted the final such institution wonderful: in Beijing there, finally, is no boy and because so perfect as to have done away with the need for courts.

the Chinese have shown and when it is time public to put it to a book test, to see the greatest boast in the wisdom of the ruler Chairman more? So long, there is no problems as finding the facilities and technical framework to examine a court.

Are there any private ?

If there are indeed, problem and there not in country, it become evidence and people are informal, nonexistent and uninformed of what due process

Surely, only citizens such a simple-minded few regard courts as the agency in prosecutions. Whatever opinion that they may be, they are all and minds between an end, prison bars

It did the job

TIMES REVIEW, June 17 1981

Most of the workers would last, in the guts agonized the during and courage of Lastri in recovering the integrity as a woman.

There were shocked pages however among her chance allies earlier and armed when in that ensured that friends reunited had boarded and destroyed a another tractor nearby complicate in nearby long amount according to Israel, it was the initiative of long or killed another bombs with which an armed area!

It is a very the formal police might be more panel in the so-called-so-called bilaterally as the high seas by the Armenians during the Cuban missile crisis and the Kennedy administration. It was the justifiable under international law but it did the job.

Within the context of the world as we have at now by the formal police as it is for a so-do that the job.

Nobody wants war

TIMES REVIEW, May 19 1982

Our language: an probably not exact fingerprints, to explain with reasons that cover every type in human situation, and from every corner child ground to view

I don't know why the expression is for "Nobody wants war" but their right to be said, probably as sure. Cadwaay believes exists in three nations that and in people want war. If and wars not so, it would still be no easy to put wars started.

The bloodletting in the Falklands in recent weeks, between nations thousands of miles apart, the unreality-around to the and and there are people on both sides of the dispute to whom bloodshed as more acceptable than many other alternatives.

Who wants wars?

Sometimes politicians do. If the country needs a common enemy to divert public concern from internal, social economic or political problems. Many insisted this is why Argentina decided to counsel upon a military whatever it is a idea of over a winning to accomplish over the Falkland Islands.

There even lurks a suspicion in some minds that for Margaret's government in Great Britain, facing threesome crisis, an overseas victory abroad a issue of genuine and has utilized people behind the government on the settling of the Second World War 2.

There are also people who make fortunes out of wars. Weapons and carriers armaments are produced suppliers, food and many other materials. Small wars are also an leading grower for conventional weapons

Where there are countries for countries, happy to sacrifice, to kill and at risk their lives for any cause, so long as the price is right.

Wholesale?

For my part, I'm always aware make a bit impatience of the higher echelons of the and happy in any country.

They get on wrong to out against the armed forces and cross myself among those who believe the west would a strong defence.

But the feeling persists and when you make people face a make make there comes a time to take to hand some of them and feeling to put their trust in and them in to war in particular.

I've visited a number of Canadian armed forces bases, both in Canada and in Europe and many fine officers, men of whom are their roles in defence.

And for some of them, indeed, the enemy and been identified but the war did not developed, and if they had the say-so they would push the armed in a limited practice rather than on political or defensive grounds.

In the Falklands disaster, my sympathies lie with the British

But he's though cool and sustained and there are all sorts of people who would welcome a small war. And small wars are modern and would start all too easily.

Another aggression act

EDITORIAL, September 7 1983

Last week a Reuters warned against letting down our defences when dealing with it world partner — the Soviet Union. we personal and international relations, pressures to a release we the grounds and our might have annual military secret from for father a father and and and since the maritime missile rail.

As the Review was looking off the press, a South

Korean Boeing 747 aeroliner without warning a repeated 200 people was flying from Anchorage, Alaska, to Tokyo, on a course intended to bypass Soviet territory lying between Alaska and Japan.

Whatever the reason, the aircraft deviated from the course, was detected by Soviet radar, followed by Soviet fighter aircraft, and according to the Soviet response must be destroyed by a missile

All crimes provided.

To a shocked world Soviet authorities reply that "aircraft intrusions must be taken from their doors," that warning shots were fired when the 747 pilot failed to respond to repeated radio signals, that the aircraft was a CIA spy mission

This is the action of the people of the Kremlin who created the mighty USSR and whose augmentous parties and positions keep it so enormously on the brink of a nuclear holocaust.

They are the illogical men the king of 200 lives. They can, in one mistake, deny responsibility for the destruction of the aircraft and possibly the destruction for mystery.

The human course mistakes

Monday, September 24, 1983

Almost a week after the fact, the Soviet Union got around to admitting that its fighter planes had, indeed, destroyed the Soviet Korean Airlines aircraft and, regardless of the Soviet air space on Sept. 1, sending it into the sea with 269 people aboard.

The awkward responses in the meantime was (as latin or Canadian authorities) that explained we go shoot without having been told down.

The second stage of the admission had Soviet intelligence officers come up with a warning to the airliner. It was left somewhat to the imagination whether the warning had been delivered by drop down the plane or by a telephone, coincidentally, by accident.

Finally, over the Western Pacific, the South Korean aircraft had been destroyed by Soviet fighters, but so far no one on ground level has a very clear understanding. Soviets if they have intelligence in the area, training flown missiles in the environment and that it had flown after by side with a United States spy plane for 90 minutes totally before entering Soviet air space.

The explanation inadvertently was offered after the Korean plane was confirmed, with transcripts drawn by the impressed of radio conversation between a Japanese intercepts pilot and his base concerned. Without that, one wonders whether an admission of responsibility might never have been made.

It is no secret has Soviet aircraft — and civilian liners has military planes. Many governments Canada are aware dozens of times every year. They are intercepted by NATO planes and escorted back to international space, but not shot down.

The Soviet claim the South Korean pilot refused to comply with instructions to land at a Soviet field.

Different claim by crew or listener.

But if so, ultimately, for Soviet intelligence. To the rest of the world, it is just so much spoiled buns.int.

The Grenada invasion

Tuesday, November 8, 1983

In one meaningful final scene of the disaster affair of the United States — including Canada and the United Kingdom — have been less than enthusiastic about the American projection of the tiny island republic of Grenada in order to reverse a bloody coup d'etat by Red-inclined.

Having acknowledged, however that the United States had no clear right in terms of international law, to go into Grenada, let's take a look at the matter from a practical point of view.

The incident such as Grenada and a number of others in the past few years, is at the extreme end of their most powerful neighbour. They obviously have not the manpower to prevent themselves from big neighbour like of overt resistance, yet if every man, woman and child were armed and trained.

Then they could at the least find their own problems with the least to peace above them to run their own affairs and if anyone should be inspired to conquer them, that a serious move powerful neighbour will come to their aid instead.

In this business that powerful neighbour is the United States, which left it alone in spite of a type of government not exactly to American specifications or preferences.

There were the coups d'etat.

With this a groundswell of revolt by the people of Grenada against the existing regime, or was it the work of an intellectual group of Marxists who had no actual force of another group of neighbours — from Cuba — to help them, as it turned out, and has given the majority by "workers"?

Whatever it was, it probably was at the time pleasing to U.S. actions in terms of international legislation but it made a lot of sense in terms of the future safe being of the Caribbean people, and certainly in terms of the security of its continent.

40 years after D-Day

Tuesday, June 5, 1984

This week — today — in fact — marks the 40th anniversary of D-Day, when the vanguard of an estimated 3000 million Allied and fighting troops assaulted the beaches of Normandy that beginning the last chapter of the destruction of Nazi Germany's war machine.

The significance of D-Day was probably overshadowed by the big battle just over one year later at Stalingrad and Belgorod, which was to turn through World War 2 to an attempt and, after initiated in a new era of global power and insecurity.

UNDERCROFT APPS VERSION 3.3

Today we exist and enter another, World War II is described more with the development of the weapons that have brought the planet to the brink of Armageddon than with a crusade to save a good part of the world from tyranny is established.

There is also a deep sense of guilt on the part of many members of the country and the United States in that such nuclear armaments were mostly the fruits of the Allies.

Not so.

The improvements in the atomic were nothing; fortunately in developing, as some books said the means to deliver it, and had the Europeans not lacked the longer world they have been successful.

The big bangs would have come and at about the same time.

Except for Hitler, however, and the heroes who fought their way across Europe the bangs might have occurred in London, or Manchester or maybe even New York.

A stalling argument

Computing, July 24 1985

Probably one of the most telling arguments against the United States proposed Star Wars system comes recently from a Canadian who has been privy to planning and discussions of the project.

Chris Pascal, a professor of computer science at the University of Victoria, flatly says it will not work.

In his view, software engineering is not unfeasible, to be dismissed upon by scientists a system that cannot be tested except under conditions of an actual attack upon the United States.

To those who regard computers as infallible, it may seem preposterous that the spy beams of the mind could not put together in software systems that is close enough to perfect to do the job dependably. To any amateur computer hacker who has written even a few lines of code the Pascal contention would be close to heresy, to be ignored.

A professional computer programmer has not wanted that for every hour of programming spent in developing a computer package, two hours are spent by experts trying to crash the program, that is, doing everything they can think of to make the program fail.

From where those safeguards have been developed most programs packages maybe reading and computation after they have been marketed and put into use under normal field conditions.

The Star Wars software would be believed require hundreds of millions of lines of computer code and decades written by thousands of programmers using varying techniques and approaches.

The experts all this programming to make sure that it has it need to be system necessary to simulate the conditions a real defense system is about under attack.

A few computer-aided feats of testing could probably cause it to turn on itself and destroy the United States.

40 years after Hiroshima

Computing 7 August 1985

Yesterday marked the 40th anniversary of the nuclear bombing of the city of Hiroshima and the beginning of the end of World War 2.

It is natural that the anniversary suggests a flood of commentaries, complexities and questions, for every aspect of the nuclear age that began for the world at dawn on that August day.

It is equally natural perhaps that in other comments debate on the moral questions sought the United States have employed so terrible a weapon.

Natural, yes, but who has the right to pass judgment.

Can those of us who have never even known the horrors of conventional warfare really balance them who made the decision to bomb Hiroshima and Nagasaki as a test of an estimated 200,000 lives — mostly civilians — as the expectation of ending a war that last already 8 1/2 million of civilians and would probably kill another million or more?

What was the judgment in August of 1945 of the millions of parents who had sons and daughters in the Allied armed forces and who were to lose every night praying that the fighting day might not bring the dreaded telegram of condolence from government?

What was the judgment of the mothers of Okinawa, Kyushu and other Allied living in that time under the bombardment of Japanese conquered? Were they grateful to use it and, as would they have preferred to suffer yet another year or two while the game was played out by conventional rules?

And how relevant is the debate?

The decisions on both sides were nothing, except the attack to protect a nuclear device. Even anyone sincerely believe that the Germans or the Japanese had they been free would simply have put it on military and gone on fighting conventionally?

In any case, Hiroshima and Nagasaki are simply the first of an age marked by the threat of where nuclear forces was achieved.

Human inventiveness and human aggressiveness have guaranteed from the day the first weapon was used in battle (although it wasn't obvious until this century) that by term would come when weapons would be invented that were so terrible to be made war unthinkable as a logical solution to anything.

Self-interest would control today.

Nuclear weapons are to control, to warn not battle.

The bombs were designed to deal absolutely the worst-case power, unlimited except by those who were share. We now find ourselves at the junction where we could decide the future course of democracy, by reversing direction or accelerating.

If we choose for deceleration, the survivors of a nuclear holocaust will ask themselves how it might have been prevented and how we proved it to be futile — no matter the sincerity of the Western intention.

Desperation is the enemy

Retrieved: July 1985

An Air Indian jetliner carrying over 300 people crashes off the Irish coast in storms before its scheduled arrival in London. All aboard die. Presumably it is the work of Sikh terrorists.

In Beirut, a bomb explodes on Hamra Street, where a CIA agent was murdered. Not leading anti-nuclear Archbishop Hilarion Capucci, two foreign travellers are killed, but the world is relieved that the journalists' gruesome pictures of bloodbath scenes from dying Assam Sikh terrorists are suppressed.

In Bolivia Irish ex-terrorist threatens to explode bombs in hotels unless ransom is paid for country where they and some two-score clerics and monitors are members.

A TWA flight from Athens to Rome is hijacked by a Muslim for 39 days. Thirty times every minute — and passengers are held hostage for almost three months in various Arab cities before their release on Kadhafi's suggestion.

We seem to be living in a world gone crazy: a world in which hostility of murderers can hold nations at ransom by bargaining with the lives of innocent people during hot-line talks have reached levels of political pressure.

Most North Americans living today have grown up rather close to the realities of the world in which we live.

We remember only as a vague and distant childhood from the 'thirties how it looked from the rest of the world. While they have hardships, they interpret as their fate the rule of law does prevail, democracy and very real opportunities to improve their lots.

That assured a people largely trusting and confident that all was well in the world.

But while we live in a reasonably free, tolerant company in our minds, and enjoy our freedom of choice, our democratic traditions and our prosperity, we do so only latent away from poverty, oppression, dictatorships by individuals or like ones, religious persecutions rule by intimidation and torture, and other legalized vile inventions by tyrannies, hallowed on people who are not allowed a voice in world councils.

There is no reasonable, sane defense for anarchism. But desperate people are not governed by sanity or reason. Desperate people take desperate measures.

Desperation is our real enemy.

For the sake of Libya

Retrieved: April 16 1986

Bhagwaan!

Early Tuesday morning assets of the fifteen States we have rejected military humiliation in the vicinity of the Libyan cities of Tripoli and Benghazi.

The installations have been intensified by U.S. spokesmen as bases for terrorist groups allegedly operating with the approval and/or direction of Libya's Col. Muammar Gaddafy, who have been escalating their campaign of violence against American non-military targets in Europe.

In his address to the nation a few hours after the attack, President Ronald Reagan stated that the U.S. has assembled evidence that the recent bombing of a West Berlin discotheque frequented by American servicemen, and been ordered by Libyan authorities.

In view of the fact that this happened in West Germany, blamed by the U.S. personnel in many nations attacks planned by Libya in the future, it is difficult to be disagreeable to the action by the military action.

But do we really relish the idea of a bloodbath that could be the consequence?

In the United States there are governments that people may see the problem only by the same standards that prevail at home.

In South Hong country, of course, in international relations. The most basic thing to it, however, is negotiations backed by world economic and political pressures.

Terrorist attacks against UNIR diplomats by Irish East terrorist groups seem to have changed Soviet attitudes toward terrorism. Perhaps they could be persuaded to lean on Khadafy's ego and change his mind about attacking U.S. targets in Europe and on the United States.

Offering him peace, not war, is unthinkable, but there may between efforts in the United States go unappreciated every day because of the personal

Where are the protests?

Retrieved: May 1986

We know there was a nuclear accident on the Soviet Ukraine early last week or two weeks.

Do we know about the accident between the Soviet Union, that have of the human reasons whatever they may be, too quick to alert the rest of the world to the dangers that might arise from the accident?

We don't.

As a matter of act there is little reason to believe we would have been told anything about the new meltdown (perhaps more than one) at a nuclear plant at Chernobyl, north of Kiev in the Ukraine had not been for the fact that the meteorologists of the country were sent their movement to the nuclear impossible.

What is surprising (but not entirely so that there has been so great distrust of protest from entrenched anti-socialist groups around the world.

Had the accident occurred in a U.S. nuclear plant, there would have been screams-the-roof pickering of every U.S. embassy and consulate from Tehran to Timbuktu. Pravda a

Persian Gulf tragedy

EDITORIAL July 13 1988

It took the president of the United States only a few hours to declare that the downing of an Iranian airliner with a loss of 290 lives was justified because officers on a U.S. warship thought the jetliner was an attacking warplane.

The downing, by the very most plane not on the opposition in the direction of New York City has over the Persian Gulf appears to have where the presence of various non-military aircraft must be commonplace.

I suppose, together the reaction of the pilots had been showing but reason and the warship command?

There is something drastically wrong somewhere when the president of the superpower can justify a most ill log of air lines in international areas by using the excuse of a warship's ill-founded...

Military people are paid to feel threatened. Civilians are not.

Last week a tragedy shook artistic arrangements and services of procedures to reduce the possibility of a occurrence of mis-type of disaster.

Proof of the boycott

EDITORIAL July 30 1988

Money is the year T the Magazine named Mikhail Gorbachev general secretary of the Communist Party of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, in March of the Year of '887

This is terrible; it bestowed unusually by the wealthy seven magazine on the undecided for growth of unlimited's diamond by it to have done the most in the previous year to change the world. In terms or for worse.

Those of the Persian leader concede a proof of the policy of glasnost (openness) which he to not only proclaiming but actively encouraging. In a nation distinguished for some of the 69-year history of its regime in being the most brutally repressive in modern history.

Whatever the Communism more done wrong they have achieved a priory good record for eliminating a nation in which illiteracy was more terrible than the exceptions at the time of the revolution. The newest schools people and make means about peace, democracy and freedom without fallen beginning to wonder what they we got more of that stuff.

This it not to say the freedom has arrived for the Soviet masses and is free to stay

President and freedom of speech are two vessel attributes of a political system, like the way of the ruling body or who a change of the participated. Yet, the presence or absence of some freedom in the very fabric of the system

Freedoms bring a way of life and politics that it threatening to and bound to be resisted by many powerful people with vested interests in the status quo in the USSR. A struggle is inevitable but may hasten to it more relaxed and free system or put it off indefinitely

Time will tell. As the old Russian saying has- the proof of the pudding is in the eating

6. Genesis and Exodus

Where and when it all began

It would be reasonable to suppose that in a town like Steinbach Mennonite with a Mennonite population of almost ninety-five percent as my childhood there would have been a strong emphasis on teaching Mennonite history.

In fact the opposite was the case. While a Mennonite catechism was taught in the lower grades of public school as well as German, the church language, we never were taught much about the origins and characteristics of our ethnic group than more than a century old.

Some Mennonites claimed to be Germans, some Dutch, almost all spoke Low German (Plattdeutsch) at home in the workplace and marketplace, and German at varying levels of proficiency in church. Most Steinbach families had immigrated from Russia in the 1870s, and a minority had come as the 1920s after losing their lands and property in the Russian Revolution and its aftermath.

Most of us knew that at some time in "prehistory" the Mennonites had migrated to Russia from somewhere — presumably Germany — but at least in my generation dates and particulars were as obscure as Tupper's proverbial origins. What little I now know of Mennonite history has been gleaned from family and community histories and a few booklets on the Mennonites.

It seems to be generally agreed that the Mennonite Church is an outgrowth of the Anabaptist movement which had its beginnings in Switzerland and adjacent areas of Germany with non-violence, adult baptism and separation of church and state as vital tenets differing from those of mainstream Protestant churches then developing.

Menno Simons, however, was a Roman Catholic priest in Dutch Friesland who converted to the Anabaptist faith and who wrote and preached this new faith so persuasively and fervently that his followers — most Frisians, Dutch, Belgian Flemish, Anglos and Saxons and a few French and English — were named after him.

While I'm not their permanence of non-violence nonetheless in the context of the imperatives of the war against Germany, Italy and Japan raging in my youth I see it in a slightly more sympathetic light after reading of similar wars in which young men were sent into battle in conflicts that often were on more than grudge fights between feuding noblemen, or forays by lords for booty in replenish exchequers drained by ruinous living.

The repugnance for arms-bearing becomes even more understandable when seen in the light of a practice then extant in Switzerland, where the Anabaptist movement was born. Evidently not unintimidated even then in finding ways to leave an honest dollar, the Swiss contemplated paying users for military service, thus halved them out, by the sale to supplanting contractors, whom they had to offer their lives in foreign causes they neither cared about nor understood. When I view their flexibleness in this light, I am rather proud of Swedenborg who then said "Hell, no. I won't go!" regardless of my own view of service to one's country in a hopelessly corrupt in the twentieth century.

He and his brethren became of their belief in separation of church and state, non-violence and strict baptism. Practicing were hailed into court and severely punished; about two thousand executed ordinarily have been confirmed. It is not surprising, then, that they looked favorably upon an invitation to settle the swampy Vistula-Nogat delta near Danzig in what is now Poland as few country people, holding from the sea and reclaiming arable lands from marshlands was second nature to them. They were accordingly accepted.

Like many people living in European backwaters in their period, the Mennonites had to be bilingual. The low country speakers of dialects known as Low German (Plattdeutsch) was for daily use, while the old-fashioned language and that of their Bible was used in church and when dealing with officialdom.

Church statistics refer the language of the church until the end - 1700, when one minister decreed to conduct a service in the German language. This ordinance stated much as follows: that it was five years before anyone tried it again. Suddenly it became the natural thing to do and German became the official language of the Mennonite Church in that part of the world.

Not having the scattered any explanation for the desirability of this change. I have made my own deductions. Being a mixture of Germanic people or tribes, they probably had neither more nor less loyalty to one language than another. Geographically, however, more than Prussians dominate are closer to Germany than to the Netherlands; the privileges, such as exemption from military service had to be negotiated in the highest level of authority, and for much of the period in question that part of Europe was under German rule. So German was the natural language in which to negotiate. During those periods, too, they surely would have been considered German nationals.

There is a further possibility that the Mennonites found Martin Luther's German Bible more to their taste than the Dutch translations used by certain Protestants. Just a guess.

In that part of Europe was the popularity of the Mennonites, not to say, has been sufficient at least, free and equitable rules were changed to restrict and reduce the size of these holdings, and they were finally taken away from them altogether by the state church and the aristocracy.

About the time Catherine II (the Great, Czarina of All the Russias, and herself of German birthright, notified Germans of every kind to settle the vast steppes of southern Russia (the Ukraine) conquered recently. It was her hope that German agricultural skills would rub off on the local peasantry. For the Mennonites, her invitations included exemptions from military service, full religious freedom, the right to use German in their churches and schools, and a free plot to break. One restriction was that they were not permitted to proselytize on pain of banishment.

The Mennonites knew a good deal when they saw one, left their farms of 250 years and trekked hundreds of miles to a new homeland, where once again they had to wrest a livelihood from, and impose their own order on, a hostile environment.

Again they prospered, and as soon were by their privileges were again challenged. Suppose daily on the question of the term of their special status. Some claim their exemption from military service was guaranteed in perpetuity, others that it was a 100-year privilege. Whichever it was by 1870 a Russian czar had announced a "transitional" program for the items of foreign descent, to end in gradual progressive assimilation of Mennonite exemptions from military service.

At this time both the United States and Canada had strong immigration programs with incentives that included freedom of religion. Thousands emigrated almost immediately from through a compromise had been worked out by this time with the government whereby Mennonites boys would be able to substitute forestry service for military service. Many settled in Kansas and other parts of the United States Midwest and Canada. And it was this wave that also settled Saskatoon and other colonies in southern Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Both Jenne a family and young men opted to remain in Russia possibly considering forestry service and Russian language education a small price to pay for the retention of the cultural affluence they had attained and were enjoying. My grandfather, one of a long succession of horsemen bearing the name Julius Siemens, had been one of a group that travelled to Manitoba to check out the potential of settling in the New World. He, in and in have reported back that people had to work long hours in Canada. Even for some Mennonites. I suppose, by such either-or standards, when it was necessary for sheer survival, and both alternatives when life-and-style became a viable alternative.

They had four decades to enjoy what became — as we learn it years later — a gestalt life by Mennonite standards, and certainly gentlemanly when compared to the lifestyle of the Russian citizen they needed to cater to all times as Russians but those were more probably. Unbelievably pleasant to the level of personal leisure, and wholesomely devoid of moral decadence.

Those lifestyles were probably simple when compared with the Russian aristocracy but in the luxurious sense of one indulged in and appreciated genuine Mennonite cuisine whether describing the harvests of watermelons stored for the winter, cream in their sockeyes generating under the weight of fruit, pictured calling cards presented by young ladies whose calling at the homes of friends, going off to boarding schools and girls' finishing household arts directly to prepare themselves for overseeing the servants in their own future homes — our minds boggled at such affluence.

Any cure we might have felt for the Epicurean life was offset by the knowledge that it hadn't lasted. While our parents still were young adults, World War I was the prelude to the end of all this. First of all — exception from military service ended to the extent that young Mennonite men were required at least to serve in medical corps; both Jenne's father and mine served in no more the front as stretcher-bearers or ambulance drivers, and of course were subject to much they were exposed to risks from which many generations of their forebears had been spared.

Surrender by Russia to the Germans before the latter were themselves defeated deprived the Bolsheviks revolution, and war personnel — now in contact with warfare at its crudest. Time bombs were commandeered or as hitherto for White and Red enterprises, troops alternately raze of young girls, grandmothers, and anything in between, pogroms (Russian assassination spree, mostly hidden, in haystacks) were very commonly this — food, clothing, money and valuables were exacted. Life for Germans held little value and served as officers in the Czarist army — even in medical units — no acts to have been sought out and executed.

Early in the civil war, young Mennonites were forced-defendants unite to guard their settlements against raiding bandits. Here lives and families were endangered, they managed to make that much of it compromise between their non-violent religious and reality. Somewhere, the distinction became hopelessly blurred as at least some of those were fought on the field of loyalties, as at least as non-Bolsheviks.

Communist victory brought confiscation of property, famine, and some of "enemies of the state" to Siberia. Commonplace between public interrogation by newly appointed tribunals, middle-aged members of homes and arrests of men who often were never heard from again as were summarily executed late at night for real or imagined crimes.

Mennonites were targeted literally as former landowners, and as ethnic Germans were identified both with the warring country and with the occupation forces that were as much as evidence after the Russian surrender. (Although I have established that the Mennonites probably were of Prussian Dutch and Belgian Flemish stock originally they had spent many decades as Poland while most governed by Germany had come to Russia as German nationals, and many even have served in the administration such Germany's ruling class in contrast with the receding glory of the Dutch empire.)

At any rate with little hope for a future tolerant of their beliefs and lifestyles and with their youth conscripted the surviving Mennonites recalled their annual opportunity to migrate to

North American. While Canadian Mennonites worked through the Canadian government to open the doors of this country to their kinsmen trapped in Russia, a smaller ring of Russian Mennonites negotiated with a capricious Communist government to permit some to leave the USSR.

Jonas's father was a member of the negotiating team and his position as an interpreter as well since it probably seemed to them with whom they negotiated that there was something burdening on the mennonites to want to distort the millennium with which the latter had blessed the land. Every morning, Jon remained was entangled with the fear that it might well culminate in arrest, a speedy secret trial, and execution or exile.

Leave to emigrate eventually was granted and another great exodus began.

The Canadian Mennonites who had worked toward bringing them to Canada had guaranteed to settle them on agricultural lands. Land was plentiful, but land is price and the immigrants were penniless. It is to set that there were a number of large farms in the prairie provinces that could be available on reasonable terms. Established before the 1929 crash by absentee owners, they had reached a peak of profitability during World War I and the years immediately preceding it, but had lost acceptable viability with the end of the war to the owners were not prepared to selling them. These holdings were almost entirely operated by tenant farmers and while the Mennonites for whom was one of individual ownership and operation many of the immigrants, during several generations of village life, probably had few their hands on familiar-ity with agriculture and were unsuitable to the idea of inexpensively pooling knowledge, labor and ownership.

The matter of payment was still a problem. It is the Mennonite Land Settlement Board devised a contract governing Mennonite immigrants to purchase land so terms that included the following features: no cash payment at time of purchase; payment spread over a period of up to fifteen years and based on a half-crop payment plan, no obligation to pay anything but tax and insurance in years when crops are not sold below 50 per cent and interest to be of 6% percent.

The contract became known in the Canadian west as the Mennonite Contract, and in terms of Mennonite Terms. It is indicative of the Mennonite reputation for reliability and early prominence that these terms were generally available only to Mennonites.

The Declaims together with a dozen other families, settled much a farm to the South Lake district near Swift Current. This group formed economically only briefly than divided up the land and equipment, and established individual homes however humble and functional some were pretty humble.

The Neufelds and some forty other families acquired the six holdings of Sheldon Farms near Hensley and not far from Saskatoon. The land was held and farmed more usually four number of years although separate house places were established.

My father Andrew J. Sheldon Farms, to the settlement continued to be called - a shelled sorry up to absentee-ownership since he had been an accountant in a small farm equipment factory in Russia. The term "accountant" substantially a small factory has since been meaning in accountancy probably was limited to a bookkeeper-secretal secondary education.

In 1927, only four years after immigrating, my father died and my mother had also arrive you how to cook in her modest money which was probably no more than benefits from the immigrants insurance plan which provided only had been established. For sister Mary and husband Ismail Klassen had moved to Winnipeg not long after immigrating and with black aboriginal relatives she might choose to go. It seemed like a good idea, to be nearer to her brother the had to the country. In doing who by long to online her meager holdings and the pittance she could hope to raise on Winnipeg would require living in the poorest accommodation and in neighborhoods not suitable for raising a young family. Thereby also I was born, she acquired a home in Saskatoon where she and her family would, at least be in a community of people with a really culture and religious background.

Meanwhile back at Rat Lake the Beckmans were just getting a handle on dry land farming. (Mr. Beckman had been a teacher in Russia after studying in universities in St. Petersburg, now Leningrad and Jena Germany) when the Harry Thiessen came along and treated their neighbor thirs thousands of other Saskatchewan farmers. What might have happened on the long run in anyone's guess, but just when things looked blackest, they were visited by old friend Alderman Hyde who was incredibly by their humble source and offered Barkman a job at his Germanlanguage weekly newspaper, the Steinbach Post in Manitoba. Although not trained in printing or newspaper work, Barkman was at least as qualified for it as for agriculture, he accepted. Left the farm to speculators, and moved his family to Steinbach. Not many years later the Barkman family took over the Post.

This edition is not intended as a genealogy any more than as a detailed history, but since this chapter purports to give an insight into one family's religious and ethnic background so as also to our own history, attitudes and predispositions, it seems appropriate to introduce the immediate members of our family who must have had some influence on us, whether they shall be admit or not.

Gerhard Schulzen Barkman of Crimmfeld Russia a young school teacher, married Maria Unger of Neuy-Fedosh, Russia, daughter of an apothecary-cum-government placed on a Jewish agricultural commune to give some guidance to the commune members

The Barkmans children Anna married Johann Dueck of Saskatchewan. Eugene married Helena Penner of Steinbach, Manitoba; Ernest married Hypatchie Reimer of Steinbach then living on Hamilton. Gerhard died in 1907 Heinrich married Mary Sawatzky of Swerdlike Manitoba, and died in 1976; Jesse Martin married Ernest Neufeld of Winnipeg, formerly of Steinbach.

Gerhard Barkman died in 1907 and his widow in 1977 after living practically by a second husband Alberta Vogt of Steinbach.

Abram Neufeld of Alexandertal, Russia, married Anna Siemens of Alexanderwoh. Rosen, daughter of a petty bourgeois and village mayor or mayor (schulze).

The Neufeld children Anna married Reinhard Hildebrandt of Winnipeg, Hermann married Elizabeth Voyt of Steinbach, Viatyn married Jane Shultheis of Winnipeg, who died in 1968; Gladys Gerry of Vancouver, who died in 1960; Marguerite Ekkert of Winnipeg; Verne died in 1965; Helen married Jerry Rovsky of Winnipeg Ernest, as mentioned above married Irene Barkman.

Abram Neufeld died in 1927 and his widow Anna Neufeld in 1960

The children of Ernest and Irene Neufeld:

Eric Rudolf, born in Victoria, married Charlotte Wyrbaum; they have two sons Abraham Michael and David Eric

Denise Irene, born in Weston Ontario, married Reeve Kathleen of Weyburn; they have one daughter, Brenda Debbie and one son, Jacklyn Erwin Patricia Anne, born in Weyburn, married Barry Ward of Weyburn they have one daughter Amber Deb.

Mary Ellen, born in Weyburn, is unmarried

Carrie, born in Weyburn married Scott Herriot of Saskatoon

Ethnic and Sociology of Mennonite Known Family, published 1982 by Dr. Schlemiel L. Lacroix of Hillsboro, Kansas "Reflections on Our Heritage. Text published by Indiana Brimm Ltd. of Indianola, in 1974 "The Mennonites of Western Canada, written by Gerhard Lohrenz of Winnipeg and also published by Brimm. "Westward Ho!" 1960 Ph.D. thesis of social story of which was finished by the public relations department of the Canadian National Railways. Encyclopaedia Britannica

Introducing Grandma!

Written 4 November 11 1971

Seventy-odd years of wedded bliss are behind all his community-loved and revered parents and family and patients of an extended old age from Grandma.

From the moment she instantly spots us with a vigor which belies her three-score-and-ten-plus natural existence become surrounded and life takes on the aspect of a self-centration period. It can remember one's Race of a matriarchal rule, but is inherent by a general whys, having loved centers of happy conditions as if it were proper decision to take expressed hand creating motherwight.

During those seasons which only that somewhere from the days to have worth loved, which used to rid us strongly as they begin we are alternately engulfed by a set that we share of a couple have been half a century ago (and perhaps magnificent methods, celebrated and corrected collected a wounds and means as they ought to be, or encouraged and nourished and encompassed, we are pampered with the country clothes

In fact a state, or for evil or unknown, mind after until with the last crop or entire, we are kept up till 2 in the morning being educated in family hair or incorrectly unknown to the evil.

Many antiseptic cures land give which ... written as personal lies that I find even enclosing as an extreme respect. But when a mind contends to be one of the thousand most distributed and overpowering personalities I have ever encountered.

Ina calls

Vincent — June 15, 1960

So here I am languishing in the history of the ironic Qu Apostle Valley, promised at 5:30 every morning by the song of the wooden bell, the remaining dawn like cedar and the overpowering ignorance and crime particularly by the sleeping nurse who seems to hold my interpretation (which simply informs nothing) that an acclimatizing journal 98.2).

Here there is best those trees by perfect space my many nine acre of which I dwell by report, determines psychic about thirty was which I hope I may be spared economic and that it's coming out of my ears, and come to it I have understanding and latter appreciation of commercial people.

It seems well for Northern provinces that I alone was singled out for banishment to the Seattle.

Indeed, while, as we stood Tasmania that out of thousands employed only one person was found to be infected with this, was once a dread disease, and one which can still take a terrible toll of shocked and half-caught at the early stage.

People are forever telling me how fortunate I am to live a temperamental and able to go on all those hotel I write about. There haven't really been as many, but either I'm dead wrong about shades I like. But look what happened to me. I just know I shouldn't let them be treating this kind. Job seems to drop to me, like when you are hurrying to get your money to happening to bath, it's so hard to turn down.

A young scientist who also helped me unpack said one also was a university student here for the summer only.

"You seem very young girl. I declared to some bent and work meaning of these gurney.

She looked a little embarrassed, then confessed that could she had arrived in Fort Sao, she hadn't realized I'm this emergency.

Our cost of arms

Montreal — April 7, 1975

Dear Mr. Needful: arrive in Toronto here. Did you know that the Needful family group was represented with a tone of army a heraldic antiquity. And while there are over seven million households in Canada, Easter time, 2,750 of them are New field households.

Now Sunday the matter of learning of the cost of arms: there's some food for thought for everyone who enquires even to be related to the two other Needful they know. Know now that there are something in the centre of 2,750 families of as writers to this country, and if this month, they have all heeded the repeated imperatives to "go north and multiply," they would now be 15,000 Needfields (See also Needfield, Needfield, Needfield, Needfield) having moved.

You can understand my feelings therefore, when I stumbled onto a Calgary hotel last weekend and this magnificent, flowing coat-of-arms emblazoned the name of Needfield, immediately stamped me with a dignitaries of this other.

"It's not as though your name as Needfield or Jones, said the.

I drove myself to say full height and said, "Young lady, do you realize that there are 2 775 households in this country the name of Needfield?"

... she confessed, "did you get one of those county crests too?"

Well, I asked that shall not drawn a pig line as my hand just began to think of myself as something approaching royalty, with a magnificent coat-of-arms and all that.

Needless to say, I told the only one my three books the fine report which "tells the unique story of the Needfield name. It calls it that the name means, strange and unique family names associated with it. The Job had it a large honorific representation of the ability a drawing of the Needfield coat-of-arms. The entire report is documented and printed on parchment paper suitable for framing.

I'll just say anything nice when my coat-of-arms arrives. It'll find it very interested by mine. Stamp Needfield in 1975, and displayed by my very fella, who are now settling me a copy of at for $3.

At the last stages of the report, just between that a few months ago five of charge. Evidently it was decided Needfield, or something close to that, which is the name we have in Needfield, was a name that many more of the people who lived on the new land established there. So was Peterborough's name the Small, and that coat-of-arms and other establishes. If you don't see a Needfield coat-of-arms in it, and the Needfields you get it coat-of-arms on the range.

Cost of arms received

Montreal — May 1, 1975

Well I promised to more about that cost of arms, and here both is at the heraldic glory.

The accompanying Heraldic Authority attests that documentation of the cost of arms can be found in Burke's Peerage & Baronetcy, Vol. 97 p. 23 "under the various Needfield, so any of my readers who happen to be Somewhere into that book it up for themselves.

If the Brits were in power almost in the upper-class end, there was no chance we intended to signify a green change. Here I hereby concede that the Saint gift has long been lost. We had provided one top of the shield as described in "the dove of peace, ready for flight." It probably an measure of the progress running in the Review's more regal, and I were somewhat it would make to put them on permanent flight.

Just what a dove of peace might be doing on a coat of arms is not explained, but maybe it tells us more members of the lowers' good intentions. Then, when we're related and he has guard dogs, woah!"

"Individual accountants, explains the budget together with plans for the purpose of more specific identification. The first primary revenue for second census were numerous branches, dollar's name and personal characteristics. The secretary Madrid appears to be accomplished by which and is believed to be examined with the Governor, running and what formed with national land.

Although this interpretation, Treasury Bonds and the days it welcomed a few weeks ago Gallup Mendels more interest living in society and forward land, would be in one survey to the gentleman Home of Study Answers since that time as my organizational consumer income.

At 8 morning that night told tragedy let alone by the Madrid coast of more the report measures me to come to be according 2.5 heads of households as Canada "with the old and distinguished Marshall name. San other Canada interest, that there are approximately 3.5 pointed per household in Canada which yields an annual can total of 8,500 people in Canada carrying the Marshall name. Although the figure seems relatively low, it does not signify the many important contributions that individuals bearing the Marshall name have made to history.

These Statistical Canada people and better watch out or they'll find themselves in the same predicament as the statisticians who drowned trying to wade across a stream with an average depth of one foot.

By consequence, the same day that this one-of-arms, national, a fellow publisher sent me a clipping from his paper with the blaster head, "Ernest Newland Anointed." Paragraph 1 advised that my namesake was possessed with a gold watch in recognition of 15 years of service in the air-speed equipment.

I'll need him the case of arms, and maybe he'll have to sign and on his hand.

By the way, if 33 years cheap to get a member of the coat of arms and Marshall people. Here's a guess: If I can get a full cover included from of mine plaque at the special price of $5.95, I'll send it to your shipping and postage.

Am I asking? I'll tell about that one.

Discussing a ground officer

THURSDAY, November 17, 1977

How does it feel to be a grandfather for the first time?

For those of you who have not already experienced it, it feels great. Why? Because it's such a way to experience over becoming a father for the first time.

No wonder it is up to hospital nurses when passing to a hospital waiting room, answering about how we cope with the difficult newborn infant, around the house. Just a telephone and informing you of your new status. A brief visit with the new member and a quick look at the new arrival with permission manages to reasonably reluctantly and everybody is how clean.

Then home to a hot cooked meal and uproarious about what all a member of contingency names which have been standard issue will finally be selected.

With your new forbears the conversation can usually accurate different. In our current case, we were living in a rather isolated development in Vermont. Few of the homes were even occupied giving on the ending of Christmas (a good time). We had no kids, and the nearest telephone was about three-quarters of a mile down the road. Under ordinary circumstances, none of this would be expected to worsen into the realm of our nerves.

A particular disability offered to mix up to the magnet of the unexpectedly occurred when he was at home, but the other of things in the case of that the factors to engage their fiction and happened early on a Saturday night, the first day of the long-term vacation.

Now there, settled myself into the routine of first-timing with my wife into domicile, until a baby and my home with his housemaster watching was going to happen first at least 24 hours. So, housebound bound on two or three hours each and the once-an-hour-heart-to-heartbreaker less which dropped from nervousness with realizing the time of home.

Morning came, and made the trip to the maternity ward only to learn that conditions were unchanged, that the joy of motherhood was still in the future and not to bother coming down to the hospital and hanging around. Several more trips phone calls and visits of cold home but will we change to suit it, and finally grow up for the day.

I write until Monday morning, in bed and [illegible] of a happiest Sunday morning after all.

The day part of Saturday hope and I have planned to say that this have continued [illegible] to say this last. For a quarter of century.

National presidency

SATURDAY, July 24, 1937

Eleven years ago, almost to the day, at Sainte Anne, near Ste-Marguerite, for Saint-Jovite, I was sick and I had been elected to the board of governors of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association.

It was a great day for me and in real remember emotional while (I) could possibly contribute to the business association. It is a feeling which is almost to almost everyone who this now been elected as a position of responsibility of any degree but in the House of Commons in the home and related associations.

At this years rolled by relationship Hon. myself reading from a leader journey of vision with Dale was expected, in one of the "old guys" in semi-president and finally two years ago in Saskatoon [illegible].

The said role mentioned involved visiting every province in convention of Canada's weekly newspaper association, several conventions in the United States, and a number of special functions in eastern Canada.

Last week in Winnipeg, not many blocks from where I drew my first salted half a century ago, I performed my last official act in declaring my successor elected as chairman of the board (a euphemism for past president).

Over the years [illegible] so my colleagues has well and truly witnessed. I have was with colleagues in Ottawa in Vancouver or Calgary Edmonton, Regina, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Bracebridge, Montreal Moncton and Hal Inc. and informally at such places in North Bay Dog Lake Sault and Sudan Sudan, to Gaspesey Rimouski, Cyprus, and Bermuda. Tel Aviv and still later!

It would be a transparent untruth to say and the association have not been thrilling and memorable hours and people I would not have met otherwise, and valued friends which except for this role would still only be names. It is quite instead of actual communication and of many happy and people which are permanently enshrined in my memory.

Grandma laid to rest

MONDAY, December 8, 1937

We had Grandma to rest last week.

As an octogenarian long some of the favorite hymns and [illegible] service on at the time when growth and prosperity she had helped to shape. I was incredible paradox as how much can be crowded into a single lifetime.

Who could have foreseen when a little girl was born to a self-styled plantocrat-of-our-former and his wife in an almost impenetrable wilderness of southern Russia almost a century ago, the many changes of fortune she would experience and the transformations that would take place here to her personal world and the world we are in?

The two years probably would have been and she would grow up helping her mother raise a large family, convey the use of a neighboring farmer raise and secure food, and if and we need, free her three-cornered son in a world are very different from the one she knew in the hamlet and here home, and probably without ever travelling more than 50 miles from home.

As it happened she married a young school teacher but they had barely started their family when World War I burst along and changed forever the [illegible] of [illegible] populations she might have had.

A bank fighter and occupied her family survived through wartime deprivation from the husband, usurpation by German troops, the bloody revolution that changed the course of history and the terrible famine that followed survival, was a most successful effort.

Family came the glorious day when, after months and years of negotiation both with government, emigration visas were issued and they were able to take three of [illegible] and a few meagre possessions and set out to build a new life in a strange land (Saskatchewan).

This was still up-to-date in this province by 1923 was also not exactly a host of music. But an enthusiastic young immigrant with his son language and the ways of this country, and many were the visits we were to hear later of those early years of skiing on mountains and of our travelling pastimes and evenings and tennis matches at a school about, until, just when matters seemed bound not several of the economic prospects and depression came along to destroy even [illegible].

Alone and take on, old school chum who was publishing a German-language weekly in Manitoba offered a job, one for which the ex-minister was not endowed this country styled. Eventually they took the big plunge and bought the paper with a borrowed down payment, and with freedom among us at that even the youngest hands in the family took every able article there was finding and addressing, in the pioneer tradition of work, type to be set or distributed. Hours on hours in windows to work. Now in a large system as and type of influence a thousand that might have translated survived, and in the family grew up and took over because one of the postmaster's regular publishing houses, although not before another was and wanted the company's ability to survive which once more served her country.

As the family grew up, peripatetic and multilingual, Josephine watched into the role of matriarch as a growing clan, and managed somehow to identify with the business and misfortunes of each member. Inevitably some dismally evanescent, and so daughter grandchildren seemed scarcely, each and every one in some time felt the need to shower her happiness, depressed as long as she had something to give since she is the epitome of good cheer.

Throughout her life by friends. If hostile and the frailty of old age there was never an occasion spoiled or succeeded where her determination did not influence the course for one cause or the other.

She died a legend, but as legends do, will live on to be all since the landslide whose lives she touched

Family reunion — circa 1979

by Loretta August 29 1979

Never having attended a Scott Hill family reunion before I've never and cannot, so I ponder about the meeting before.

Late breakfast on Sunday, everyone is gathering at the edge of Watertown, heavy and the expectations started many friends of thought. One was about its very small for such a thing as a reunion. There must be arrangingly about some of a family event in the country. Food in family less probably and several dozen a large wooden through together by washing, dancing, clambering on a traditional Christmas dinner.

Normally there was always the relaxing weekend table and can of Coke as was a far-away big city or perhaps because a relationship in the hamlet to a far-off land. This one would be together in absentee and receive so many memories of the gathering. Perhaps or else, after a letter and accompanying snapshots and even much about the affair to them something to

Today some families are so combined within one family a big couches and every beyond that of is unlikely that one of the seven-seasons gentlemen earlier will bring together an inviting resembling to each ostensibly of the family. We are outside enough to get together once often, but this very unlikely combined with different and homework, rarely weeks and to a situation where people who ought to be there are not there when you see where they ought to be, I just get a sad lament.

Thus, today my thoughts of a family reunion were negative very special talents and traits, such as patience, inquisitiveness, a sense of loving and a ready sense of laughter.

For someone to say agree to just even for her had if was their partner then she is long suffering grand parents family here on which any gatherings might be held. With a bit of crowding and perhaps a dozen youngsters bedded with the bayloft and perhaps additional cousins to the bathhouse there was room for everyone.

As for food, ma's or grandad's poultry, root cellar and sometimes would be rationed on to limit a tug-ment. Here we have become very chauffeur-in lounge lizzy on spectacles and buying food three week at work, so detecting the site and missing in the feeding of the neighbours in everyone consideration.

I am introduced about the dinner for Watching Watch up the day for the gathering. So one to our family tree from or but over food there. Turned-out my uncle and aunt have a cottage there, and being close friends of the turn-door company were able to borrow their family' they providing new arrangements enough years to accommodate a house trailer and the necessary cellar.

Not long ago a high priority consideration for such a gathering would have been a special area for the family, cooking, sleeping of tables and small children.

Not such thing here. The five siblings of our family have produced a number 25 offspring and though all but one of them are now married or of marriageable age, only three have produced the blessed addition to replenish the stock. Three sons used by parent songs, seeing their children prove the result of contact with the very young.

This reunion of the group was another season of woodcutters. The generations ago and perhaps even one which there might be counted upon the many outside the religion or ethnic background. Today care must be worked so not to be offensive to Protestants, Roman Catholics or Jews, anyone the father here we are the French-Canadian attitude in the family and next to me the Irish-Tagnitte.

The Canadian Pacific was said to manage stream, circa 1979 and thirteen you wondering.

Seeing the light at last

by Loretta February 9 1980

Sixteen months ago, a company burst the family parliament my table that was bombarded by our own table and for not easy to get and certainly challenging had known here the tenth must be said. Perhaps it could not be it going to be.

The timetable Water followed because was that lived two years, one the oldest of the family and many packing by the city the three a few years older than myself and two brothers between me the one-hours.

Quite was the second and house of the neighbour and of town, in a little subdivision carved out of the northern corner of section 34 while the rest of the large arrested during a section 35. The last house next door to us, was occupied by large fam- ily the oldest child being a boy a year younger than myself followed by another boy and then several girls. The remaining two homes to what I have explained only called a solid citizen were crossed by violent furrows.

As the foregoing indicates, my sister and me girls live more ago for pleasure, and tend to obey a mere list. But one the occasions were slightly better because there was always the lazy next door

Because children loving what it is, however my playmate and I would have the occasional falling-out, or he might be angry with me for one of his many reasons, or have sore of his cousins over bowling me the cold-boy-nod. Whatever the reasons, there were times when I was left to my own devices, and it was then I lapsed headmost into Art. Then I was my purest would strength and dignity, work like a Japanese lady-fiddle.

Many of you think that I was a crazy spark; you have told me so often enough. I show a bold temper, you hint, it was agreed, I would play her dolls-and-clothes games with him; and then for another hour she would play the same sensible war-and-treaties games with me.

What should have tipped me off was the fact she always insisted on the doll creation coming first. I believed she did this because she didn't want me to bring any half of the bargain, to show my good faith. I always gave in. The end result was always the same. I would dutifully spend my hour not only playing with her and her crummy dolls, but I would have to do it without audibly or through it enjoyed.

Any conversation, as we pass, any laugh translates of the dolls, or even failure to treat them as a loving human might mean a rotting child, and I was threatened "if she don't play properly, I won't play with you." Thus I was coerced.

So, with all the false enthusiasm I could muster, I would play my part, except for a slip hidden away from the sight of the girl, my lover. Don't think that wasn't held against me.) Anyhow there as a always well, reasonably pleased and the hour would be over before.

And the hour here that otherwise sensible girl who received high grades in subject and could tell me headlining stories or long winter evenings and then sat in another her words act like a perfect clown playing with rope and swords. Carefully planned out motions would be knocked over step upon ignored, light notes those where the word swung to the left, and absolutely no imaginations used until finally at a rope would fall and its result, and continue to play by myself.

Once the game, always remember at her stupidity. Thinking about it upon the other night, it came to me like a smell that she hadn't really been trying. She had pre-decided my rage already to get me of her room at the height.

And still she wins, that thought she was dead.

Amazing Novelists

Time Magazine, September 26, 1938

A few months or months ago we received a rather sincere offering a book "The Amazing Story of the Novelists in Canada." Since I've never been a Novelist mysel in any Who's Who? I have encountered, I naturally wondered what emphasis of my elements and silver bearing the name novelist might be like based in the story of the amazing Novelists. What else details of the past had been expected? What else make might be some kind of a novel in them?

Well, the book arrived last week and while it disappointed, because it is not anything like as the name, readers does it make any know shown or hard science and the history.

To call it a story at all is a bit of an overstatement. Actually, it is just some outstanding stories at some fashionings.

The "Foreword" probably is changed slightly for each other group, and we hardly mean it does not have a strength likewise to give it a relieved effect. In the opening paragraph, for example I am convinced that to a history of the Immigrant Canadian authors, briefly given in an extended manuscript in the 16th historical-development of the great North American continent.

In the next paragraph it is noted that the Canadian Historical had not gained the acceptance and editor remembrance that makes the people of Canada different and have no a place like Rudolph among the adjoining the novelist by American colonists. That's just as well, although you might have been pretty hard for a Rudolph writer than by was in this country and Rudolph. Without being specific, the Novelist are also credited with a significant role in the development of the Canadian nature, and at the opening sentence of this section I has paragraph. It is considered that the Canadian Novelist author of the Canadian first, last and for all time. he was literally at one with the Novelists.

The chapter on "How the Novelist Family Got Its Name and What the Name Means" is composed of a general story in how names were given to us and in Europe and the British Isles, and how they evolved. The Novelists are singled out in a brief paragraph noting that according at the publishers' request, the name was probably acquired by "a writer of fantasies or by colored land."

Several pages of the book seem are also scored, but if they opened my mind for a few weeks they might find quite a few more.

A chapter on the family trees of some of the groups of that material weeks ago I nearly replaces the use of these sketches in European historical cultures are in shelter a compendium of the Novelist and, with the descriptions.

"Quatrefoil and d). left diagonal head, 2 and 3rd flower per with a little green arm. Above the shield is the cover which is described as, "The dawn of power ready for flight. It is supposed that the early Northfolk displayed their control of time with this great pole.

Elements of the heraldry survive but the publishers say the Cavaliers Northfolk handbook, which was issued last month, is the best yet for kids.

The real Northfolk

Guardian, October 2, 1984

Cambridge my lengthy report last week on the Amazing Northfolk. I said while I am about to write, definitely not the time that I've seen a genuinely high fad so. It's purely a coincidence that about the same time we got the book on the "Amazing Northfolk," a plan flew forwarded us a copy of the Northfolk genealogy going back almost eight generations to a grandfather born in the middle of the 18th century.

It came as something of a surprise to me that the family history on my father's side was recorded that far back. My manuscripts on the house was largely due to the fact had my father died in a fairly young man, and none of his kin lived anywhere near us, so there was never anyone to hand down family lore and anecdote of the clan.

What struck me as particularly interesting in reading the old entries in the gold-edged as compared to the current ones, is the change in movement and marrying patterns.

For almost a century the males were always born in the county Essex, and inevitably married girls from the same village. That didn't change until 1914.

Today family mobility are considered all over North America, with a few still left in Europe. They are encouraged to migrate from one place to another, a number of times, and social different countries. The names and addresses are in about 10,000 social communities and a very few exceptions.

Marriages are probably both rare for most people on the continent, but it is fascinating to the census. In beginning to see how people become genealogy buffs, which could easily bring the myself getting involved in this hobby.

What's in a name?

Guardian, November 21, 1984

Two birthday brought, as always, mixed from my eldest sister who, on this occasion, wanted knowledge on the circumstances of my naming on this planet.

Being, as I was, the fifth child of a nearly large-sized family which had just lost its father my arrival must not have been anything to cheer about. But at the saying goes you get a home a multi-source homemade. Once the baby were allowed to settle the start of the crowded by dawning how on picking a name for me.

My name the one that tweets me about it was the same like chess "Walter. That's right, "Walter.

That is really got you thinking, hasn't it? What's this "Walter" by? Some when a "Tessie" about for "Walter"?

Part of how but Russia name is human name. Sure, my sister was the one and "Walter" it would have been, but she was the oldest and when a younger brother who had chosen "Ernest" was lucky her head settled and she switched his preexpressive using to address.

From that was a close one" "Walter" is like Ernest it makes it sounds and elegant when you have been so addressed all your life, and I have had some close and lifelong friends as a result.

But somehow I would find it hard to think of myself as a "Walt." Anyone who "Walt" is sound dumb if the columns were asked "Walter"?

A friend and a host

Insight, May 27 1984

Over the years, I first in the annals of postcommunity education, but it's a fast and probably a bit as our family so forgive me for crowing. Last month we travelled to Scotland to the University of Saskatchewan convention connection where one of the old fraternal degrees on the same day. Not to long, but read from as a B A degree with distinction, and a master's degree at completion of course.

Well you to bring it I is going to be honest about it, but after all that has to be a personal property, a satisfaction existence.

In the 1960s who have never attended conventions, a double-season may sound like a hectic day.

Essentially it is a matter of the considering that it only constitutes the fall between two events: as such a retreat, at which you are very few personal interactions have to make.

Each year you take from whatever happened before and during the year to be efficient, personal, and interactive handbooks and functionaries.

All free to the brief period research when your are a family member is announced.

In the one shared of all a youngster of about three years broke prohibits protocol and intention by shouting "Hi Al" when page walked with fingers platform. It was ever so big in our part of the Saskatchewan that he felt obliged to give a proper performance before being shushed by embarrassed Lesbia. But then, if persons are perceived pride surely the same may be called to youngsters seeing a person graduate.

Of course he could not have understood what it was all about, but our surprise that he had been put off many times with promises that this or that, beyond family means, would be affordable once daddy received his diploma and with fingers crossed, a job.

Attending the two positively men a young couple at a pre-grad party who, after living three years as a contented inmate had, just moved into their own home, and were still grieving with the beauty of it all.

We talk about the "good old days and the deprivations of our own youth but putting people during Christmas will in one or both are attending university have their work cut out for a while!

What conveniences matter, to excitement is routine up however, is dignity and necessity. Even the professional to the contemptuous of traditional music, and smiling with the academic expectations fitting suits the platform or the official robes of the college where they received their degrees; the uniforms remember the change to the graduates that had been spoken thousands of times to different words but is still valid every time it is delivered, the assembly-line confirmation of degrees which nevertheless effaces your image unless to stress in the many hours of study work, worry and sometimes near-despair that is the essential earning of each graduate.

I don't envy the undertaker to whom it has all become boring routine, for paid pleasure it is still a rare experience.

The much-loved cosmetic

SUNDAY, February 20 / 1955

Several weeks ago I received the world-shattering information that one of my 3 weddingcakes had won home again. The "Ladies" as they like should known the heart of a typical provincial Rolling magical or perhaps by the young Head of many of the town I considered such "Town-wedding Cake greatness.

Upon reflection, the award did not be so unappropriate on two counts. First of all, I truly had as much love, and sincerity, and care of the was as all the bakers. The others were at least a good as my humble self.

Secondly, the cosmetic and artistic [illegible] was also obvious. One of my friends [illegible] don't have much fun out of the day and my home one came out with [illegible] of coming from the dentist.

The much-lovely cosmetic-piece a real beauty. The tooth fairy left me [illegible] chippers and a pair of pinking shears with the suggestion that I [illegible] more confident when my mouths, and of the [illegible] as it used to be decorative [illegible].

The [illegible] chippers left quite on the very first piece [illegible] as to unacceptable. It's with pinked [illegible]

A humble art Christmas

MONDAY, December 23 1957

I guess the most unforgettable Christmas of all was the year the stark got himself confused into [illegible] and decided to bring us a humble element on the end of his day.

We turned off his big glass, the whole lot of us, but it got out of nothing, when we decided to go out the square at Hadley's Hotel Tree Tavern on Christmas Eve.

The older children got the younger two quite all excited to and every so often for whatever we had for supper — probably hamburgers and fries. A terrible time yesterday followed, and about 6 o'clock the anticipation of us nearly dying to open the gifts under the tree.

Naturally there was some objects to Christmas Day [illegible] and we put the right hands on everything including the wrists, but we had a pretty good time for as it almost went, and everybody enjoyed the [illegible] stock [illegible] (chocolate of round stuff shaped into [illegible] and held together with [illegible]). With boiled potatoes, probably on the rare side, it turned out not too bad, considering who was in charge.

Boxing Day was the big day because that was when Mama was running home with the new [illegible]. Lovely Boxing Day was [illegible] and [illegible] came on to get the turkey in the oven for me, and prepare over a few times during the day to see that the [illegible] pointed to the wind's making a mess of things.

By the time [illegible] and home with [illegible] [illegible] and we had got to [illegible] enough attention to everyone from dad through [illegible] to the newborn.

Thereon [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

7. Steinbach, Manitoba

A Canadian Mennonite village

Welcome to Steinbach Pop. 1,082*

That's what the sign said. It was not approximately 1,082. It was 1,083. It remained 1,082 from the day it was erected until the day it was taken down many years later, probably after I had left for distant parts.

I knew because I was mildly excited when the white wooden sign, about three feet by two feet was installed a few hundred feet northeast of our house. I was fascinated that someone had gone to all the trouble of counting all the people in Steinbach, although I wasn't sure any stranger to intrigue our village would care all that much.

For a while I checked the sign regularly in case the population had changed, and was puzzled that there were no updates. Did I had heard of people dying and families leaving but how, and even the occasional family moving in or away. It seemed a bit confusing to see a figure purporting to be exact and then leaving it unchanged for years.

I really didn't puzzle all that much, become lacking back. I doubt very much whether there was much fluctuation. The Steinbach of my childhood was not the competitive business community that grew out of the boom that followed World War 2 and expanded until the bustling town became the shopping centre for southeastern Manitoba (its acknowledged automobile capital for the province and hosts (circa 2000) to about ten thousand people.

Although Steinbach was unique — as I'll soon enough, not simply unusual — there is from what I have learned from the nostalgic reminiscences of people who have grown up in other Canadian villages something common to the lifestyle of all of them in that particular period of time.

So why was Steinbach so quiet?

For one thing ninety to ninety-five percent of the residents were ethnic Mennonites. They had a common background as descendants of the Mennonites who immigrated from Russia in the 1870s established the village and took up homesteads in the adjacent rural area, particularly to the north and west of the village. (There followed another influx of Mennonites after the Russian Revolution, but the basic stock descended from the 1870s contingent.)

Even this ethnic dominance was not unique, because in western Canada there were scores of small communities established and populated almost entirely by one to another ethnic group—

ITSCHERETTY HAPPYVERYBRAIN

Ukrainian, German Indianite, French-Canadien, Norwegian Hungarian Romanian and others — but Steinbach had the further distinction of not being on a railway line: this at the time when a railway station and grain elevator was the unquestioned raison d'etre for any aspiring prairie community.

We were told in school that railroads had bypassed Steinbach because church elders had petitioned the railway or the authorities for this. They were mistaken, it was said, for young people to be spared the evil inherent in constant contact with the outside world. Intrusion of harmful ideas and the temptation to leave the sacred sanctity of home.

In a recent history of Steinbach, however, I read that while this explanation has not been disproven, it is more likely that Steinbach was simply missed by a railway line that took the most direct route from the east coast of Manitoba, to Winnipeg. Indeed, if you take a map of Manitoba and draw a straight line between Winnipeg and South Junction, where the Canadian National Railway line crosses the Ontario border, or the United States border for that matter, the line intersects at Piney, Steinbach, Grosse and St. Anne, rather neatly. Bearing in mind that Steinbach did not then have the earmarks of an emerging metropolis, there is little reason to believe that the railway planners would have had any possibility reason to single the railroad toward Steinbach — so, even with an engraved invitation.

Having grown up in Steinbach however, the above scenario still makes a lot of sense.

The nearest villages served by the railway were the French-Canadian communities of Le-Perquenne and Grosse right miles east and northeast respectively. From Steinbach by road, one had to go due Easterly about twelve miles to reach Piney. Farmers delivered their grain to elevators at these points.

So if I say that Steinbach was a village of about one thousand not serviced by railways and peopled almost totally by people who used German as church, and Low German (Plattdeutsch) at home, on the street, on the workplace and the marketplaces. I am confident that I do not offend partial English-speakers by calling it insular.

The use of this dialect Aengue francoe of those Mennonites since they left the Netherlands, Belgium and Germany almost five hundred years ago, was as prevalent at Steinbach until World War 2 that most local adults would have been offended if addressed in any other language on the street or when entering a place of business. In school use of Low German during recess was forbidden, and this restriction officially applied to the streets when coming to or going home from school. But was observed largely in the breach.

As children, even older and beyond the teen years, at home with English, strange speech patterns developed in school and elsewhere, many from the home: they learned words and intonation which had no formal counterparts in Low German, while the language as spoken at home differed socially and in its words and idioms for which the school offered no satisfactory English substitutes. As a result young adults, whether purporting to speak English or Low German, spoke approximately the same in accent and phrases of the other language. Depending on the night the individual's familiarity with either language and native factors, a conversation among a group of young adults might range from almost-pure English to almost-pure Low German and anywhere in between. It was no uncommon for a person to switch languages several times while speaking, even within sentences and not be aware of it.

Adjacent together it spelled confusion (geographic and oral), religious and ethnic. In an age when radio was just coming into its own (forbidden by some Mennonite sects) television on the drawing boards daily newspapers taboo only by the elite and social intercourse with neighboring villages within the ethnic mosaic almost unheard of: cars were an oddity as well.

Roads radiating out from Steinbach were dirt-surfaced and poorly graded until under such programs initiated by the depression brought some gravel surfacing. The local weekly was printed in German and concerned itself less with either national or local news than with serving as a mail-in organ for Mennonites throughout the Canadian west.

Steinbach, perceived as an ethnic island in an alien world, and made up of people with a commonly common background, a common religion and a common language, must sound like one big happy family.

It wasn't like that at all when I was growing up, nor more than it is nowadays where the known economic vigor has since led hundreds of non-Mennonite and hostile eyes to see Mennonite congregations, doubtless a number of non-Mennonite churches, including — hold your breath — a Roman Catholic church.

Let's look first at the communities of the religion. Ten upwards of seventy percent of the residents of the village in the 1930s were billed as "Mennonite." However there was no real organic unchlthcme that binds these together. In each of Steinbach's four churches of that time, as I understand it, authority in the congregation and/or in elected board was final. There was no hierarchy of appeal, practical and sometimes bitter disharmony occurred.

Since three of the congregations had separated at some time from the Kleine Gemeinde (Little Congregation) which had settled Steinbach, one can imagine that bad blood was created by this schism and carried around for a long time. The last of the Steinbach was built in the 1870s after the new wave of Mennonite immigrants that followed the Russian Revolutions. Since these newcomers probably represented the Gemeinde at its point of renewal, there should be a Kleine Gemeinde church splinter out before leaving Russia in the 1870s, they did not exactly embrace each other as long-lost brothers. In fairness to the Chortitzer-Reinländer Mennonites, they had homeland, dispersed and supported impressive programs to assist their kinsmen in resettling in this country. But this didn't mean they had to bring them home for supper.)

Know-howing and whizbang were creative in the Mennonite religion and spirit, there was seldom overt unpleasantness. Possibly partly did not fraternize with members of other Mennonite churches any more than necessary. A family having friends of another sect is seen on the Sunday "creeper." For example, would have refused credit even in bank or supermarket.

What blessed them together at all was their fear of the unknowing and fealty, or heart, they still thought of their "separated brethren" into evangelicals, and Reformed and other denominations of the Roman Catholic Lutheran and Greek Orthodox people that they were dealing with.

Privileges guaranteed when they immigrated such as exemption from military service, might also have been withdrawn if they had not been able to manifest an appearance to the outside world of a relatively unified entity. They had learned in over four centuries that in their negotiations with the highest level of government upon which these privileges depended the appearance of such could never be underplayed.

Besides, look at a colonial decision.

The Mennonites who left Russia in the 1870s are settled in Steinbach and other more Canadian communities, had given up improving economic conditions to start from new beginnings on the shortest seed of a six-year harvest.

Their lives were hard, and it was literally by the sweat of their brows that they coaxed their large families. Were the realities of those early decades didn't allow other options anyway they tended to cling to traditional proportions of higher education cultural improvement and other observations.

Those who remained back in Russia, on the other hand probably did so because they were becoming wealthy and enjoying it; they had private schools for their children and sent their children students on to their own colleges and even universities by non-services in Russia and in Germany. Their servants did the manual work while their own sons became administrators, gentlemen and embroidered learned household rent and perhaps even read poetry and played the piano.

When all this blew up in their faces in the wake of the Communist revolution and they finally were able to pack what little they had left and migrate to North America to join their kinfolk who had left a full half-century earlier they found themselves apex and also by half a century of diverse social paths.

On the one hand the Canned as Mennonites, many of whom had become moderately prosperous were seen by the new immigrants as being uncultured to the point of being embarrassing of their wealth while the others saw the newcomers as folks with fancy manners and talk, with such eg to show for it, supposedly not proficient in the good Russian work that marks honorable people.

The second distinction was not unlike that common between Canadians of British extraction who come from Ontario or places more of the west, and the "pure-bloods" — the country English — who came here, took out homesteads and seemed (to the locals) long on culture and short on practicality and common sense.

The new Mennonites were referred to, with contempt, as "Russländers," interpreted to people from Russia but not Russian. A favourite jibe at them failed to produce a laugh when it was said to anyone (and this leaves color in translation from the low German): "Are you a Russländer or are you just naturally ugly?"

In fifty years, and with different educational and cultural patterns, it was inevitable too that the broad of low German rock gravy spoke different mealsbeverly. As Europeans who learn English in their early schools tend to speak with an English accent rather than with the further harsher American variants, so the Russländers, despite Low German as their normal of Europe and included many Russian words that had become an accepted part of their speech. The locals on the other hand, had adopted English words and a Canadian inflection to their German. Naturally this was another basis for mutual contempt.

For children, like myself, brought up in a Russländer home, it was a challenge to listen or modify my speech at least to the degree that a stranger could not instantly identify me as a Russländer.

Separated from Steinbach's mainstream are not only the rich consumptives and Mother's widowhood. If the two are somewhat — there was the difference of milkmaids in a then-unmarried not represented by a local church, and one which permitted views leading counter to the heretical or downright pagan, manipulating the cultural purpose that caused listening nurses immigrants and their families. So such was about religious locality are finally freed to preservation of awareness.

Association as to marry small towns, also led on family blood-lines. Most Steinbach residents were descendants, at least in part, of the original families that had settled the village, an area more related to one another perhaps as several hamlets. Almost everyone who amounted to anything, and many that a few who did not, bore one of the following surnames: Wiebe, Penner, Reimer, Toews, Penner, Barkman, Loewen, Kroeker, Klassen, Peters and perhaps a few others. If you could not claim blood relationship with any of those families, you were almost a non-person.

The closest in relation we could locate in Steinbach and precisely were two children born in an area of Mother's who had married a widowed farmer with a large family. Her daughter, Helen, gained the entry to the mainstream of Steinbach society, we weren't even third-listed on their social schedule. But this entry and social limit, it came to her, I am sure.

Jeff brother of my father's friend Cornelius, about eighteen miles away, lost our acquaintance we saw very little of him. He did come with a truck and pick us all up at, his marriage of his wedding day. Families and road conditions determined that we would share his little apartment on his wedding night.

Jeff valiantly on family had little trouble making friends, and my house was always a place where they were made welcome but as a family we were not entirely part of any clique or social group.

If anything raised lower on the social scale than the Russländer (at least so we consoled ourselves as children) I was the Yankeeds — an idiom peculiar to southern Manitoba. Heaven for us this application "Yan Zied" in the Low Low-ist equivalent of "you side" of course there were large Mennonite settlements on either side of the East River with few crossings to connect them and therefore on a share basis still the recipients of the aspect to settlements were referred to as "Yankeeders." Times being different, other times who moved hopefully to the other shore were economically disadvantaged families seeking greener pastures here today the term does typed a pejorative brought. Income as a result when we learned as we grew older. The Mennonite west of the Red also called an Yankeeders and with equally unflattering connotations.

Nowhere reading anything written herein about religious and cultural differences between the groups, it is fair to report that the Canadian Mennonites were generous to help bring over and resettle the Russians who lost everything in the Russian Revolution. And little more than twenty years later, both groups would unite in helping and bringing over the Mennonite Brethren (Bergthaler Persuasion), who had failed to emigrate seven years after the revolution and who had found themselves in Communist dominion conquest the ended World War II.

A word about religious and other recreational activities on the Steinbach of my childh and

If this sounds tongue-in-cheek, it probably is. It may seem particularly inappropriate to mention in the same breath the overcrowded life and religious activities to a community as deeply religious as Steinbach. The fact of the matter is, however, that non-religious activities in early Steinbach ought to the end of World War I were to few and enjoyed so little support from the power basics of the community that mention was a near-treason within the historic church-oriented social structures of the community.

While historians of most small North American communities are hard pressed to find enough space to tell of the sports and social activities that their community years 1st summer camps offered entries for personal and group achievement in good humor and fun, in the Mennonite world sports and other recreational activities were considered decidedly suspect. They were seen to seduce the minds and energy of the young from the realities of hard work and personal subordination and dedication to religion. Organized sports in particular not only offered the opportunity for almost downright fun participation some were contrary with members of other denominations in general and with basic tenets other faith in particular.

Assembling my thoughts before writing these paragraphs, I decided that perhaps my memories reflected my own biases rather than the facts. However I am willing to a the space on sports and recreation in "Reflections on Our Heritage: A history of Steinbach published by Derksen Printers Ltd. in 1973 I find my memory confirmed. In an entire history paragraph emphasizing or rationalizing the de-emphasis I find the following statement:

Title for the Mennonites has always meant work, hard work with the only time for rest coming on Sundays which were dedicated to worship. Frivolity of any kind was generally frowned upon and the only social activities permissible for years revolved church functions."

Sports from ned upon

Closely following this is mention of a resolution passed by one of the leading churches in 1911 advising "believers not to take part in sporting activities. This is from the same district of an antisemitism and unduly pious frothy group of staunch elders, but the verdict of the general membership.

Borrowing from this new chapter only ten years later have on the heels of World War I a sports-inclined book manager from Mennonite Publishing House Letter to the Editor to the newly established Carillon News urging citizens of the town to unite and provide the young people of the town with proper supervised recreational facilities. The time to start work was a letter from a resident reserving the original writer that there were enough outlets for young people in the form of prayer meetings, church services and other church-related activities

Having and all this to explain the public stance about the non-religious activities I emphasize that my purpose is neither to deride nor defend the prevailing position of the time, but to outline how it was, since failing the accomplishment of recreation would be too sly pointing

The three were Sunday morning church services, and Sunday School Young People's Meetings on Sunday night choir practice for those who sang and had the evenings available to attend and prayer meetings on mondays plays. On Friday evenings during most of the school months Children's Meetings were held at the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church. These were fairly well attended by masses from most churches, as they usually featured film slides, sing-alongs or occasionally on interesting speaker (perhaps a returned African missionary)

In truth, the Sunday morning service was something of a second event, as it traditionally has been in many congregations of various denominations in some rather large and small communities during this period many of the members were farmers coming to town for worship, as horse-drawn conveyances, and they had to come early. When there were enough people in the sanctuary, there would be informal singings of hymns, led by a congregant, until the formal service began. In churches where musical instruments were unacceptable, the congregation had to know a strong voice, and if there was also a shortage of tenors/altos, the hymn would be pulled out by another man just before the congregation launched them.

In addition to the revival Mennonite churches and the various factions they offshoot through the north, an evangelistic surge, possibly brought about by World War 2, resulted in the establishment of an interdenominational church (within the Mennonite framework) "to preach" — it never adopted any other name — in a large quonset building, used only for special meetings sometimes lasting for several weeks, or for choir festivals and other church-oriented events throughout the year.

So here could there have been any restrictive and alternative reservations in this new movement?

It wasn't easy but there were always a few non-Mennonite professional people in town, a few Mennonites with softer attitudes toward sports, a more sophisticated who simply could not subordinate their basic instincts, and who without an absolute prohibition of participation or sports, becomes involved in varying degrees.

Although recruitment of players for church teams was also affected by the official posture of most churches toward freedoms generally, I had the feeling that many devout families did not shy overly hard to discourage promising boys from taking part in sports. Most strictly-oriented young people to be "converted" — "born again" — upon baptism at young adults and other conversions emerged unscathed, large in diversity. Sometimes even individuals for whom time have had been bodily the religious establishment interpreted two-pronged by declaring their faith publicly and even accepting a vocation (again my definition).

A life of entertainment
(written February 20, 1963)

We're all kind of cynical in writing people in desperate situations singing a life of contentment if only thoughts were opposed.

Usually, after deeper pauses, the same version so-tongue, and continues in live blissfully in its station for the rest of his or her days. This is, at best, what one has come to expect in this type of situation. Then I was interested to learn of [illegible] — as of recently, now one needs to.

Two years ago, standing, my own version, I was surprised to hear that one particular person (not in immediate physical but more with the title New Years what I remember of him as a youngster he was hardly the type to have kept judging most likely to enter the ministry or to marry a baby. If you didn't find such life, became to the tough, and I mean tough. And if he ever attended Sunday School or church I never knew or recall.

Anyway, the explanation came about a month ago when he passed away. His obituary featured the following:

"In August of 1948 he came [illegible] to Jesus with many visible things. Shortly after [illegible] his heart became open to the surprising [illegible] and [illegible] singing of which he had enough to [illegible] the entire life to the service of the Lord of His life would be spent."

So that cleared up that mystery and proved that it does happen.

How do you recover from a lifestyle that outside only a church exercises in the first place? And if you are getting tools a bit before you realize, what has changing as to turn there before children? No more family good hockey players played for the Portsmouth Hustlers until accepted into one of several churches after which they would avoid the rink and store their thoughts and energy to more useful and acceptable pursuits.

The Steinbach Hunters end with teams in a largely French Canadian sports environment for the Provincial Cup. Created by the members of the provincial legislature for competition in the old Carlton constituency and made occasional guests for the Mosley Cup, a challenge trophy designated for amateur hockey competition in the larger Interlake Provincial constituency

STEINBACH, MANITOBA???

The club out of which the Rodney played was another. They have never been more whether the club was operated privately by the school or by a marriage of the two. I suspect the school board, contributed some funds but one way that got fantastic between Rodney and well-to-do at the rank. I recall that skating and hockey fans were always collected through the schools, and there was some supervision on student starting nights. Repairs in the rickety wooden fences of the club membership of the church where we put on and took off our boots, and Rossiling seemed to be carried out by volunteers recruited from the high school and under the supervision of a caretaker paid (sometimes by someone.

Hockey greatness

By Lawrence Mitchell

Reports write Bill Rudenhyll wrote, penned lengthy a few weeks ago about starting a campaign to get young and trying on a pro-side hockey game.

Well, progress is by no. Wayne. You may not get me to play as you are almost one down memory and back in the days of my own hockey greatness

Ah those were the days of Charlie Conacher Red Horner Busher Jackson Eddie Shore, Lorne Chabot and other greats who have all the played these moments this play will learn, but I were relieved their pioneer. The Ox-Pox Charming Ones Oh, didn't you may perceive from me but I certainly get a lot of their shots by stalling, pinch sticks and other measures

Strong in manner when I seemed to be a northey my present ambitions was to be a professional hockey player. I called about it constantly and my mother finally wrote out and how I would ever endure my mother hanging around the house all day when other kids were playing games

This I have failed to take on the old determination or at least shame my very pushing on my bullet and thinking me of the matter for how that me depending might needs the point of finding some shoes for me to do.

Now I have 2 dos. I have the impression that I didn't play hockey it just took a slow go on the game.

The first level was the organized and "unorganized" hockey in the school dell. It was organized to the extent that school was chosen to start, and the winner the current time a teacher would sometimes the at school. Generally a defensive would sound and drop pads for the face-off and the game captains would call the officials.

I played on shirts, two shirts are small with a hockey stick made out of two broken sticks nailed together and with organized under my pants on shinpads. I was invariably seventh man on the same and got to play only when the forwards needed a rest which was very often. I stood around good. I was trying to drive the captain's teammate to pass me puck to him and I was five yards back. The game goes, never responding, a shot from my end, was caught on the wrong side of the ice.

The second level of hockey was street hockey. They still if skinny nowadays, the it was mainly between us.

Every year organized the North End St Pats to play a charity house-and-every inhabitat against the Maroon Wolves our perpetual foes organized the team, that the team would select a captain-manager kid who was a good player as a poor organizer. Then he would optimistically inform me that I wasn't good enough to play.

I remember that when I outlived there was always a problem getting the goalie protector. My brother made me a good stick by nailing a hockey stick handle diagonally across the end of a wooden apple box (remember?) The kids hardly even laughed at it after the first time.

The third level of hockey was played by neighborhood kids on a large sandlot of our fathers from a morning well on the vacant lot across the street from our house. We played first on shinny two-a-three on a side, depending on how many showed up (sometimes none one on a side). I learned a lot of hockey finesse on "no knees" and if you don't believe me, just you try standing upright over here on skill times against a 200-pound-er "center".

By the "knees," we always assumed the center of our hockey favorites. If you were lucky class was on field player with the worst five names, and he was necessarily your favorite. Mine's became Maurice Wentworth and Howie Morenz. Maurice and so on. The NHL didn't know my Emile, as I picked his former colleague there was some confusion of the identity of this. For me, Joe Hall still hasn't come over Arden, and there were, in the early 20's, no Jim Neilsons or another so he became Eddie Shore

Whether he was playing good, reasonably got a mark, striking shin pad here him and when everybody laughed he protested that he hadn't been ready. Thereafter attacking players would always look down on him while battle cry "Eddie are you ready?"

The name "Rocky Eddie made the rats, which is probably a blessing anyway when you name is Arthur.

When it all adds up to, Bill, I have a sense that that it agree to play for you now. But allowed me the out anyway and the have to put on a hockey uniform to suit up the bench.

There were one or two years during World War II when the rink got slack; perhaps it would be more accurate to say that it simply did not have life breathed into it at the appropriate time.

Because ice could not be counted upon until late December that is when scheduled hockey began Playoffs had to be completed by mid March and even that might be played on slush.

The school put on a winter carnival also usually in March Saturday and also almost guaranteed to be spoiled by either a thaw or a ice blizzard. These carnivals included events in the afternoon a concourse competition with very limited participation in the early evening, and an exhibition hockey game at night. There was always a refreshment stand where the lucky few with tickets might buy themselves treats.

The same athletes who made up the hockey team in winter tended as fill in the roster of the baseball team in summer. Organized baseball aroused no interest in secondary hockey because the hockeyers were never substituted almost any noon-thursday saturday scheduled for Sunday afternoon, and it was difficult to form baseball and softball teams from players who were committed to another community in time for even an officially complete game before dinner. Games usually had to be called because of darkness after the summer evenings.

The annual sports day put on by the Steinbach Board of Trade according to "Reflection" grew out of an "air scrap" — a visit by some twenty-five light planes in a specified day — which had been brought to Steinbach several times in early 1930s under the auspices of the Winnipeg Canadian of Commerce.

The main feature was a basketball tournament that brought as a number of teams from neighboring towns, but there were also girls' and boys' softball competitions, horseshoes contests and other sports events. There were also jungle bands — Count Sandor — and other gambling and skill type and local amateurs might offer their services as entertainers before the music of most of us. Not uncommon were the ringplanes and perilous parachutists

On the first of July the sports grounds would be filled mainly by local children and adult strangers. Because the whole enterprise did was find favor with the churches but had to be tolerated as it was a creature of business leaders who were also church leaders the baseball fever pitch and the World Series completed earlier this week started a train of thought which took me back to those yesteryears when we grew up in southeastern Manitoba.

Baseball Fever

Harvest October 9 1975

Our home was the second from the last on the northwest corner in the town where the line to Winnipeg curved ultimately into strongest just west within that and makes some of the sports grounds half the size they had grown.

Baseball fever as those days was the stirring in the blood when at about 6.30 in late spring evening you smelled cabbages or an egg thawed, it first came heading out from way had pushing cows got a glimpse of baseball uniforms as evening overtook.

That really started the short thoughout because ball regular was not Wednesday dressed in days when a full complement of uniforms consisted of blood 10 had to last for years, had every clip cleaned once a year

Nowadays teams are sponsored by business firms or service clubs. In those days individual uniforms were sponsored. Our team wore a dark grey uniform, which meant up until as often as Manitoba's black frost and on the back of each zip a large white panel bore, in red letters, the name of the sponsor. Hence Arrow Bus Lines, because it had such. Shoe, Canvas shoes and cloth usually the middle domain with trendy sneakers in the Navajo. The Tennis Road sometimes were there for the good reason that there were several ball players a the family plus the Mennonite Farmers from the land was where those players lived on game had been called "no season of catches.

Anyway it was cooling to get in the grounds had first had a contest had recently been suspended against the high fence, we entertained in ball physically inclosure fifteen feet one of the neighboring villages. There were usually nearest accessible to the arrival of the first instead of visiting players Usually it to meet per city and the arrived in the late. A flat day which had to be patched with the road, could hold up the game long enough to reduce the game from an expected seven innings to five only at.

Admission for kids was a nickel which for us had, not usually managed to get in with the passing of shopping that had dropped or helped the shopkeeper a specialist promptly forgotten with the first cry of "Play ball!"

I remembered everyone but it was a rare day when some man flew in the town beer a full uniform. White clothes with bespoke tiger accruing passings as the middle were processed.

It was a rare game that wasn't marred by the emergence of one team or the other — usually the visiting team — and you can imagine the misery when the home fans was called on to endure, as the leading home-striker was sniffed clinically one second, or even later. What prevented bloodshed on these occasions? Obscene language.

And when the pitcher was pushed, he didn't head for the showers. No way. He moved to the right field the right fielder moved to left field, and the shambling game resumed like nothing.

A home run of course, wasn't over the fence, because there wasn't any. It was simply a ball that got past the outfielder and kept on going until the batter was home.

Baseball fever? Yup. I've got it. Just adjust the time zone, bring out a sandwich and a cup of coffee, an inside issue, and you'll be interrogated in the Socratic-bridge continental, isn't it? Thus two three

Baseball season spawns poets

There's nothing like a nice July 1 to make one feel very Canadian. You have the double-barrelled thrill of a summer holiday in early autumn heighten your national consciousness.

As I sit at my cottage watching the rain pelting down — half grateful because I don't have to make even a half-hearted attempt at salvaging a lawn mower and maybe even succeeding, and half annoyed because the hole here is play into the office (Canada Industries — I wonder how many community sports days have been rained out, and whether the chief workman gets any real attention on it?)

Actually, I doubt I should get up to any more play anyway, so you may wonder what I'm gripping about.

My hometown goes nuts in my old school, when the July 1 sports day yields up enthusiastic displays in rugby and, by a country mile the sensible event of the year — ball games. From as far as 30 miles away came in campers and in cars on important occasions were even completely purposed — not even the hardest-hearted wasn't willing to work visitors. Naturally, the town fence forbade away and the host chasers became the hosts while visitors' team personnel and they could would and did slip in unnoticed pitcher.

Living at the edge of town, from the sports field, I was my knight out and early every July 1 was treated to assumed the sides, how hospital of the sports of spotting you. Here was today's story at the millennial booth. In my pocket burned the 50-cent afternoon shade would afford me an ice cream cone and a bottle of pop both, usually before the first inning. Later I was up, we dared for the rest of the day as I watched the big spectators who would indulge their gluttonous appetites late in the afternoon.

And how impressed and defeated I felt when July 1 morning, were on with pouring rain, or when the committee gave up early and they knew that they were actually the game. The dance had to be rescued because I could not be married with a by a week; the fine perennial that rule might as easily come on the proposal date, and of course many events would be cancelled out completely.

Yet, a rainy July 1 is done with one small compensation only in a one-sided Christmas Day. So to those who had their day rained out, please know that you have the heartfelt sympathy of one who understands

For the evening, other than that which might be a variety show at the Collegiate auditorium so perhaps a review of the Town of Trade's spring play. The night was capped off with fireworks billed as the perhaps greatest ever "pyrotechnical display." It was not our idea-shattering, but one appreciated nonetheless.

The Board of Trade play fans number at least the local Board of Trade recruited it next for a play to be presented at the school auditorium on two consecutive nights in late spring. The actors were drawn from the same "crowd" that made the need for the local recruited. And a relatively small section of Bethlehem society would classify itself with something as frivolous and unfruitful as town-worthy rehearsals for a play. Once on the early war years, when I was in Grade 9 and young adults were becoming scarce in the community, several schoolmasters and myself were chosen for the play. It was one of the highlights of our lives to have a gorgeous as the several nights until other than hanging around downtown. It was also something a rich shoulders so to speak, such also was considered (at least by us youngsters) as the smart set. They were themselves as sophisticated; as the view of the local body politic they were men as attempting to "pass" as "English."

The pre-war section also presented an opportunity as acting as unwise from one of the older and "personal" actors. He learned early in the season as that his "mother" to one of our bands upon arriving at rehearsal on the condition that we didn't hug him for "tailor-made" for the remainder of the 1930s it was a man-size situation.

Surprisingly the plays, performances were fairly well attended. What little profanity was written into the scripts in those days prudently had been written out by directors sensitive to the need for maintaining family-range respectability with all but the most orthodox.

Aside from a few standard school-and-church stunts, the renewed class interest centred on two current fashions, which I called "literary" programs and the like, and the "sketch" offered by the churches in unashamed imitation, that was allowed it for social activities.

The community play

MONDAY, February 19 1951

If you have ever tried the colonial ... you will know whereof I speak when I mention the hardships which attach even now when the lights are dimmed in your school auditorium and today's inspiring theme ends up—as it so often does—where it left off in terms of rehearsal and becomes to them almost an everwearing reality.

I'm thinking in the darkness tugging with the nerves of impersonal workpeace school enemies from the hearts in their flesh, where the goodies they have been producing for so long; you can hear in your ears the ... of may cook the platter — the happy bubble of the cast harmony acts as they generously dole out congenial notes, from bust to the waste, respectively. You can feel the happiness that threatens to burst many breasts ... hearts which for the occasion flee everyone. Before actors sleep over the subjects, visiting members the directors pleased that their sacrifice audience which is compelling to worship.

Then there comes the hour when you see the name of a play hollowed in your memory through your perhaps sixteen has repeated by the presentation of another younger group, and often that the privilege of presence by committee warm up; you entertaining a hunger to be there and live again in hour or two of your youth plucked out in front of your eyes by an oh-so-young and eager group of people.

Then I felt last week — her slightly flushed between and noticed it too late — when I took in the Pittsburg news column that the play Noah's Ark" and been performed by a community group in a number of the towns along Highway 33.

In summary, one of several Yugo brothers might band a bunch of kids on a half-ton truck at a picked a head to destroy the cost of gasoline, and drive us to one of two swimming holes near Fort Aame, twelve miles distant.

The old swimming hole

REMEMBER July 10 1985

River Bend Park near the village in Sta. Anne, 12 miles away, was fairly popular. It consisted of a large wooded area in which was the Sainte River's secondary channel. The river was dammed below this point and the flooded area had been created, creating a fairly good swimming pool. The park boasted a every summer (I'm positive now that it was always certain from a number of days) and had to be shared by health classes every time there was an epidemic.

Footnote. I'm sure she played their part in the film, few could afford even the modest admission prices. By the time the war came along widowed gas workers' families were destitute.

Where the pork man's operating, the only consolation-directive was an abandoned canal pit (like near Six Acres), and about 12 miles nearly on actual country roads from our area.

By design or accident the canal pit had a sloping shallow part lined for small kids and non-swimmers and there was a rational sandy beach. Two by lunchgetting, the pit, which let on to depth of about 6ft feet, was warm as the shallow water and I see the contour, and future cold below.

Every year at least one young person would drown.

I classified "Recollections" for any activities which I might have enjoyed but found a mess. There were no organised summer sports: no cricket, no fixtures: no leagues or whist drives: no tennis: no library, no swimming, bowling or quoits.

The nearest thing to a library was the Scout Library in the house of John Ratcliff, a zealously dedicated Boy Scout and he joined the army. It consisted of a few shelves of boys' books which were always pilfered by us lot and at no charge. I read many of them and was pleased to see that how courteously we were received by John, his sister, or his elderly mother, had never withdrawn his till at once by the presence of Catholic evasion, figurines and the like, shunned by us to be salvation.

During this war, which drew heavily from the age groups that offered some leadership in organised recreational activity, communication and the like itself had come to a standstill.

You may wonder about what happened to wartime to young men of military age in a peaceful community. A generation of conscripts from military service, mainly into the religious Non-Conformist sects they emigrated had been mobilised during World War 2 to the extent that no individual seeking exemption from military service had to attend a judge so as the sincerity of his beliefs. By this time many young people were experiencing the reality of non-violence in the light of what was happening in Europe: no else line became greatly evenly dreamt up the war as opposed, because those who rejected non-violence objected to C.O. camps and "those who became conscripts" into the armed forces. In a 1944 colliegiate year book, an honour roll of ex-students of Stalebuck schools in the armed forces had exactly one hundred names. This would include some non-Nonconformists from local schools who had come to Stalebuck in search of high school education. Of the village staff over thousand people the record probably averaged favourably with most somewhere at comparable size and five per head but more about statistics since for or more before the war ended. In any event whether born of military age must suffer "C.O. camps or into the military the village was almost entirely bereft of young men between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five.

Wartime "interlude pie"
memoir: February5 1970

Remember rationing?

I was almost forgotten that my teeth thing had ever existed at Cousin, until the other evening when Wally Lilliput rooted out his old recipe book for inspection.

For the information of the younger generation — not they need not be many years my senior — rationing of a number of commodities was a peculiar, usually suffering system, when during into the key shortly, or anyway the to feast the shadow rest.

Naturally, about no one represent the place, there were no life goods, and not very many restaurants outside of serving anyone who got into trouble, or at least on the part of the owner the unlucky rich simply went from with no sanctuary.

After every decorating, the police would close up the enormous and pure signs forbidding trespassing and reckoning, but the bootlegger and the signs both had a habit of reappearing.

We could think, nothing of cycling the 12 miles in an pit and back on a Sunday afternoon. That is, we could do nothing of it in the first ten months, but then we took up the energy very often after that.

Anyway, this is not a story as we are in the good old days, in our town, and probably presently in other Canadian communities. We survived the shortages, the hazards and the horrible cold and finally found ourselves in comfort.

felt. In recognition of this historical anomaly the town of Angmering-on-Sea is to erect a statue to Mr. Ernest Bevin.

Small holes punctuated, if I remember aright the period, interrupted a haze of misting rain as one's intimate hands laid my outdated trappings (Joe's cossack was good for a temporary period only). If some old lady was not at home to take tender care of me, the kitchen cesspan would be removed and mates for a growing family which tended never to be the responsible ration.

Actually I believe Canadians need some leather and magic carpets than in sea-view years, but mincing helped give us all a sense of contribution in the war effort which afforded the bureaucracy in Ottawa an opportunity to smugly mumble: getting the way for the new growth of big government.

Dissolute mincing, on the other hand, supposed minimum brightness in monotony.

While shopping (haircuts and haircuts, essential to food rationing) there was abundance the constant cry of war did regulate the monotonous evenness of persistent products in the quantities at any one.

Naturally there were people who resented licenses on Monday. To pay for the gasoline ration which could be used for emergencies only, or could be trading prizes. Most monotonic, however were obliged to stay at the car. And of course, as always in Canada, needs were judged in terms of the populous one. Thus a person on Toronto who could go in business via public transportation and use his gas ration for pleasure had significant advantage over the westerner who might find it necessary to make frequent trips in a three-ton to-ton tipsier.

Being a youngster at the time my mind centered with gas rationing was trying to find an adult with enough courage to open this in night look thinly upon the suggestion of taking orphans as trade-bait of him to the Zombie-Mistress' training ship. As a matter of fact

Time were rationed, too, incidentally and the 20-mile interzone loop was never ready, as I recall, without having to stop at least once for gas.

Interzone all that still perhaps, but was that chicken probably meant two, because the ration normally was each pickled boiled only a week or two. If that did not suit you you were out of luck. Any town without the ocean, boat or, a complete-sufficient country road within of the mile-bodied hectic labourer interzoning the city, producing the wine, getting up and take back in the wheat, and infusing it with a faulty ration.

Oh, the mint there!

If Nostradamus had little in offer in the way of reservation before World War 2, it also had neither a police station nor a lockup. Had demand for the latter arisen, I don't know when might have been used. Perhaps as much for as once.

The village did have a policeman by the name Henry Sebergman as a tall, shambling, razor-going man Mennonite who wore his uniform silently on speech days or other rare occasions that interested a lot of out-of-town people. He was a mere familiar sight in overalls pounding nails that fixed what up had to take the wooden sidewalks that ran every one village weeks.

Whether we are pointing by way of community-based activities, the source of life was in my case, in the home for most people, and certainly for young children.

A favourite catchword of the 1930s, and probably beyond in "the poverty level" — the income level below which life proved unable to fit the necessities.

The years of my childhood in the depression of the 1930s might be described in its little changes of standards from as a period when poverty was the rule rather than the exception. Yet, there are a few special circumstances and so family could probably offer some insights into economic limitations that do not even entertain debate on whether color television and sexual exercises are basic elements which the poor ought to be satisfied.

Consider the lot of a newly widowed woman with five children, in a one-room country at a time when jobs even for men were scarce and low-paying and at a period of history when elementary social insecurity the poor was not social, essentially not the small income such as Steinbach.

Before 2 centuries 7 years, strongly that who believes in not a bad few-quarter. There was a time when I could suppress out a tear of self-pity at the memory of childhood deprivations. When I hear, notes seen and heard of poverty in second and third hand has sprouted completely any presumption of first-hand authority on the subject. Any child raised in a Christian home where there is loving encouragement and love, moderation, discipline and prayer with enough to eat, clothes enough and shelter, a roof doesn't even begin to understand the term.

But knowing how hard it must have been for her I see now better able in my sympathy and concern for with pride and gratitude the home my mother managed to carry for only direct three last finished determinations, here gratefully abandon humanity begin for the future im-compromising belief in God and His plan and even humor although this wasn't how strangers saw it.

My father's endless and untimely death in Saskatchewan had left my mother with a few dollars with which to buy an unpretentious house in Steinbach (The Mennonites had instituted an insurance plan of their own, and I believe nothing exceeded modest benefits from this source upon my father's death).

Our first house in Steinbach was the original home place of one of the eighteen families who first settled the village. On a lot about one hundred feet wide, and set back about fifty feet from the property line, the structure contained two-story residence, a shed, a barn and a tiny store under one roof - a two-storied Mennonite plan probably dating back to those times when economy and security were important taking into account weather and other hazards in surroundings that were generally hostile

New home, new world

The front yard was well treed, and the back yard encompassed what I remember as a huge vegetable garden, and small fruits such as raspberries, gooseberries and currants were found in the keen position of the structure was a generous yard as which chickens roamed around and cats slept lazily or prowled around inspecting their domain. There was always at least one cow

Across the street was one of the village's four Mennonite churches. Automobiles were just coming into general use and I was so interested with the long row of single-guided cars on Sundays I would refuse to come in for lunch until every car had left. To me the large collections of cars was friendly associated with church, and I remember occasionally on my first visit to Winnipeg how gaudy the fields were cars were parked the length of Main Street and Portage Avenue even on weekdays.

Long before kindergarten was a part of the public school curriculum in this country the German section from which the name Barrow was previously appointed to Steinbach by a middle-aged spinster reputed to have children but whose affection never seemed quite to extend to my life. It was really more of a day-care centre for small children than the last before school age. They would be sent to Tante Anna's with a packed lunch every morning to enjoy a few hours of games singing and learning German in many rhymes and harrowing stories. At noon they would troop through town lustily led by Tante Anna in full throttle rendition of the children's song. Tante Anna was probably paid merely in kind which at my mother's core would be accept her clothes for her

Just the first house was the heart of the community was between her favourite carrots an end one day

The problem was that mother's income was almost nil and times were unpaid years after your Wheat reached the point where it was only was almost inevitable someone took pity and helped arrange a step of one hundred a week smaller house and paid up his arrears.

The new place a few steps before I was in state school, and I was devastated when I saw what was to be our new house. I grieved and begged and cried and refused to believe until we actually moved that we were really to be banished to smaller shabby dwelling place. The house we left was astonishing in greatness, but to me the move was not just a step down, it was a whole flight.

The house had been converted for some time. It was on a farm and barren half-acre to it of clay enclosed by a page-wire fence. The house, a snowy and a half had wooden siding that had never been painted, the interior had been neglected and every room featured dirty crumbling plaster Plank flooring that had never been touched by a paint brush.

The yard was bare of trees and had only patches of grass Clay from the basement had been dumped in the garden area, forming as forever to near-zero productivity As corner onto the back of the lot stood a row 3 barn also unpainted. The bottom was divided into two parts: a still suitable for one cow and the other part serving as woodshed, except for the part occupied by the "farm-maker." There was a hayloft above the barn. Access to the loft was by wooden cleats nailed in the wall below a square hole with a wooden cover. This became a favorite headquarters for monkeys and rotten eggs and rubbers and other games, especially after the cow was sold.

For several weeks prior to moving into quarters home during summer, soldiers, Mother and my two older brothers—Norman and Victor—then aged about fourteen and eleven—would work at making it livable. They patched the walls with home-made plaster consisting of beaver known what. After the plaster dried the walls were white-washed. The floors were painted and windows cleaned, and ideas, too—they even planned curtains, raspberry cream and gooseberry and currant bushes.

Another little structure I have mentioned was the summer kitchen—a twelve square shack set on blocks and constructed from the lumber by a roofed over shack about six feet wide. The roof-width had a wall set on the northwestern end to prevent the rain from coming in under the slopping wood. The kitchen stove and table, and a small bunk and water container — a huge earthenware jar — were moved into the summer kitchen and it was by all accounts our living area during the summer months. The house was we of bounds, except for sleeping.

Water at this new economic frameyork was a big misery

A passerby insulated and unsheltered house at the very northwest edge of town with substandard heating, ill-fitting storm windows and home-made storm doors, and all of us having to face the domestic implements of doomed and had used with a deficient stove. Consequently was a going experience. Complete dependency on kindly means for transportation didn't make the weather any easier. However most household supplies were in the form of small amounts of those who had not cashless in the 1930s dictated them and put them on blocks for the winter

Preparing for winter

remember: November 5 1936

Into the next age, not a river a challenge answered or cancelled to meet those turning up thermostat

Our cold house was pretty humbled, and mosquitoes prevailed the hitchery.

Wood was purchased by the cord from farmers in the local country in the northeast a lot would bring their wagons two years and possibly three would have them in time for the winter as well. Another heating the price of 50 cents per cord, for this though where you can't have 50 cents, that's a lot of money.

On the many Saturdays and noons not as sunny in September and early October it was my chore to cut the wood in some rows at our room of the sidewalking in our house cord. Read "sidewalking" as the manner in these days most families. The cows had at least a acre and every several inches and pegs as well. Read "saw, as a reasonable appearance over how-ing the wood as to get it each had been changed.

It seemed that it always took a cold snap to get us at the final deliveries.

We couldn't afford two sets of store pipes — one for the house and one for the cabinet "summer kitchen" the every cabin and did the pipes had to be taken down, store away, cleaned both the barn and the upstairs of the appropriate sets of the stove.

The cold, of the past, and the discomfort in having it all made your hands wear when you replenished with a pail larger—or from the sharp edges and the challenge of getting everything to fit each room in the next location.

The reward is full of course, was that nice energy-thing was to plant weather could build a fire and the house would seem to have it

That was only the beginning

Next came the storm windows.

It seemed that every window frame was a slightly different size, and somehow over the years, storm windows made in exported in 20 each window after a builder manufacturer the car would be sent unidentified with Sweden mentioned. I don't know if this was required by law or religion, but that was how it was done once.

Another would mark the storm windows, while my sister and would climb up a kitchen borrowed ladder against the house, wash the outside of the windows, go back up with the storm windows — most of which had at least one crack and fix them once place finally breaking the bare walls, over them to secure them. They didn't fit very well and the wind was filling because with miles of ragged messages.

Inferentially there was always a wind in any house the place. Both in and with enough insured still it did and knocked long enough — upon become plaster and could be found to replace the crooks of young than had broken from the windows over the past season, or during handling.

Then came the removal of the storm doors, as be replaced by heavy wooden windowless storm doors to climate can move one of their, or at least as much as it is possible to do.

Before we had a full basement we would keep several loads of old lumber or fuel and bank it up against the house high enough to cover the crack between the foundation and the walls. In spring it would be my job to shovel the manure from the garden area, which at first grew anything but easily as it was because it is mainly Manitoba basement clay.

A new room, four years of the war Personal Narrative against the siege of winter the very cold days the entire house was kept snug for a man within a few feet of the stove, an enemy fare the thin snow drifted in through cracks between doors and frames, and between window sash and frames. Water in the water jars often froze over by morning.

Herbert's declensions to education was such that only actions 40 degrees Fahrenheit — and zero degrees low — prompted the younger family members from going to school. How happy we were when the mercury sank to that thoughtful temperature! Of course 30 or 20 degrees below zero was a day was dieter delight, giving way down to breakfast and food about what they were had going on, school that day and what story the teacher was reading a the class and descending finally to meal breakfasts and forever hope that next day would be a few degrees warmer.

So how did a widow with no responsible income raise shelter, feed and clothe a family in a harsh climate and the even harsher economic environment of the 1930s?

With great difficulty naturally. So even this near-miracle must be seen in the context of a limited-cash society. People were people of better means did not expect everything they needed to come out of "take-home pay." Much was wrought out of whatever was at hand and close-to-not into other uses than originally intended. Many of the economies and frugalities described herein were not unfamiliarly ours but were familiar to meeting degrees by many thousands families few of whom were really affluent.

Anne, our eldest sister was an early casualty as the family's fight for survival, leaving us seven. Items while still a teenager for the small for vital interests she could contribute by offering her services as a housemaid or waitress. A special agency had been established by the Mennonite aid being together prospective employers and Mennonite girls seeking this sort of work. Most immigrants owned all or most of their passage a Canada by the railways, and needed every cent they could by hook or.

Anne and left school after completing Grade 8 in order to work mornings as a Linotype operator at Steinbach's German-language weekly newspaper. In the afternoons she helped with housework and would be our field hand/errand-girl when she did the sewing. Anne always sang while she worked and I loved to hear her. Among the one of her favourites a song about which a young fisherwoman to wander not as go out in her boat because of an approaching storm. Naturally the dumb birds never noticed an ignoring all advice and dire warnings, inevitably she "bought the farm" to use a terms that didn't enjoy extremely much a decade later. It was just too sad for my taste.

One day Anne walked into the house as usual, burst into tears and announced that she had been fired.

Her employer had visited an old comrade in Saskatchewan and had found him fighting a losing battle against drought and depression. He had offered him a job at the Post, and with the new money to be met by the Steinbach business, something had to go. Anne was that something.

A decision was reached that Anne must go to Winnipeg and find work as a live-in domestic. Unable to remember our hours without her. I begged her to stay. I told her she could even sing "Tschaye the kittle."

During those early years, with the rest of us still in school and on money on a night income when little Mother could earn with her sewing, and the $6 to $16 monthly Anne was able to send us meager sums were $8 or $15 sometimes, it wasn't easy year we were able to visit Winnipeg, and Anne couldn't come home even that often. Besides not having the money, time was an equally big problem. Maids were permitted by custom or law. Thursday afternoons all and every second Sunday. It took something worth more serious than visiting their families to get additional time cliff. Sometimes a few years went by with no contact between Anne and the rest of us except through the mail.

Think of this! I was a member of years later in the early evening of a winter or early spring day and Helen said I was the only one at home, for some unrelated reason. There was lunch at the bank door about a forty after supper. We were at the door together, so I opened the young woman who greeted us with a pleasant "Good evening. We agreed at this "English lady" and wondered who she might want as our humble house. (An "English lady" I should explain was one when spoke accordingly English opened her mouth in that language, wore makeup and a stuffed hairdo and clothing. There was no doubt about this one.

A few moments passed with nothing more said, we staring at her and she smiling pleasantly at us until she asked "May I come in please?" We looked once only into the kitchen to permit her entry but the area under the entryway time served as an entrance hall. Suddenly this beautiful young woman burst into tears and cried "Helen! Bryle Don't you know me I'm your sister!"

It was the only time I remember her catching a rude house for one evening in her dozen or more years as I could as Winnipeg — thirty-seven miles away. Sunday visits happened occasionally but usual ones once a year.

Years later after the oldest two members of the family were married, Helen would allow food it necessary to interrupt her schooling and offer her services as Winnipeg as a domestic. But by this time the economy and opportunities had changed so if she was able to find alternative employment as Steinbach. She completed high school while working and after she was were no to university to earn a degree in pharmacy.

But back to her mother and us

We kept a cow and that provided us with milk for a good portion of the year. Once in a while the cream skimmed from the milk would be churned into butter. Mother patiently cooking a butter pail containing cream until the cream turned into butter and her upper lip turned blue. When there was dry milk was a success and butter was a special commodity

The garden, although the soil was poor and part of it refused to grow almost anything nevertheless produced enough potatoes to give us through most of the winters on which this was the basic staple on our table, rootsi bread

Mother was a seamstress, although this brought in painfully little when most women were capable of sewing their own clothes and even she often of the "mail-order" had to make the wherewithal for material out of household rag money. Upon delivery of the finished dress, when full payment was expected they often pleaded shortage of funds. The shortage sometimes lasted for months, and Mother would send Helen, mother herself to collect. How we hated this! The women were seldom gracious, and Helen, when approached as a last resort more than then and were rudely. We were treated as beggars rather than as people collecting money legitimately earned.

In early summer Mother and Helen would spend several weeks picking strawberries and raspberries for local small for harvest. If memory serves the rate was not much over cents per pint basket for raspberries, and a lot picker might turn in upwards of twenty-five baskets per day. This translated into forty or fifty cents for a ten-hour day of pretty steady work in the hot summer sun fighting off mosquitoes as the summer until the dew evaporated. If we I stand as fill by the figures but I'm certain they are not very far out. I was also pressed into service, but I was a slow picker and missed too many berries and was frankly shortened persons not gross by the berry farmer

Another source of very insubstantial income was the cow-herding contract my brothers had for a number of years. Now a surrender their agricultural backgrounds many Steinbach residents kept one or two cows. The village as a special authority set up for this purpose owned a quarter-section of land a mile from town, and this was the common pasture

The new gesture

Brenda Marsh, 1975

What people who grew up during the thirties talk about their youth: it is seldom without a wistful assumption of those years-long days while the afternoons of holiday evening, played gaily to the same the sad in movement will overtime in an almost unrecognizable breezy I enjoyed. while a violent was something you seldom pronounced unless you dressed cross as the roadside a draw was in your backside for a brief moment in the second paper day and 3. When the next year you would suppose to find given in the pan in gold as the tool in the rainbow. I had as a private playground a separate section of pond land.

We didn't own this vast paradise, it was the contemporary custom and very business had the contract for driving the villagers' cattle as it every morning, and back home at night.

My home town was a village in those days and just about everybody had a cow as it was an important municipal responsibility to provide feeding grounds. The pasture was a sickly cow ruby from the to large limits and the cows used to be picked up each morning seven days a week rain or shine from June to Sept 30 from the end of March to which plotted dangerously across the pasture between the lathery this was $30 or $300 for the season

For the most part my brother ago established my from wearing a full share in the responsibility. He further owns a remedy was my job to take the cattle down town every evening from our house, which was right at the edge of the village pasture manner holidays, by which time the cattle were accustomed to the routine and the dog knew which cows to keep an eye on and which cows were as desperate short at night. was often "allowed" unintentionally at least in the case of Lilith's sufficiency appreciate the lesser — to bring the herd all the way from the pasture. This didn't happen at night as a rule it might have, for I had a knack for doing something wrong like leaving the pasture gate shut and using the community hall gat away or taking the cattle over the cemetery at the very time sounding them) aiming to their feed-stores cows were punctuated "his out

To my fairness no doubt the memory of their overwhelming days may not be as nostalgic but the beauty of the arrangement the one was that by the seventies been unchanged by children and dogs, the pasture was "cast" to surely as summers have held sin to

The pasture was intermingled in regular weeds and pasture land, and I knew every nonpetals. Sometimes a dozen of us would take to the pasture to play leapfrog and like to ambush for each other to hiding places hell's mile past. Finally we would have to go seeking out our companions, have a brief skirmish with spears in dry rabbit thus added down to a fractured knee of catching and discussing the problems in our world. We smoked, I learned to poke, eat, sit where, then the soft warm underside of the feet in certain delightful ways. Rolled between your palms like a few minutes with a few stubborn spikes or silver- removed. A million smoky and tobacco well was a from us from such supports about half an soft shoot. Was here in the mood of our complaints compared to being a from falling apart, but not to attach at to afford the same as a result.

I have heard times still recommended. I've tried a, but I've probably nothing to consciousness that rather with lemon the and no other option.

A few years later it rather grasp would take much me completing a within begun by to earlier generation. We would come around with hammers, a handful of nails in puckered mouths, and for an hour or two would address ourselves vigorously to the task of nailing metal branches to the wall. I suppose, indeed, we would be amazed covering the wonderful latest we planned to have the finished cabin once it was completed.

Last June and July would bring pasture crops of buttercups, pig chamber and lemon chemise. Fingerpicking cupped dew could be in ring. Autumn they seemed instinctively to work but with good concentration. a cold bread and just plain fresh meat and the cold confrontation with the bull as an aggressive cow even during development, since begun unsolicited advocates. Only you the bull, cannot never continue my mother that a was only thought and that I returned home with a duty in a pail of berries while my sister and stood, two keeping pails

Well and it is another was to one pasture I sensed very today! kids with all their bustle?

A week here about Tibby a friendly part-collie acquired by neighbors for their family but who adopted us instead (We gained "title" by having the neighbors potatoes for a year) This happened shortly after we moved to the second house and he was still around, not an accepted member of the family when I left home twelve years later although he was getting a bit greasy and moldy. Mother didn't believe in indoor dogs but he wormed his way into her heart and anyway he was company on the long lonely days while she worked at her sewing machine. The new dwelling left us sealed to the collie in him and those were his happiest years

As custodians of the pasture, as we saw ourselves we had the privilege, read as informed of harvesting the berries. We weren't the only ones: the pasture being communal property, numerous families on our side of town were busy picking there as well. Harvesting the saskatoons, choke cherries, pin cherries and wild cranberries was vital to our winter diet, in terms of both nourishment and variety. The choke cherries and cranberries mixed in the right proportions made a tasty jam; the tartness of the cherries and the sourness of the cranberries faced with sugar complemented one another. Throughout the summer and fall, as the weeds and the garden surrendered their bounty preserving for winter went on constantly for those canned vegetables and fruits offered the only variety in a diet otherwise based largely on potatoes and bread.

Blueberry, easy to grow and a prodigious producer was combined with almost any fruit to add bulk while decreasing the use from the sparkling.

I remember several occasions when the main meal (most dinners) consisted only of boiled potatoes (wholesome) dry bread and water. Supper on these occasions might consist of a small helping of fried potatoes (left over from dinner) dry bread and very weak coffee. There was usually porridge for breakfast, with bread and coffee. But the treat was the day porridge was eaten with a moderate sprinkling of sugar - applied under Mother's watchful supervision.

Meat was a rare item as our table to say the least in the years 1929. The most common meat dish was hamburgers, made from ground beef mixed generously with bread and ground onions. They were delicious, and were made in batches large enough for two meals that is one hot meal with two or three burgers for each, and perhaps one cold hamburger each a supper on the following day. Never more twice on the same day of course.

Roast chicken was a rare treat. And it was an unpretentious rule that even a moderate sized bird was served two - one hot meal, one cold and one cold supper — not just on the same day. In a family of five this made for small helpings of the "special" dishes but we never went hungry; we were always allowed to fill up on potatoes and bread as long as we weren't wasteful.

I never knew my Mother's talent for garnishing the good things to such a way that they took the monetary art of true, not sometimes there, much. She never tired of quoting one of her favorite sayings, which, translated from the Low German goes something like this: If you eat, and do not something, you can have two meals.

In fall Mother was always thrilled to be asked to a slaughtering bee. Many families would slaughter a number of hogs, and it took a fair sized crew of women to clean and boil the intestines for sausage making, cook the sausage meat and fill the sausages, smoke the hams and do all the other numerous things connected with the ritual. The men sat around chatting and it was indeed hard work, for all the helpers were home with several sausage rings, a generous cut of cured ham, meat spare-rib, beef chops and perhaps a small roast.

It was also a companionable day. Mother enjoyed company but until very limited social life. Beside the fact that she worked on very long days every week, having little time for entertaining, demand it low, as already mentioned for the friendship of widow with a large family as theirs; of times be hard times, the social standing in the neighborhood of the meanest as ours.

Leftovers to the dietary scheme were soups and the weekend baking. Most soups relied on soup bones for a base and were last variety through the vegetables that grew from bulk.

A cultivated Mennonite favorite was borscht: the idea borrowed from the Russ ns but altered substantially in the Mennonite version. The Russian borscht is beet-based and meatless, and probably like so many dishes of the poor devised up to get more variety during meatless days. I like to think that some Mennonite woman among the first to settle in Russia, tasted a soup made by one of the maids unaided her tips to a tomorrow way and pronounced that it was almost unpalatable and only needed some meat and dill to make edible, provided cabbage and sometimes were substituted for the beets. Mother always put some large fleet into a large pot of borscht. Whether this was to add a delicate beet flavor on cooking, or a pelts and to Mennonite traditions, I don't know.

Soup servants

EXPERT. December 27 1973

When I see a can of soup, often empty a dreary shudder at the memory of my mother's inevitable resistance to the label's promise that the contents would serve 4½.

Quite why European household tradition – at least of the economic level whose wives I encounter, it was a must.

Cabbage borsch, meatless borsch, butter soup from sour cream base, chicken noodle soup and a few other varieties were cooked in large pots and nourished on many meals that they could stretch over for days.

I was just old enough to remember Mrs Rosenthal's two-dozen- or-so Sabbath "Two Babies". These were made from a dough slightly richer than bread. Balls of dough were fashioned by holding a large piece of dough and squeezing the head in a way that formed the dough out between thumb and index finger. A slightly smaller ball was placed on top of the ball that formed the body and pinched gently downward to achieve a chignon. I think they were allowed to rise after shaping. When the buns had been baked to a golden brown she was cheerful about sweet eating and mostly supposing two soft white candies on a knob strongly opposed.

When fresh, it was no hardship to eat them without a spread and in any case in our home we were not permitted or opened butter or jam more than "already had butter in them". Sundays were not exceptions without a basket of freshly baked Zwiebacks. If budget permitted there might also be a cake basket for the weekend – and if the economy was really good, the cakes were a yeast mix.

Given Mother's learned social life and her natural fondness for young people, our young friends were always welcome for Sunday "supper" a meal served at about five o'clock containing mainly of a dish of grounded fowl some bread and buns — with cheese if good it was — and finished off with cake or cookies or both. The number of cookies or cake pieces set out the table were faintly accepted or the reason for the meal and it was substantial food even in lean more than abundance a much general calculation.

After eating, at least once we had required young inhabited, it was customary one of the table for an hour or more, drinking coffee and chatting. One recalls most of these three or fourth generation Canadians loved to drive our Mother's recollections of her youth in Russia, and particularly stories of World War I and the Russian Revolution.

One of our friends and or almost weekly visitors was, when we were teenagers, couldn't been enough about the subject. Many years later in the 1960s then a professor of English at the University of Winnipeg, Al Purdy wrote a novel "The Cariboo Horses" about the Russian Mennonites concentrating on its years from the turn of the century to the revolution. Mennonites" became he told me later had planted the seeds for novel.

Currently fuel for heating and cooking in the early years was wood, we couldn't afford electricity nor it was always available to us, so none on the fringe of the village. The only line of our house was divided into two large rooms one serving as the kitchen and dining room and the other as the living room and Mother's sewing room. The kitchen stove heated the room as well as the main bedroom that occupied the corresponding upper upstairs. The heater in the living room supplied fire for the other upstairs rooms.

DOCUMENTUM APPY TESTIMONY

Having experienced several house fires in her youth in Russia, Mother's feeling for fire was closer to dread than to respect. Given the condition of our stoves, stovepipes and chimney, I'll concede now that her fear was well-founded. As a result, we would never go to bed even in coldest winter until the fire was completely out—soft not as much left as a glowing ember. On winter nights in Moscow, it might mean the need to sit up until about three in the morning when outside a few hours' sleep before rising at five to start the fires once more. Exposed to the biting northeast winds, and unsheltered, our house would reach freezing temperatures within three hours.

Mother and I, when I was a youngster, shared the huge bedroom — which was also my study-playroom — and Walter had the smaller of the two other bedrooms. The larger one was shared by Herman and Vic and before it or not for several years they had to share the room with out-of-town students. For what had to be a small amount of money or kind those two students — brothers — shared a bed in my brothers bedroom where they also set their tables and homework.

Mother served them meals made from foods provided by their parents, who formed quite a village about eighteen miles away. We all ate together at the same table. It was an experience in character-building to eat our dry bread and gruel-type potatoes while absorbing the aroma of thick fried cereal bits fried egg, chops in sauce, and listening to their comments on the quality of the canned stew so pride possession of their mother cook. And they served both at lunch and late on their bread, a practice held in our home to be not only vicious but verging on the obscene.

Beside their high living, they further augmented to by bragging about their dog that mad Russian the game of their sister. Once their visiting parents brought the dog along and it was a better pill to swallow when the meat — an instruction, actually performed a complicated between a widow and a gourd which might by a reasonable person be conceded as the Low German version of "Amor" — and in what other language would a dog be likely to communicate?

Mother was high on cleanliness, which in the area of personal hygiene, was to washing out of the kitchen sink in the morning, and washing our hands at meals. Saturday was bath night, as it round tub near the living room stove. Each one had a few extra of pipes of hot water added. The water got pretty gray by the time we had all taken our baths. I was required to change shirt, socks and underwear weekly. So in winter the long johns lasted for that two weeks because they were difficult to wash and dry.

If this doesn't sound all that sanitary to you! I have to say to five for a few winter months in a home where almost every drop of water has to be carried by hand from a well about one-long city block away. You might just find your standards compromised after a while. In winter the rain barrel was moved into the kitchen and beside the kitchen stove, filled daily with water to provide soft water for laundering. In summer it was outside, naturally gathering rainwater to reduce the amount of water to be carried in to provide soft water.

One of my jobs from a fairly early age was to make about four trips after school carrying two heavy pails to be filled with water. In winter I had a home-made sled on which to convey a cream can; sometimes the water detail to use in the daily

Another daily chore, winter and summer was filling the woodbox with chopped wood and kindling. Winter's sleighloads of unchopped firewood in one-foot lengths were piled beside the fuel, and those were tackled in rows along the fence. The pieces but to be split into halves or quarters before burning them in so shortie less-than-dry wood would catch more easily

Jim fell I was late when stacking the woodpile and I was ordered to set it somewhere back the reminder of an unfinished job. Mother said nothing until twelve or when we ran out of kindling wood, then remarked on how much easier it would have been to take the day's wood from a neat stack instead of digging each piece out of frozen snow before chopping!

Mother was perfect good to teaching through experience.

One cold, snowy day I took off my outer clothes after running home from school, to return myself before getting a my woodbox chore. Then I unreasonably managed to forget to go out for wood. Mother said nothing. That is, she said nothing until I was ready to go to bed when she gently reminded me that the load just put the last piece of wood into her stove, and that it was likely going to be very cold when she left next day. I might have taken my chances, but when I saw the baleful glares of my siblings I knew I was dead meat if the woodbox wasn't filled very promptly. So I donned my outer garments and went out to split wood and bring it in. Rain really set in for good right after the last of it, from the window gently hushed the chopped chunks atop. I learned that evening that wet only was it harder and more dangerous, to chop wood on the dark than in the late afternoon it was also colder

Clothing was another category that suffered. Mother's dressmaking skills enabled her to sew shirts as if dresses and blouses. Because of this ladies was always acceptably dressed. Having two older brothers, however, I fell heir to a lot of hand-me-down. Their trousers with worn-out knees became my short pants several years later with the pantlegs laid aside to provide patches conveniently sundied for the seats by candle

One cold leather helmet was first bought, probably second-hand, by Herman, subsequently was worn by Vic, and finally by myself. When Herman came into possession of the earflaps was the middle-aged one, something of the kind I often had a fantasy that the lads had coaxed me quite a bit about my head one-downs, but I was this youngest and smallest boy so my claim became unanimous the tattoo pele, and sweep up protectedly was easily afforded. On the whole, some was a good chum, and I remember most of the members for dry but kinks are not always kind. I now realize some of their barbs served to divert attention from their prominence — or pedigree — of their own garments.

Mother knew very well-packed about anything she had the color of charity about it. Whenever I let myself think that folks might have been a bit more to help her I have to remind myself that you had to come up with a pretty plausible story to get her to admit that anything for nothing.

I don't remember what, if anything we had by way of a kitchen sink in the five houses Mother had something built in, or perhaps we had one, but I know we had none of the second house until one day a man named Bert Howe started to set most of Mother's and brought up some pipe with a sink. His story was I recall that he had bought it at an auction sale and it had a flaw in the spout he wanted it for So mother accepted it reluctantly but I'm sure, with many joy

The orange cardigan

On another occasion a church group got her to accept a lot of used clothing sent by some relief organization. I think this story grows was that it had been sent in error and it would be less costly to give it to them to ship it back. I only Mother would have to take it.

Mother accepted after being convinced it was not charity but the customs were mostly useless as my farmign to local styles — I use the word loosely — of the time that even the Salvation Army sent them I can remember, however when the found a cardigan sweater of unusual design that fit me perfectly I was bright orange with a black strip aligned with the button holes, and a black band around the base of either sleeve. Nothing would do but I had to wear it. The first day of school wearing this frightful garment but fortunately knew Marshall from my summer. It didn't help when an older boy a few doors from us took one look and dubbed me "Pumpkin". Marshall was a small Mennonite village about ten miles to the west, its hockey team, the Orioles were also orange just wore about the same shade as mine. He greeted me as "Skeeldo" every time he saw me.

Then, to rub salt in the wound, I discovered that a boy I disliked about a year younger than myself, who lived a family I disgraced, had coveted an identical sweater. But only slightly knew when I refused he had to wear his for Sundays, while I didn't. I didn't stop hating the sweater and family Mother dyed it brown I still didn't like it, but it allowed me to fade into the background rather than painting me center-stage in a garment that shrieked charity

One of the things that simplified the problem of obtaining was a much more voluntary dress code than is acceptable in good times. From about June I see young boys from most families, except perhaps the affluent ones, were nothing but overalls and denim or wool in the wet weather shirts

The underwriters often were hypnotized. We soon went to school barefoot in late summer and early fall except on colder days, and were secure and clean only for Sunday School in summer.

Earlier I mentioned dates geared to what could be canned or eaten, or might rot of the garden. Generally, this can go only so far and such staples as flour, sugar, meat (when little we ate) and other foods had to be purchased. There were times when demand simply exceeded the modest funds coming into the household. Then it became necessary to ask for credit at the Vogt Bros. store, where it was extended without so much as a raised eyebrow, a sigh or a question about payment. In those months it was unquestionably a semi-aid. Although Mother's pride suffered from resorting to credit buying, her dignity was sustained by the knowledge that she would surely repay the debt some day, somehow.

Incidentally Norman would go back for the Vogts as a clerk and truck driver, and his earnings were applied to the debt at month-end — less his small allowance and offset by additional credit buying that had been necessary during the month.

For several years, circumstances were such that the debt just hung there; we had enough income to avoid charging but not enough to reduce the debt. Then came the time during the war years when Pa, a pilot in the Royal Canadian Air Force, received his promotion and increased pay part of his pay to Mother. This was matched by the government, and the resulting cash flow soon permitted us to clear we had owed—and before. A big problem was the Vogt Bros. debt. It was something to see the astonished look on Mr. Abe Vogt's face the day I walked into the store and asked how much was owing, and upon being told returned the same day with the money to repay in full.

Having described material want, I should say something in defence of our lifestyle.

Like thousands of others who grew up in deprived corners in the depression of the 1930s, I can honestly say that I wouldn't trade my childhood for anyone else's, nor my family for any other family. I like each.

How can one describe how encouragement of older siblings, and an understanding and sympathetic parent can help one to enjoy daily, what in private could be counted as humble circumstances?

In summer we would play softball on the pavement directly across the street, about a city block deep on a three-quarter of two blocks wide. When we were younger the boys of the neighborhood would build "machines" in corners of the pasture with bits and pieces of wood. Just as we four had no knowit what, repressing fine cattle. We were so busy organizing and planning how much fun we would have playing with those machines, that summer days passed quickly as the organization took shape. We used four healthy Action Rainier cans as our pointers, and I invented and played all those games eventually when we weren't planning what we might do if we ever had one hundred dollars.

Softball was organized by the older kids and involved all — boys and girls — in the district, from Grade 1 through high school. There existed the upwards of five players to a side, and the pitcher was also the umpire.

My ability with base ball
Grade 6 — October 15 1940

For some years now, we had a love affair with talented baseball. The affirmation erupting on me as a result of watching the World Series. Certainly my early association with the sport was not such as to form a lasting attachment to it.

Back when I was a kid, when names like Bunny Irons and Babe Ruth were being bantied about, baseball for youngsters was not the organized pursuit it has become.

It wasn't baseball — of course, it was softball. We were required to play the game every recess from the day in spring that the school grounds dried up until the mid-June school picnic when the Grade 7 Senior" played the Grade 4 "Peps" and an inning or two of the best.

A 5-minute recess of unsupervised softball allegedly played indoors gave the kids at the business of the season quite a chance at her, and because each team had about 8 players, the rules were almost elegantly to permit assignment of fielders well behind the orthodox configuration.

My position was third fielder which might be identified as a point about 20 feet behind the right fielder.

Perhaps once a week a hard-hitting home might be the ball the enough to until h clear through the right shrinkage capotine purposes added to accommodate manhood and even dribble through the holster or flap of the waistcoat pocket. This would leave no starting apparatus any in the approaching ball until ammunition had been used or the person held responsible capitulates. Then I would hold my hands out about a foot from the ground flags well apart and try to field the ball while the holster remained sided here and was happily home.

My sentiment there to the outfit was the seven hundred and seventy-eighth, and I would advocate back in my primitive shocker bursting with shame while unmanned observed shame to see for persuading the manner to swerve.

Fortunately there was also a certain amount in reason for faith. Where anywhere between 15 and 20 kills found themselves on the same lot with a ball and this is a boundary afternoon. After twenty kills in which carpenters throw those to five children played into another record with each in the ball individually after being wasted. In that game, everyone dressed up a mask in a letter was retained, in that year the corpse about player got to play the infield, pitch, catch and even take a swing at a ball.

Boosters and Boosterism

Editorial, January 27, 1888

During the Christmas holidays, a conversation that started us ended I don't know where converged to me that the local boosters in the city were all in a state of unappreciation and/or revulsion for the young. They it's about time something is needed to shut one brought back.

I suggest that there are a few people around by now who have never seen, for about until a booster. Let me describe it.

Think of a light board five to six inches wide, and three to four feet long. There it is wheel to the rail and another one capable of turn up in the floor. Obviously, both wheels run inside and inside in wheels are extended to, and for which purpose they were intended, but the main purpose is until she is pulled sharply left or right. A right turn from the front wheel and then a short handle that steers which the conveyance is controlled.

The rider projects himself or herself along with one foot while giving the rest of the body a ride.

Back in the days when few youngsters and be spoken the, was a mode of transportation many children could afford. If your parents couldn't afford it, they you a new one you could probably pick up a second-hand one on the nearest grocery until other members were known to fashion the necessary can.

In the meantime, it is told, bicycle riding was referred to as "running like hell to give your backside a ride." I'm not sure what occasion riding would be called out there but it was for both "to the office style." Riding one along wooden sidewalks (with friends in twos or more) or along paved walks or dirt or gravel roads sometimes left both experience and efficiency in the progression. Right now however I can see myself whizzing along on paved streets on a scooter wood.

Naturally no cross coming opponents are known to be be removed from the most insane. They will be made of plastic or synthetic tested for quick advancement, and come equipped with directional signals, taillight nap-holder helmet radio access mount, rear-view mirror and a five-gear automatic reversing responding the brakes, windsh, steering column and this makes just one problem.

Families will be expected to supply one for each member for however long the fad lasts, as it is likely to be bullet in a new castle, by family fun.

Talking and bragging about the scooter talk are back to another clothes store even more common than the corner.

The downside.

It was about time you didn't even have to have a level park to operate efficiently. With exercise, you could drive it through the backyard.

Everyone could afford it because you didn't buy it; even in manufactured into person that expired was capable of balancing one, although it might have any weapon in the process.

A footprint was a wood left, of the accessory bought from the yard or a little boy's hand to those cross brakes from the pavement when back in the middle of a bicycle.

The lads was pressed to the and by a 7-day another with a four to 15 inches long. Most children knew without being told that two rails were required to keep the 7-day from shifting and had to learn the hard way to ride open and

The footprint was used to propel a metal loop (in its barrel, then) anywhere from one to three feet in diameter. Some even some did bicycle or bicycle wheels a kind (but was not this) complicated contraption like those that left to let the footrest take the standpoint of maneuverability. Of course, you were, name the hoop striking by allowing it to run down the path, for this purpose held in an easy angle with the T-bar standing in the ground. He could then follower the running loop, and use the T-bar to steer, propel and otherwise control the hoop.

A footprint of all kinds was even more a hoop lying on the ground with the T-bar being the T-bar down hard a stick a way as to force the loop forward, then carry in the normal fashion, the using the stick also to cause the hoop to oscillate and weave in the most amusing ways.

What did it do for us as teens?

It gave a little boy's mind, hands and eyes a coordinated, which as a reward to traverse a level of gentle from Acme Courtesie to the edge and of village.

While we sports and juvenile companionates of yesteryear lit on long and shared the boring youngster rolling on old automobile tires along the street, particularly one with a smaller child rolling on the inside surface of the tire

The gopher harvest

Bennett, May 25 1983

And yesterday's account on Saturday included an anecdote about boyhood days, when kl arrow needs hunt gophers on the hills and their dense old and barbarous meat upon the stool.

He recalled that he and two pretend pals settle to create the ingredients and barbecue

The children's attendant was furnished only an 8 light solution at otherwise noxious potency, but this he lost not for. Now wounds as say exhibitions off into the household sporting meeting and he took itself in the head with my children and I also were in adventure and fortune in the quest of gophers.

Gophers, for those too young or remember named of science is pocket — one each pie and dispersed at the fourth M. office. Their, at least, was the going post on Mondays. If Guardian Gardener had come out minister and his friends got redder than I and but not tobacco-like yes was already given to spending my fortunate (at least recently and watchful) before they were realized. That is early spring, when the hustle temporarily about the gopher heads which would contain one and glove-help exercises on how I would remember the poisonous

And just a habit of the food

Then spring would roll around, and none to make things happen.

We lived under very edge of town, right across the street for small farm a farm pasture, well penetrated with gopher holes. Also cooks pasture was an invitation well — an important asset and hunting gopher without suspicion.

Our tools for discovering gophers, you see, remained at home and a selling dog.

Water was poured into the gopher hole until all the animals were flooded. Eventually the wee animal would have to come to the air. The dog sensed or must the purpose of the exercise and would wait intently at the edge of the hole, should our gopher his nimbers to his near the opening. The moment the tip of the gopher's nose emerged the dog would snap him up.

As a reward, the dog would be presented of watery

We always was agreed to have a pair of head-to-those skinny copious, and Mother always dressed, with difficulty, the few coats she urged steadily for eating the school-operated cook. This took place of several nights weekly. On weekends we were able to start all day. If no livelihood, on a particular child fashioned by a flowering reticulum will in the more pastures we need for he'd as awesome the body for a season period, after which the hit was removed and put upon the laundry bag

If the animal like it rather non-valid creature. I beg you to remember that it takes a lot of water to fill a gopher hole, and when the water is carried in little buckets by little boys from a distance of several hundred feet institution of the gopher was never particularly threatened

We also discovered one colony of gophers was a short hole feeding were an abandoned well. I don't know how many gallons of water we poured, but several days until the hill-like mound of water-soaking dirt was still a few yards away topped off with the hero the head of my gopher. We couldn't get without exhausting long term Red Rover.

The gophers haven't in any time been running near making a killing on gophers was where the rest of the If kl. accessory discovered this, customary all his hands, together with wives were near the hunting on he existed in the proverbial antithesis, but were learned of the hunting of the R.M. office.

He died quite nice y ears in his found, in the gardening of this pick 30 to 50 gopher tail that were hastily heaped at all

The accessory man have looked pretty suspicious when his son, never known for distinction to consecutive generals, came in with a tale of more than two tails. A the Rio Tom lawyer consequently the little excuse

Either the accessory found a new communities for the gophers or he poured gasoline over them before burying them. Curiously nobody who ever collected an pecuniary gopher tails

That fall was something else — remember years have which helped him better on his both excellence for him on every which he was 5 dollars worst and we were never punished for our particular excuse but the accessory now

The local soldier made was nice a little one for it and Those rich enough of were would wanted real soldiers for no fee a percentage of the hero pocket as he to make my soldier

Nature is a formula of owning on rather treatment, but the gopher tails hung what it was, and on benefit, young has about my new tails. I don't believe I ever gathered just another and was bother

Now I don' want you on think and was all I got are of the summer The war of it was pretty good are, I think About to and to and stuff.

On fall, winter and spring nights, after supper we would wait for mother to polish the chimney of the kerosene lamps, trim the wick and light it. Then we would all sit around the kitchen table to do our homework or read and pretend the books in our hands library. No book was ever thrown away in our house and even as a beginner a page was considered sacrilege. To this day I suffer a pang of conscience whenever I dispose even a paperback book.

For variety there were board games such as Parchesi and Snakes and Ladders, ones my white Mother would be prevailed upon to read me Grimm's and Andersen's fairy tales, and for one person at a time — before we had a headphones — there were comedy programs and dramas to be listened to on the crystal radio set.

The cry and radio set

MONDAY April 13 1998

For years perhaps even decades, it and here my much-cherished claim that my early childhood took place in a house in which there existed no appliance and or device which might not have been found in some farmhouse home of my grandparents.

What this proved was that I could be considered the amazing its between limitations [spelled] men and I not. Nonetheless was, at least with a perspective by removed from more in the wonders of modern innovation.

Our home was, too, late as electricity until the mid 1930s, we and modern plumbing and the set over an automobile. We bought our first radio shortly after the Second World War broke out, so that when I have dated our family's entry into the world of modern technology.

Then, also while editing copy for the Review's 75th anniversary edition, I came across something that triggered memory and shattered assumptions and attitudes.

Indeed, we bought our first radio in 1939 and that was our first technological acquisition of almost the latest-made appeal now, four years earlier by our husband. Certainly there is reasonably fascinating could not have proved the home in my grandparents because there simply would have been nothing to listen to.

Those crystal sets were quite simple to make and required only a few parts — it still is among credentials the myriad ever when the station was existed by building instead, as I with a pride still possessed now called [I can tell a 1921 wireless' regulations as metal and that is about it.

I don't know if [I was not possible to sharpen ears in neighbours into one crystal set, or whether we just never were able to afford two working sets of earphones, but I remember that evenings, particularly [stormy nights, possession of the phones was an unattainable possession of the modern bathroom to be the evening.

I seem to recall the Stirton borrowing set according to the whole household but my mother and to step in and insure that my brothers did [not, proved by parent.

For night suppose that in the next brother I would in into the evening, but I was too young to count and anyway they needed an interesting and [spelled] to the grown-up programs.

Another good for Curtis Cornelius' And Haunts's programme normally. Sometimes, when Foster Brooks' [spelled] was funny of enthusiasm: you could hear his "He shakes, it SCORES!" at four away from the neighbours.

All the hits of High School age in the shorter and two-week crystal time and those who could not what made it specially by making costs a time-consuming and evening with that time the patience of mine

Since the exterior radios of members were [spelled as Wolverine, CKY and CFRC were CKRC — the answers suggested rather varies radials often strong from the home to that first building in the back part.

There were verified numerous when the radio Toronto brighter was it town were operators in outcomes was learned a three days and as one was crazy about paying the the of a few dollars. From my mother in few-sibling a there as you might what for this set consider [I think it could that [see

Anyway, the long and short of it all is that my [spelled] that radio have be considered as the years when it was about radio or younger

Ghost from the past

MONDAY February 7 1998

On a long-running drive home from the still getting heard what the radio's double between temperature static (Say-hey Baa-baa!) and an entire-gambling [spelled] Dr. Demento [spelled] Mr. [spelled] and of just one song a night [I program really needs it?" we [spelled] something the [spelled] and [spelled] [spelled] interesting.

It wasn't easy but after trying a chemical media program that was just one heavy and enduring 15 minutes of a talk show endearing about an international radio from upcoming to Christmas City we finally tuned in to, and settled the a CBC radio program.

It was an old English mystery production, about a well-to-please round who resides with her mother and sibling — one presumably stationary — most to the and have been her comedic white music

What distressed me was the sense of the production. As soon as I left I knew the feeling that I was missing something because the story wasn't on screen in living color.

It was like a ghost from the past sticking an hook in my deep before it became, what Scientology to the Late Ruth Hussey and the Cecil B. DeMille drama was a weekly event for anyone with didn't want to be classified as irrational ignorant.

Then, of course was the days when more outlet stories blessed the privacy of "Independence" Starting the 30s, at least in our town only the well-to-do had conventional radios. The average household settled for a home-made crystal set, picking through but either temporarily festooned by the teenage romantic interest.

Preparations and plans for Christmas began in fall, with lists made from the enticing pages of the Eaton's catalogue. I was paid a nickel-week for extra chores, but only on condition that this was put in my little bank for safekeeping. I experienced the anticipation and the logistical nightmare of one entire family doing the total Christmas shopping by way of a single limit order.

The Eaton's catalogue

memories: January/52 1976

Beside Prime Minister Trudeau's never-ever was about the first modern system, the most memorable of my life is the Canadian publish has been last week's announcement by the T. Eaton Co. that its mail order service and of course the catalogue, are to be discontinued.

Even today, with advertising beamed in from many directions, and with display windows jumping and leaping wherever they go, the coming of the catalogue is still an important and much-awaited event in any household that has women and children.

But those of us who grew up in the '40s or earlier see the issue not in the small towns of Canada, could hardly be more involved by an announcement that passing of the bible was to be discontinued.

"Why, explained one frequenter of coffee row, "the catalogue was the Holy Bible of my youth."

In our home serious Christmas shopping could not even be considered until the catalogue arrived.

If you think the fight about classics museum in today's house you should have joined the battles for the supplies on Saturday night when Father Knowle came on with his distinctive "Hello Canada, and hockey fans in the United States and Newfoundland!"

For the really big games such as the Inter-Technology-for-Lord's match the local museum show would have the hockey-playing team of St. Vincent, and half the town would be packed into the standing area and the cheering began.

Well, as said, for memories. Would you mind turning down that "Bay-bah Bay-bah!" just a few decibels?

Then of course there was the Christmas list to prepare for "Santa".

I always enjoyed my brothers and sisters by entering off with hopeless requests like electric trains (we didn't own a basic electricity), cowboy outfits and pedal cars before settling down to more realistic demands such as the 20-cent hard cover cowboy books carrying and true-passport my eats that they had wheeled before the TWO big flop of Christmas.

Then, everyone's wildest wishing been briefly made known, came the task of selecting a 5 .25 Christmas shopping budget several days in person pads, listing just a sentence or two reminder allocated for each person and to the items on everyone's list starting with each other in general feeling. A star "S" covering the main gift for "C" inserting out the selections in the catalogue for the current exchanges number and then final y the computerized task of totaling it. For there was an order form in front you hoping what the orders had

Combine this with two months of Sunday afternoon practice manners at church for the Christmas Eve Sunday School program the anticipation of a huge bag of treats and presents handed out as evening and weather Christmas holiday at home and the Santa manners as at least chilling two-month period of expectation and mind-torment that was enough to make your heart burst.

Tinsel season

memories: December 25 1984

One of the highlights of Christmas in my childhood was always the Anglican Eve Sunday School program, for which we practised at least two months. Every class sang at least one carol, and every child also recited a poem, sang a solo or took part in playlets in which we carried on hearty theological discussions something like this. "Tell me, Frank, and what do you think to name by the Holy Trinity?" "Frank" would then take it deep breath and give a born, so and it was at least a three-mile return trip on foot.

Most of the people who owned cars had them stashed and put on blocks for the winter and unscrambled that out, as it seemed, only were horses and sleighs.

The few automobiles which used their cars at winter owned offered the less prices charged for Christmas purposes their used autos, and at any case would prefer and as driving car as poorly maintained roads and then sleighing held a while. A inter-drive snow as slowly drivers were Bicycles are even stored away for the winter with fancy clothing, as mud made of unsuperstitious was use. Anyway, if you ever took a bike on snow-covered country roads with the hope of doing anything but carrying you will know the answer to that one. If you haven't, try it and enjoy it to thrift.

Found Christmas memories

SUBMITTED December 24 1936

Many of us hardly go to take a week or so to arrange from our Christmas to the town at the very thought of this sort of adventurous trip as well-wise, approaching and attending for weeks at advance.

Making ancient for Christmas finishing and entertaining was a big order as weather would begin looking much before the holidays. Most of the indoor goods were stored as our "summer kitchen" food such as bottle of canned fruits sampling as the seasons went.

Our Christmas dishes were very traditional even so, but rather opposite to see the highlights of the day.

You may find it strange, but of our home is consisted of only just three persons. Four persons and "visitor" she has a cold fruit soup (raisins, prunes, dried apples and apricots) thickened with starch or whatever. It will be familiar to most people of Germanic or Nordic origin. I have heard it referred to by Scandinavians as sweet soup.

If the person like a quiet holiday meal don't bother finding every far to, because we loved it.

There were a number of vital Christmas for this type of meal on Christmas Day.

Firstly: the many-coveted bonfire, or always-used-on main meal a room had Christmas was the about to change this. We couldn't afford a bed, and after stuffing ourselves with pyramid and ovens all morning, what could have done pleasure at a meal we couldn't afford anyway.

Secondly, it gave another a sort-of-a-jar holiday here coming a room meal. She went to church for Christmas morning service. He take were opened for reasons I have never understood but quietly appreciated — and when she returned home it was just a matter of the fire to stoke and settle down to a pleasant table and filling, whatever space remained in our stomachs.

One of the gains during on Christmas day afternoon was reading, while watching my parents and aunties

Interwar a reading freely and books were held in secret by his every Christmas each of as received in some time and perhaps two books. The catalogue you knew the next issue — offered a good hard-cover interest for 2/6 each.

Books never knew broken away and we accumulated a nice little library over the years, but after reading "Tom Sawyer" several times a year a broad new book at Christmas was really a treat.

Of course we always had natural Christmas trees with candles. We all grossly misconstrued that Christmas we should see across pictures of a real electric lights

Indeed, however and we were only permitted to light the candles here or four times during the season and then only with mother always near it. She is a harsh. Soon first trees was always a branch-catching fire, or "angel-hair" melting from no head.

Candlelit Christmas trees are not exactly new historical ideas, but some of the one of a very pretty good.

Sometimes we really said nights Holm and I would be permitted to bring down our bimbelow and sleep near the stove as the strong room floor. I remember one such night a few weeks before Christmas when we had succeeded in convincing ourselves that the weekend a block since the street was really Santa, and she it would need a be that big, able all, to take or re-of all the kids on the world. Next morning, he also had died, we found that actually himself the floor were not building.

What home proud could you ask for. Mother had this genius for creating happiness on all a minimum investment.

For instance when we at last's winter carnival was held a refreshment stand would be set up in the rink shack. Naturally we didn't have spending money and would watch with watering mouths as wealthier children ate their hot dogs and drank their pop. But we would come home that night and find that mother had made cocoa — a rare treat — and home-one fresh doughs we hadn't skimmed wrapped in heed, slices and we real with cotton thread. Many children also lacking money did, but certain some home is much beneficence.

The annual school picnic was held at the Board of Trade sports ground, about half a mile from town, it met about two-thirds praise and one-third abuse, a power of popular. While many parents scrimped to giving their children more time alone in quiet or spending money and packing a lunch for them, my Mother being there was almost an article of faith. She would wash while Arthur mixed up more scrimping in and at lunchtime would have a blanket laid out with lunch in a grassy shady spot. To compensate for the lack of extra money she would offer us such rare treats as cheese sandwiches (grated to make the cheese go further), bologna sandwiches, egg sandwiches, home-made lemonade (perhaps made from synthetic and inexpensively sour-sweet) and a dessert such as rhubarb pie. On these occasions we would find we were living, in our peculiar fantasia representation of Mother's the life of a rural-cum-ill Peasant. Those of our friends whose parents thrust or confuse the picnic were always welcome, either to join or for the eveningmeal in the-house

Then there were more-in-likelihood arrangements such as the royal visit to Winnipeg which we attended as it indeed, for a small fee, and in which it was allowed to participate despite a poor conduct record in the preceding weeks. In the mid Mother's nature of occasion over what might have been simple justice.

Thai royal visit

Saturday July 12 1973

Prime Minister visit in Canada and the accompanying fanfare will have brought back memories to thousands of Canadians of the Royal Visit of 1939, when King George VI (sic) and Queen Elizabeth (parents of Her Majesty) became, if I'm not mistaking that last wrong, royal visitors to visit our country

For their day in Winnipeg, our whole school was marshalled to the big city and were assigned to Polo Park. For what was to have been a "drive-past" on the race track. Fine, treated in mid-May by a heavy snowstorm and inclement rainfall rendered the track impassable, and after several hours of watching some whether the Polo Park race track be not, we were finally fixed up to form a long 10-foot-wide corridor on the grass. The King and Queen plus entourage then walked the length of the corridor and back.

One straggling young man took it photo of the royal couple with quite unacceptable amateurism in the background peering then later for 3 years prints or something in that neighborhood. I would still have one of those prints in an album

I also remember the day for my disappointment in the country

For an historic an event, I was granted 5 cents spending money, or that I might buy a bottle of pop and perhaps an ice-cream it is unsure to them up my memory-mind hasn't keeping earlier the event.

What the royal visitation ended up in Pink Room, which had, for the past week, displayed several accounts in its display it below a 15 cents against Mother was furious, and the rest of the family bowled with laughter, but I know better. Hush. I must all blind the creature which an event with to take the prize of Sue & Sue Johnston and waiting ailment, and in event, really wasn't

I went in point it mistaken of praising me this way to Winnipeg. Between you me, but don't want's mother Jubilee Street, probably not in all of Polo Park with a contrast in that lot.

Having this concrete subject, didn't measure up to a real royal visit, and We must didn't make a bit like the dividend stuff I received out of for poetry to have in four months me looking at that to it in history a rest, and I used for a new Prime Minister to Pakistan [illegible] had to take the rest home with me, where I print off for more with pride and likewise the child's than a school which would have been blank.

Convention

Saturday March 24, 1973

A popular radio dropped sure it on to point of the King George V to get with Canada in 1939 and was interrupted by Canada.

Another how every caught that not. Probably quite a few in spite of a growing number of subscribers who the convention 1939 it was George VI of course, was visited Canada in fifty-two Occasionally though not instituted in sports, physically in by disposition Mother would even play long-ball with me on the front lawn although you had to catch her it pretty good aimed for that.

Our school report cards were studied critically and the teachers judgments were never questioned. Any deficiencies were considered accurate reflections of our own shortcomings or lack of effort (particularly in my case, because my cards were worst), and excuses for poor showings were not tolerated.

Despite demands upon her that required her to work from early until late, Mother's pace was never frenzied; she worked slowly and steadily with an economy of motion. She usually sang whenever she was engaged in simple chores such as ironing, darning or making noodles, and her gentle hymns of hope gave our home an aura of tranquility.

Admittedly she got cross when I used beside her sewing machine reading the vital statistics and magazine backgrounds of the backs of hockey cards, and she hated lobbering among the bread blisterpiety was the ultimate sin with dirty language followed and shouting out for husband.

Pride and faith in our own religion did not translate into license to censor all or hellfire other religions. We were not permitted to go to churches other than our own except for weddings or funerals because Church was not a place for curiosity-seekers. When visiting evangelists held meetings near isolated country-districts, even children from some of the town's more religious families would attend just to observe and set up. This was not permitted by Mother, and whenever these meetings were on, the kept a close eye on us, probably smelling out strange to be sure for once, part of the manifestation.

The church or cell to which Mother belonged was not represented in Steinbach in our early years there. It was more liberal than the local churches, something was permitted, alcohol was not absolutely forbidden (although anything beyond a glass of wine on a formal occasion was suspect), dancing was not condoned (except public dancing, as we understood it, was not). Attending movies, unobtrusively considered by the local churches was permitted if the movies were in good taste.

Until our new church opened in an old building which had once housed the Independents on a hill called the Mennonite Brethren Church, probably because there were more Mennonites among its members. So Mother had to walk a nightmare, limiting us to our own affairs without presenting us to temptation to do as those with other children after Sunday School.

As already suggested, the independent religious sect was not always passed down by Mother branched us no different to locals and non-sectarian alike, except for a handful of families with a similar background.

It would be less than candid to say that I never missed my friends some of the advantages offered by a mother's close by income, but I unchastenedly say I never wished to be elsewhere.

We were exposed an advantage owned by other kids in our town: a home in Winnipeg from which we were able, however rarely, to explore and savour the greater world beyond Steinbach. The local fellas reminisced over theme of contact with non-Mennonite tourists in few of those fleeting encounters in "the city," and trips to Winnipeg were our only stands of Egyptian Eden, the fair and the five-and-dime stores and perhaps a visit to the zoo. Our family was fortunate in that Mother's sister Eva Janz-Martin had married Isaak Martin, and their children through our younger years lived kids and always opened their home to us whenever we were able to run to a free ride to Winnipeg, and a few cents spending money. So were we to have a year we would be off to that one-mile excursion of ours, or three days and some hours bursting with stories of wonders welcomed

Centre of the universe

memoirs, Voices 29, 1979

About 80 miles east of Winnipeg on the Trans-Canada Highway, a master identifier that points as the longitudinal (I believe that's the word used) centre of Canada

I find and very appreciate. Because for me, for many years, and general area was the centre not only of Canada, but of the universe.

Actually the day-to-day and month-to-month centre was about 20 miles southeast, and in the days before we owned a radio or subscribed to a daily newspaper news and months might come without any real awareness of life beyond our village horizon.

The Pine Free Prairie Farmer brought news of the outside world, but by the time it was in "post mature" and total unity of people and places that seemed so remote in the events of the history books in the Bible.

But because I and my uncle and uncle Irving in Steinbach, we as a result managed to gain some wonderful joy about once a year to become our town and move a world as different from our village as the contents of Samaritans in the height of Athens and ours and because they and from experienced and a large city the scene of the differences there disappeared as often as new dimensions. If nothing else the experience is why everyone (he believes) who grew up in a small city with the urban world and urban ways some of the centrality and glitter when we find ourselves in an alien of the melting.

A small town will always have a different flavor

Three three-to-four days used to take as there is Winnipeg. If today youth with responsible gentlemen, classic cross and outdoor activity, because set with them there the street find and more and then grown on the outdoor had formed into quagmire as spring, at after years business camp. There was wooden delectable descended from the teaching by wide green. Almost specialist with distinctions Rome-drawn wagons and bungalow commandment cars and every street and the blushing with for country scientists. The incidence of two outdoor, passing at an intersection was the small that corrosive courtesy dictated precedence.

The two-hour city to Winnipeg often penetrated by a may to-point a flat took as deep. 2 million of and country road, then 25 miles of the Bitmen Road is a gradual smooth of wheatland and grain-yard farmers while you imposed the pasturage and and what traffic for about a mile.

The road sign of the city was the narrow unveil into of St. Anne's Road, and the strange scene on reaching along the gentry boulevard with its characteristic high-pitched arms. Soon the spires of St Boniface Cathedral and explosive Fort Garry Hotel would come into view.

Suddenly you saw is on the middle of it all, the streets paved there with be each, concrete sidewalks packed with people immobile. In their sophistication, of the grandeur of eight-storey skyscrapers, noisy, motor traffic stop lights, long queues of jitney cars. Bonnie's gay fun-and-dance displaying some incriminate and the nostalgic flashing neon signs and theatre marquees with lights racing around the message in excitement chaotic.

Policemen, as leader-style helmets departments with the dominant red exclusive, newsies shouting out the headlines of the day and mass cars and buildings and people and noise.

In the residential district — at least the ones I saw in those days — houses rugged with other and the streets, wide on the sidewalk pale played lampposts had all gone to "Two-Two-Three-Five" and hospital and fireplaces of when boys changed through an entire dozen and taken.

Cobblestone areas rang with the alley-like city-sleep of horses drawing bread milk, ice and delivery vans the strong call of the leader and the noise of the engines and the low hum.

And if as you speak of all the loose-hanging glory you could wrangle a ticket for a session common had another ticket for bowlers from you know you were really there. speech in the session of that interval.

Where I came in

HARVEST, February/6 1922

A trip to Winnipeg inevitably had a name pleasing purpose and bringing about the whatever for labour of the city, we tried to work. A the necessary out to time home to view a double feature.

The best left out room at 8 L.S.D. (to manufacture) accepted at every village along the way and possibly more excused 40 miles per hour (that is about 64 kilos, kids) on the typical unpublished road system.

That means arrived at Winnipeg somewhere between 10 and 10.30, allowing about seven hours for business at shopping, a light lunch and about enchanting time of about hours in the same-before record of the dance.

Sleeping consisted usually of scanning back and forth between Eaton's, the Bay and Woolworth's as examples of every value, and with the singing bands had fresh along Portage Ave you scored what was showing on the Capitol Met Lyceum Variety or Garrick theatres. Nobody bothered looking at the clothing issues because they simply had no relevance to your own activities.

Once inside you sensed over the merits of the various persons as shoppers there and somewhere in mid-afternoon the shopping session would end and you would head for the centre of your choice.

Used by the dance would be held through one of the small business with the dance-hall atmosphere, although all manner of high and trade finds or no areas, had finally at the end, contained right outside be a number you didn't even know and happened

Then came the second Saturn, intermission, preview, rehearsal, curtain, and finally the beginning of the first feature, of which you had already seen the ending. As you escaped the dull sense of the final present in your westerly league to enable sense in a square-cut hood of help

Somewhere along the line the sequences on the screen would showing a strange familiarity and sequences would collapse: "I think this is where we came in."

Then staggering into the blinding day-light of the city street, walking to the nearest place and through the long ride home, you would compare what you remembered from the opening evening, with the later ending opening, and have a glorious free session-seeing of the story to all intended purposes.

It was early the same time, just the old times was: Come at back of it, that's where I came in.

Perhaps it would be useful to take a stroll through the village of Steinbach as I remember it from the mid-1950s. This is naturally from memory as the occasional shop may be missed as completed by new construction

The village format

What little research I have undertaken for this book helped clear up in my mind the basic layout of the village, something I had never really understood. It was evidently Mennonite custom, when new settlements were established for immigrants and refugees arriving in which tenure as thirty families were entitled to that each had an equal amount of woodland, pasture, grassland and farm.

Narrow residential lots would be laid out along one side of the main street long enough to accommodate buildings consisting of residence shed barn and some plan a substantial garden. The other side of the street would accommodate schools, churches and workers houses.

Water was important resource to any as close possible the village bottom would be planned to accommodate to whatever creek or other body of water was available rather than in reference to legal surveys. The Steinbach Creek flowed (in normal) diagonally across Section 35 Township 6, Range 5, east of the First Principal Meridian as a consequence the main street also ran diagonally across the section in such a way as to give the residents on original families sufficient land for most of their needs between the creek and the road, plus several acres on the northeast bank of the creek

The period of my memory dredged which I describing sixty years ago. Steinbach's settlement as many of the characteristics had given way to Canadian influences. For the most part, the long narrow lots on the northeast side of Main Street remained as did a few of the original pioneer buildings.

The lot's make a walk along one side of Main Street and back along the other, and when I first look at what was then Steinbach's business district. Some places will be typical of the Canadian small town of the period some will have a Mennonite flair to them, and others may be odd simply because they reflected the individuals who built an occupied them.

The street itself was a wide avenue, its dimensions probably determined by the space needed for a horse-drawn wagon to turn around without a lot of backing. The ruts were graveled and the shallow ditch between the driving surface and the sidewalk (except at the downtown blocks, but wooden sidewalks) was a row of grass, weeds and plain sand. Hitching rails lined Main Street through the 1950s and possibly a bit beyond.

Just two doors down from our first house, most typical of the Mennonite format was the first transport hardware on fields still needed to grain, and when I probably first saw a threshing machine a harvest time. The creek at about this point as I remember it, flowed through a few acres of uneven topography rare in the St. Isidore of the part of Manitoba. A golf course of about three holes had been established here for early residents with sufficient leisure, but it did not survive.

Two doors northwest of it stood a long white clapboard building the southern shop of Isaak Plett, local woodworking genius. A short grazing transport Isaak was credited with inventing and building the machinery used for C.V. Loewen's lumbering supply factory which then as the largest sawmill in Canada,

Isaak's place main

DEPOTT March 25 1976

Coming across some Saskatchewan Mennonite place men the other day on my mind wandering back some first time I saw the place my principle applies.

At the time memory begins for me, we lived next door to a little bungalow occupied by an elderly couple and their bachelor son Isaac at sixties (I never learned which).

The couple lived little and we neighborhood lores quickly learned that a knock at their door had a fifty-fifty chance of generating a mild interest wrestle and a glass of milk, as we soon became steady customers, impelled only by older brothers and sisters who might interrogate us before we got to the door.

They also had a pet raccoon in a beak yard cage, in which direction as my own right, inside being a good excuse for a visit offering at least the occasional opportunity for patting; a kind like almost anything animals.

Last: he produced a saphire or a lanyer was a quite most always dressed in grimy clothes, who specially like to run as with no shingled and have the cottage a large yard. If he ever sold a just thought based of it but he was something of a sensational genius, and earned enough of his modern trade repairing machinery and solving convoluted problems for a local hotel businessmen had known.

But his real love was inventing and although his other men never have made him rich, it went beyond covering Boles Cooking-Oil devices for his own amusement library of the bookkeeping machine and the twenty processes through the Fox and this was manufactured on machine designed and built by him.

The old couple moved away soon, but Jack stayed on, setting up housekeeping, at a time room of the small one story and becoming the various he maintained for the rest of his life.

Unlike the old couple, Jack didn't run much for children the time had much with people of my age.

Next door was the C. F. Evens (pronounced Tarrel) shoe repair shop and, under the auspices of the bakery operated by his handsome and shoeshod wife Her Evens had beforehands temporized J. R. and R. Rouse "Not explained anywhere was the first that offered Ice Shoe Repair and Rolling House. At it on which most people used dry cakes of yeast of the grocery store shelves Mrs. Tom Hough Thanksgiving's yeast as bulk. For years a strudel of cake family was sent regularly to buy a nickel's worth of the soft, crumbly stuff for Mackerel baking. Sometimes in shame the one we were used for three cents' worth. I drew a thank we ever removed any less than whenever asked for a nickel's worth.

A few rambunctious and often a general stance. I can't think of everything about it in my earliest years, except that the store sold flavored sweet pipe a could trouble of a long paper envelope of a penny. I still eat often have a penny on I saw bake of the store's customer

A few years later the stores was asked over by Peter Vogt, a friend of our family dating back to Russia and the father of one of my closest friends in school. Mr. Vogt got much of his business by speaking not only those of surrounded, English, for also good Low German Germans and Ukrainians and possible French.

Age-old Dangers, or bad chains near the soft drink cooler such time two of them took in stitches on, of the cookery. Mr. Vogt added a cubic hand to a number already ringing his wrist, to be removed only when the drink is as good for

The Vogts made sure that plenty of ice bars had all the toys and sports equipment that would keep them at home and of his and made all the boys friends welcome every Sunday afternoon. They succeeded in making their huge yard and home Stalinbach's leading recreational facility for about two decades.

Christmas card memories

MEMORY December 17 1989

Every year we receive a card from and send one in it silently people whom I think of now silently of course of fact, whenever my mind wanders back to my childhood I from the earliest days in the store I tell my home town — for this couple was very much a part of my life

The family of my earliest memories, lived little unsure from us and their oldest son, whom some wag said looked like Stevenage Old Boy, was a very good wicket-keeper batsman and through most of school. At the Grammar School he was also a player. In the Senior XI, with only three out of eleven to today one of Chantrell, the matching players.

As the years rolled along, three years more were added to the family, and with it most of us... the parents might have been finding it very hard to encourage their youngsters from growing up to take into the house.

The episode was true however. The parents were determined to keep their kids at home and out of trouble, and in some fun, they made huge part and a huge home. The episode was particularly large in a crowded room the kids present more than pressed the family living.

The kids had many games you could imagine and all the members of the outdoor games, and were kids many hungry existence there being was the gathering place for the whole county very Sunday afternoon.

In the spring summer and fall we were organized to play outside. As mentioned, the yard was huge, extending at least 300 feet in a wonderful area and to the south.

We played soccer by kids and took teams football, rugby and cricket, football, cowboys and Indians, games, and sometimes we just came to be kid.

Whenever the game got out of hand, or if we pushed in the younger brothers and they ran in for support from Mum. Mum would come out and somewhat in gently which I told we took charge — as Mr. Wag would character at in his inimitable bass voice — which filled us with fear.

Whether or not the whole gang was invited for supper appropriately after the games and finished their meal or whatever peace was possible with up to 20 kids in the premises.

Mum was the "mastery" in an called it, where the Stevenage Weekly was produced. The Limerque operator could be watched through a window fascinated not more than a foot from the nose I was always fascinated by this machine. I don't have ever lost. A few doors past this was Reg's Plymouth-Chrysler dealership. I don't think it ever fazed well. Perhaps there were just too many family members trying to live off a business such a limited potential.

It does not special mention in the aggrandized for one of Stalinach's many dynamic business men Alec Fenner: an ambitious and persuasive young man, he said to have talked his way into a sales job with the Regalia. It matter while most people forgot about town until spring was at his wildest night, legend has it the Alec would knock on a door and go and see the country's selling every used trucks he could get rid of. In person who lead all the time in the world to have his name sung. Before long he opened his own Dodge-De Soto dealership, took in his brother John and they sold to many cars that they formed it their trade to split with John opening a Plymouth dealership. It was probably there business acumen and drive that inspired Stalinach leaders to establish the town as the automobile capital of Mantoba, reputedly selling more cars per capita than anywhere else in the country. The brothers also established a tire company that became fairly well known (Fenner Tires) and bought out by a larger company and a road construction company. Alec now lives in Hamilton is a mayor for a number of years.

Still a few years as the future was two-headed, three-sided Pete's Inn opened to the early we years by hardy driver Pete Kehler and his wife. Two became the hangout for the street loiterers it was replaced by a new large building which would be the town's top watering-tip many years suffering Mennonite dishes as well as Canadian fare. Next door to "Skinny Pete's" was a John Deere dealership operated by my partners who were inseparable, and who owned a team as an quietly together as the small suits office or in summer on the sun front of the office, jumping in or walking and just waiting for business to come around. Next was a small "lavender" office one of several local cottage businesses as well as a community not located as far as they. The new building in my east on memory housed a second hand store, but this was soon taken over by Ugg Bros. Sheets and later who also operated the taxi for some time. Herman my brother worked for them for a number of years, driving a truck almost daily into Winnipeg to pick up cans of manure from the small inland farms in the south and east rural areas, and at the same time taking orders for goods to be delivered on the return trip. Ugg's was paid for every load of manure cans shopped. He would also take orders to be forwarded to Eaton's mail order house in Winnipeg, again to be picked up by the farmer inland.

A large livery stable behind the store became a bottle-graded set Sunday Mennonite for stories of young lives, friends of twins John and Ronald Ugg, armed with repeat-action rifles loaded with rubber bands cut from home inland.

Since a year or so average, Herman would take me with him on his routine trip job was to hop on to open gates consisting of three strands of barbed wire and wire of light poles then close them after he truck and passed through. The open gate was marked — we had one some time during the morning there would be a lukewarm bottle of pop purchased as a convenient bottle village store. A house was refilling a service vehicle, a nice privilege for me. As I say I got to do this also once a year before I had difficulty reaching the gates which had to be opened last time closed and Herman a small and up having to come and and help me. It would take him about a you in forgive me.

Ugg Bros. had a general counter where rural customers Common and Ukrainian farmers — might set and to their lunches usually consisting of a length of bologna purchased for the purpose with chunks of "bologna bread, and washed down with a bottle of the famous cheapest pop at a table. Like in most country grocery stores of the period commodities such as salt, sugar and flat were towed in large bins from which they were scooped into brown paper bags. Stores that sold tobacco products — most Steinbach stores did out — customarily had one spice package of cigarettes for smokers inclined to indulge themselves to the extent of one or two "ladies' smoke."

Next door was the creamery, where dairy farmers delivered their cans of cream and where the transfer delivered cream picked a by their trucks. The creamery pasteurized cream for resale and made butter.

General Store was most a large general storefront was operated by partners who also operated the flour mill. The manager was a short friendly man with the shape of a barrel. He was also the assistant to one of the leading churches (Mennonite minister of that period were ordained and received some training within the church but did not receive myself of a salary as they had to earn a living to some way. He was and to have baldness and lads were always amused to how many mixed candies they got for a penny. They managed to get him, rather than one of several men, to wear on them. The business was the early depression years for reasons unknown to me.

I am not sure just when the J.H.B. Loeb was agreed next door but it must have been fairly early in the 1930s. It was customary to say German to refer to a Mrs Dyck as the Dyckette, Mrs. Kaup as the Kaupette and so forth. The operator of J.H.B. Loeb Mrs. J. H. Hamm was invariably referred to as the J.H.B. Loeb. As teenagers with nothing to do and no money to spend we would hang out as J.H.B. Loeb until Mrs. Hamm tired of us and sent us packing, after which we would walk the streets for a while, or hang out at another cafe for half an hour or so, then return.

Although most of the members of my town moved during the ten years were chronically broke no apartment rooms up and Sunday afternoons walking from one hangout to the next.

In the whole stretch so far described there was an interesting street: although several runners fail meetings from Main. Next to J. F. E. Lunch was Brower a repair and machine shop rather than a dealership, as I recall it although at any go to learn an agency for a line of farm equipment. It burned down when I was in one of the lower grades in the old school, directly across the street.

The house that was the pioneer home of this branch of the Brower clan was not a stand in past past the garage and flanked by Reimer Avenue, which dismissed the motley like diagonally from corner to corner more or less. It was fitting that this byname family occupied the keystone location. Several Brower builders were among the district's earliest settlers, and continued copiously. In almost 1946, 65 Reimers were listed in the village's telephone directory. Besides many Reimers listed in the exchange of nearby villages. This was at a time when it was not unusual for a family to have a telephone.

First Reimer Avenue range F F Loewen's Garage, the first General Motors dealership in the area where We worked as a bookkeeper for several years. This was followed by C T Loewen Leather Yard, to supplying a hardware store, millwork house and the bookkeeping supply factory already mentioned. It was a fortunate coincidence that our employer, Loewen-Isle windows throughout western Canada. There was also a good behind the millwork factory. Jan married from the pool so winter was almost in summer and cold to two severe in summer for barbecue and calm smoking needs. We sometimes swam in the mud-bottomed pool to summer and occasionally am the ice. It was probably high on protein.

Two residences and three Grocers's pool rooms and barber shop. The Bulard pair as was one of the village's few concessions to human frailty in it was not a place for respectable patronage to patronize. Sometimes I was sent to Mr. Goosen's for a haircut because its "changed" and those customers ended in men's days. My scarcely map of hair emerged thin. It was known in its pile, and entering the thin was to be charged service probably did and help as to be used to be rough.

Summer hairstyles

SUMMER August 3 1972

While shall probably the a hopeless reactionary I must admit the younger generation for having influenced a more individual outlook about hairstyles.

It's not that I don like the look of a closely trimmed kind of but on someone else. My problem is that I have always and a thin about business and barbers.

My earliest memories of the penetrating distress include the memory of standing first of five or when my mother after much procrastination on her own part, and much pretty nudging on mine would finally guide her hand upon among my peering through a jungle of washed hair high merely and pin inside whatever she was doing in order to do her duty by myself and society.

A finished was placed on a stool it was encouraged in a sheet, mother would give her instructions' scissors, an experimental snip or two in the air and we were away on the operational task of so called hair-dressed.

These shorts may have been sharp enough to cut cloth; they and to be because they a love mother carried for daily forced for a family. But they were women's scissors for cutting hair.

Part of the problem, to be sure, was the fact that I also had an aversion for combing and did an only under duress, and so superficially as possible. Thus, when combing they used to become tangled in clumps that at last been gone time came a comb and proceeded towards the top layer of the the became distraught suggests in correcting the matter.

At last mother had grew too old for home-style hair cuts. (or perhaps too big in courage or the frustrated-sheer arrangement), money was still not available to permit barbers as often we would have might have divested. The one barber who would give you a haircut in our parish. (was) a great man who, in mid, had a team of gold understands, but that's prove it.

He had a room in front of his shop, and when business was slow he would sit there in his easy chair with his paper hair opened "Pole and wait the world go by. Whenever went by there would yell and the old man would point at me knowing that the day was approaching when he would train might have to make my magic. I always looked for other way with tears of terror gauging my eyes at the very thought of the ordeal.

Old George was noted for saying he was much fonder of the dog than of other folks kids. Never doubted this statement for one second especially when confronted on his close cool footing, to him never about kids who didn't have enough blood to reach their feet.

Anyway you will understand how I have a thing about business. Even when short-term cuts were in vogue, didn't manage to shift into whether they could. I can't understand at least a three-week term, and then a waiting list of one day enough to make me pull out the monster mail.

I suppose the men with it once at least have their best interest every week or so, but count me out. I'm planning a refresher where I can visit at least three or four weeks without even feeling guilty about my lack.

Another grocery store, Woolsey Grocery was started next door to the early 1930s. There was nothing particularly outstanding about it in my memory although I have this feeling that it was the forerunner of a fairly successful grocery chain.

Next northwest was a structure of some size that had housed another grocery store, one that went broke or out of business in the early 1930s, and which was subdivided into a butchery, Frank's about social work and Brandt's Cafe and Beer Hall. Rough boy travellers, the cafe catered to a better class of people and I was never comfortable there. I confess to more confusion here but all the businesses mentioned there was clustered fairly close together.

The final brick Ada business building on that side of the street was Hoobert's second hand store, with used furniture a specialty. They promoted a slight ide: Hoobert's problem, because there were months second hand store in town owned by another Mr Hoobert. Over ninety percent of western Canadian Mennonites either have come from Russia or have descended ancestors, and because genus occurs until recent years landed to be flaunted in the tradition of biblical names, nicknaming was common and often borrowed from the individual's occupation. So the dealer was referred to as Second Hand Hoobert while the other, who also operated a butchery, was known as their was labelled Butcher Hoobert. Any small misfortune, habit, characteristic or incident could attract a nickname that stuck for life. There was a man by the name of Wiebe who bought five-cents worth of peppermint candies whenever he was in town. The nickname "Five-cent Wiebe or "Dollar Wiebe" stuck for life

Between Hoobert's and Brandt's was the Bank and Waverly Store which also served as the post office. Late in the 1930s the bank's first federal building dominated this handsome brick structure, was built at Rosser and Main to house the first "federated" post office

There were two more enterprises on the northeast side of Main that might be included as businesses.

An unemployed or underemployed labourer converted a square hole about one hundred feet behind his home on the sloping floodbank of the creek, lowered the sides with wooden shoring, roofed in with from an entrance well next door and furthered his remaining pool upon his business.

We worked there one summer on package tour on post attendant and lifeguard. I doubt he could swim more than ten strokes. In fact of wages he was paid at least in part, work-running privileges for himself and his siblings. So far this glorious period I was able to skip my swim all never all afternoon a week and join the "swarthy" as possible. Guess I was according on the edge of the pool at about the four-foot level, and the neighborhood retarded boy pushed me in. I choked and sputtered at water just over my mouth while the boy jumped up and down beside the pool laughing with delight because I failed me and just my lifeguard brother I and after regaining my breath, I repaired it the brother and and taught myself to swim

Also at the neighborhood was G C Kartzbuer a painter-teacher (such as the days when village citizens were conducted in Germany) and at this time the Walter's dealer Douglas it summer that would have detected most people but was very sociable and could talk cordially even to children. He once told me of taking a trip by steamer to Winnipeg, about forty miles distant. The round trip took at least a week. His daughter Mary was my special friend (also, briefly my son's sweet than two minutes hours! The youngest of two sons a late-in-life offspring, visited us once every year-before Easter usually on the Saturday of the holiday weekend. An intellectual he did not gladly participate in neighborhood sports, but could be relied on to be the questions he devised for himself!

ARCHIVES HAPPY HEYDEBATE

A dream come true

Winnipeg Free Press May 22 1957

A young man came into recently but somehow I haven't gotten around to appreciating it.

Well it this come true quite in the way that I dreamed it in my younger days.

My mom a 30-year family and to cook up for the hell building here—like contingents to fit more for less it needs where the house had out from workers more together

The one had it now, a meeting when do house paid never realized in the end of a monument(s), member relief, the my gear staff, which I would jiggle interruptedly to signify the exhibits going the resident and five food potato manner gone speaker dinner stopper

Naturally there's no fun in driving steam you in going somewhere, so I tried to pretend that the dream was going covered. Every time I counted to 100 were mile-was dreamed to have been travelled. Around with a road ramp and an accent road goods thereof went 216 miles, how much at and busy for not mile turn was in Regent-thereby, persisted stayed it to more the hand. signals had turn the about in the appropriate manners.

But imaginations notwithstanding, it quite pretty restless counting to 800 so yet I was once just noticing lights which replaced signal and turn the wheel later.

I happened upon a map of Nova Scotia, snapped out upon it once and was able to relate that not necessary by being able to count only to 50 before sinking a turn. But even then uncertain cooled up some fun in the weekend that is the contention

Then one day I spied Lynn K. a few short dozen sitting to the front room pumping away on an exercise sewing machine while intently watching its mystery motion odometer lookup and wondering the rules go by.

I found with, but quickly remember the thought of selling another for the sewing dreamed with which she spent one hour and half hours. In any case, whence the odometer?

Inquiries prepared to offer a fortune although I hadn't a them to my name. Would how would he much to the factory

He shrugged and said "You can have it, then to my heart was about to hand with joy its added, "maybe after get to 101,100 miles"

The recorded mileage in that moment was 91,278.5.

I signed briefly for waiting then down inside of a mile dripping for so already was more than I could bear I left however with a measure of hope. So I was ill, was a different person person until back to decide that if he had made his mind up to reach the 10,100 mark I made it he would. The "maybe" part of the promise I put out of my mind. Why cross bridges before you get to them.

Months went by and years, and every now and then I would see Ernie working away at his machine. The horrible image of how would he reach mail just long enough to that they asking.

Even I, never did reach 100,000, as it he did he never told me.

But a few weeks ago our household smelled an enormous bright and not free to spend as many hours as I care to pestering away and watching the miles turn upon the odometer

As mentioned, the dream-like scene has just as in the way I learned it. Nearly 10,000 miles.

And many of that, I think I just held off until the time got the machine looked to. Any newcomers 100,000 miles.

Eddie Kerr-Dineen, about one block off Main, was C.E. Princes a well-driller who operated throughout southeastern Manitoba Crossing the street Peter S. Kempel ran a traveling business on all his house with the older of his entire years, and next to his northeast was Frederic's blacksmith shop. This years was either already on is way to extinction or over-stuffed or possible birth. I remember the father and two sons speaking quite a lot of them just standing outside the front door. There was also a barber's shop right on the Main and St. shop, on which the oldest of the sons remained his commercial interest for the few who came. I was sent there once or twice but on how was then just shut down town.

Past the small Hebrew-one church complete with a little graveyard dating back to earlier times (which I passed in full gallop on dark or even moonlit evenings) and beyond a few more residences was the Steinbach Telephone Exchange, a private company a those day

In the 1920s almost everyone listened to a popular weekly news comedy installed "Silver Magee and Molly." One of the regular routines had Fibber, a glib scatter-brained Irishman, making a telephone call through a mutual exchange. He would say, "Operator, give me Bensonhurst, seven-eight-one-ohhh-hhhhhhh is that you Wee? What's up, Mert?" The sound he followed by a series of ribbings and questions or jokes with grave or outrageous overtones that set system Molly gasping and hollering into thank before losing given the details that brought the room literally to gummy tables down in a hilariously unimaginable and certainly immoral.

The Rubinbush exchange had an operator by the name of Myrtle, and naturally she got the "Oh-is-that-you-Myrt" routine both on the job and on the street.

A small and extremely public assurance and it of course Fibber was followed by Friesen's George, the gummy Ford deliverably. It proved to be the ground one winter night, and was replaced by what was considered a modern building by the standards of the present-day economy. Most of the many street-type buildings included building structures with a moderate by the name of Frank Sensativity and refinancing local hockey games. In fall we would all troop to Friesen's for brochures on the new cards. The salesmen looked about what I name the prospects and then would go into a long, long sales talk seemed pretty slim to those years

A real Friesen Avenue on the village's only financial institution, the little branch of the Royal Bank of Canada. To see it took an air of sanctity and mystery other because of the grandeur dimensions of the managers and the main teller, as became the barred wicket bespoke untold wealth beyond the means most mortal clerks.

Behind the bank was the Friesen Modern Shop on Friesen Avenue, and next an Shaw was Friesen's Jewellery and Watch Repair. In front of the jewellery store stood a pretty high table, sometimes when one of the gang had a penny to spend, he would retire to the rear and shop out, the penny would be deposited, ally's while the most basement would put on before the first get off, and so on until we had all been sought for a cent. Having found that we could a penny with no anything as such as to starting our weight. A small office next door was occupied by Penner's Transfer another trucking business whose trucks they years knew were Dominion installers on business throughout western Canada and beyond. The office of the Royal Municipality of Rosenort was followed by several more restaurants and then Kroeker's Blacksmith Shop. Emigrants west of Germany to the Black Sea country of the mid I was never clear on whether they were coming to or fleeing from there, some still connect on for the baseball team.

Behind a wood fence stood the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] between Kroeker's and the hotel, several farm implements to school as a [illegible] every day and put [illegible] horses at the stable. Even in the early 1930s there was a roaring business. The second hotel of [illegible] known for its automatic bargains. If you called the price of any item — few items were tagged — the owner or clerk would cheerfully charge it. Not so nice, that's 25 cents on maybe 10 cents you can be sent for 50.

The Tavern Hotel was an anachronism of two hotels that had been built side by side. One section boasted the best parlor where had been bestowed after a period campaign and conversation that probably would make a book in itself. The long verandah in front of the one section accommodated the drivers found, in those days, were every one and were hard. They dominated lands on the bench with three feet on the porch rail and passed outside to answer on the passing motorists. They were "the boys from the Branch Works of the L.I. After a time strict supervision.

Most of those could be rallied to help by the prospect of a football game. Once another youngster told me there was going to be a baseball game that evening. I asked him who it was playing and he said "our Lafrenieres against the Hotels "The Hotels?" I asked and he said "Yes, the guys who work at the hotel." Naturally, he meant the rest that does not the hotel parts.

The hotel was operated by the Peters family, whose [illegible] son, John, also ran a barber shop in what had been the office for one of the hotels.

Nestled into a narrow lot southeast of the hotel was the Fruit Store, which had I seem in retrospect a bunch of bananas and other fruits in its display window but proved chiefly as a cafe. It was a favorite hangout for the high school crowd. While it changed hands a number of times over the years it would operating in 1936 as the Pioneer Cafe, its exterior enshrouded

Just preceding the Belmont Avenue intersection was the Schwartz Brass stores selling Cadillacs for ninety grands and what have you. It burned down one winter night as the nasty Wilshire trend was replaced by a full two-storey office and apartment building with imitation Ionic railing. I think it was one of the first Detroited commercial buildings that did not have a pinhead roof and a false front. In both a doctor's office. NOMP office, drug store and maiden aunt suites.

The "old" school occupied a large piece of land on the other side of Belmont Avenue. By the time I entered Grade 7 the new building in the rear had been completed and I was one of the classes herded Grade 13 Creative I read it became accommodated in a Main Street commercial building that had gone earlier, and Grades 7 and 8 were taught in the Westminster Presbyterian Church. A few years later a "new" school was opened two blocks southwest of the "old" school (that now was working its penultimate as hanging rooms—no buildings), and installed Grades 5 to 10, plus such fancy options as Home Economics and Typing.

As for most people, school memories alone would fill volumes, but [illegible] aside for a few [illegible] columns it's time now for years

The old class

Newspaper: September 25 1975

A month or so ago Bill Smiley held forth in his column about birthday messages [illegible] almost [illegible] our copyright about my then upcoming 48th number, in which I had been feeling harassed for months.

As it happened, 13 of our original beginners class of about 45 turned 60 [illegible] many were helping nearly grown to middle age spread, but on the whole reasonably prosperous and healthy looking.

All of course had finished the age where they could be regarded as show in receipt. But there are always a few who manage to have their cherubicy look that stays 10 to 15 years off their age, while another handful begin a premature old.

Close to half of the total class showed up, many with husbands or wives, since so many were themselves [illegible] been members of the schools surrounding school or [illegible] of.

A special guest was our Grade 1 teacher, Miss Kerr-Cochran, whose name has grown to become [illegible] primary education in the province. Cochrane. One was her first Grade 1 class and [illegible] taught in a multi-class country school for several years, so the occasion has more significance for her [illegible] to me!

Our Grade 1 teacher was a theologian and author of several books, penned all the way from St. Louis [illegible] The way we greeted across the floor to the current known looked pretty easy to us, considered from making a direct reference to the book to take a swing at me and hit the nearest wall instead. Doesn't say much for my conduct on the occasion, but about even the days of double jeopardy — you provoked the warfare was celebrating you, you stood an excellent chance of getting another slice of the same shellacked at home.

A P.P. was always a character had to be. He turned to call upon a youngster who hadn't been paying attention to answer a question. Naturally the lad would stand there trembling, biting his lips and shuffling his feet, while A.P. would plead with him: "Please say something! No [illegible] you know any answer! Say anything, say 'Saskatoon' but say [illegible] just anything!"

The same would usually end with the redhead holding allowed to stamp into his seat completely humiliated. But the new pals standing and exper[illegible] day knew it was normal to emerge in summer [illegible]. He got away with it too — that was. Of course he knew of my writing some too.

The plan days

Newspaper: November 3 1932

Following this time of year — approaching Halloween — but thoughts of the [illegible] turned to Christmas Carol.

Well, I didn't exactly start. I was Second-Carolist Boy, who appears briefly in a pantomime scene, then there was no room, in memories, and passages from [illegible]

The [illegible] what I was. [illegible] the plan was put on by the [illegible] Inc of course no end-supporting colleague would consider the part of a [illegible] 15 to a Second Carolist Boy even [illegible] play the parts of the youngsters.

The first-season event in which I took my stage [illegible] Second Toronto Scrooge being chosen by the Great of the Christmas Present the children of the impoverished Cratchit family, ending their tenancy Christmas carol.

And believe me, [illegible] — me, and at that we haven't allowed a stable.

A plane of membership — my early fledgeling — but our [illegible] have been spotted by television and [illegible] had to do for both nights. The drama group you will understand, was meant to [illegible] Cratchits.

We showed that our hands [illegible] for the need wishes on the first night [illegible] Cratch accordingly mill on the sandwiches had to do for the second performances.

As we could see it, there was so much sweat in the finished night, and we sooner had our scores settled when Tiny Tim, Second Cousin Roy, and the Big Sausage Guy at the Cheyenne Pass were shifting themselves with sandwiches. We ate the whole thing before a hurried and angry Mac — might said in almost hurriedly that the sandwiches had been surrendered for the next night to follow.

We felt properly chastened and were guilty until it occurred to us that we have hadn't thanked to say that we were glad we were.

A tribute, sort of

Monitor, February 22, 1906

Every small town probably has, or used to have, a master who became a legend in his area, or her own time. Usually they were disciplinarians, dedicated to providing knowledge, respect for authority and a degree of terror, not unlike a touch of death.

In our town, it was A.P.

Those who knew Cedar Grove 6 storms were high school graduates' returns, which at least about equal from the deployment of substitutes, a fall to A. P. to try at least to install to make up for several years of loathing and injustice in his early days, and disciplined.

When the day finally came when we mentioned him the "Little Schoolmaster for the first term, we always cut him and sat down decently at the moment the school bell rang.

We had known him in A. P.'s classes, students were haunted by another rather than more but we had expected more little secondary visits on "Tree. Some visited Nov. 25, and you, George, will be the 26.

Anyway

A. P. seemed down each aisle, jabbing to each [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] merchandise, but began to come apart in the 1990s when the family patriarch fell victim to the ravages of age. Feuding heirs, I believe, contributed to the grand store's demise over a period of several decades. About thirty years later its bankruptcy was deferred when a young newspaper reporter story a radio program, set forth, disclosed that high-button shoes and alcohol-based patent medicines — just to mention a few of many merchandise — could still be found on its shelves of the W. A. Antique dealers stampeded the store and deferred its end for another year or two. I seem to remember it fare doubtedly not clear first since was I part of the H. W. empire (in with the garage or machine shop across the street and unemployed earlier)

Carved into the front face of the east five entablatures was several small initials that occupied little more than celebrities about capitalists and a lawyer' office were among those. Later into not a prosperous profession as the Standards of about days, in Commodities, by and large, expected litigation did not often occupy criminal sufferance, and bad legal transactions executed through handshakes or security public whatever was the Stock Exchange. Nevertheless, prominent Mansonians of the period lauded as useless higher education realized lawyers were necessarily semi-Mansonian

By some years the sole representative of the legal calling was a Scotsman who was promptly run with little malice, labelled a liar, partly because of his prominent nose, and secondly because he was clever enough to learn to speak fluent Low-German.

Farmer's Lumber Yard and Hardware enterprise was across Lumber Avenue, with the Farmer-owned power grocery on plank behind it. Next door to Farmer was the Red and White Store, owned by P.E. Reimer and Sons. The business section of Ste family ends in the location plan in that corner of the grain-bee. The oldest son was nicknamed Carload Frank because he bought things by the railway carload to get the lowest rate. He was reputed to have had a whole carload of pork and beans delivered to Gimm right make distant. He had sold the beans at business but profitable prices in the Red and White it was said, and still had been able to sell enough stock to furnish neighboring villages for less than wholesale prices. Even so, Reimer's was a prosperous enterprise employing a considerable number of clerks it was not assessed to any Frank Holland walking out of the store with a 100-pound sack of flour slung over his shoulders, and hosting thirty a customer in vehicles.

With prosperity and improved highways a the end of World War 2 he would send a radio-patrol truck to Hamlet Hill with announcements returns to Steinbach and sell the goodness on the street for incredibly sparse

Sixteen bikes may there 1947

He was so many he started Reimer Express Lines, still operated by his family and now doing business across Canada and I believe, outside United States as well.

The Steinbach Flour Mill several doors down milled Prairie Rose and Prairie Gist flour as well as livestock feed and was the only local point of sale for grain. A few wheat-destroyed men of the Mennonite in just about my earliest memory. Many names didn't keep; prairie names and perhaps undergarments as 1936; Steinbach showed hints of the Prairie Rose imprint. For years the mill's steam whistle blew at noon at twelve noon, at one and six o'clock, and to summon volunteer firefighters when fire struck, but eventually the function was relegated to a special town-owned siren erected on front of the "old" school and next to the town pump.

Across the new intersection beyond his residence was John Reimer's machine and welding shop. A brother. John lived with three spinster sisters who were dressmakers, and the nearest thing Mother had to a close friend. She worked for the eldest several years, and after our new son said, Irene, to their home daily for a spool of silk.

Next was the Kleine Gemeinde (Evangelical Mennonite) church and that was about a for non-ecclesiastical Main Street. There were only a few off-Main enterprises — a privately run hospital, an undertaking parlor (also the functionary to what is now a major western Canadian chain) and a cheese factory — and there were doubtlessly a few interprises operated out of residences.

Among already mentioned what normally considered facilities the community lacked in keeping with its religious traditions, it only have adding that there was certainly no movie theatre, generally considered an instrument of the devil. When a daring entrepreneur (non-local, non-Mennonite), turned the courage to build and open a theatre early during World War 2, or perhaps a year earlier, over whatever legal obstacles and public objections need to be overcome, he found very poorly. Even his support for local institutions — such as advertising the movie "Hell Below" in "Schmetzers Programm" — did not legitimize his business. When he committed suicide a few years later it was generally held that this was his punishment for his part with the devil in bringing sin to Steinbach.

The theatre remained closed for some time, and for several years underwent sporadic changes and changes of ownership with hesitant and baffling final ly being moved to another town.

One of my late memories of life in Steinbach before saying to seek fame and fortune to Toronto, is that of a farmer standing in the door of the creamery, a leading many tall crates can be one meld, and reading — month upon — the headlines of the front page on the door.

I was Tuesday, May 8, 1945

On Monday we and received the news of the unconditional surrender of Nazi Germany and while prospects for security and to the war seemed bleak it was comforting to cheer about that the evil empire of Adolf Hitler which had plunged much of the world into war almost six years earlier had finally been defeated. V-E Day (Victory in Europe) and come.

Accordingly he federal government had declared Tuesday and Wednesday to be total holidays with businesses, banks and schools closed to permit celebration by Canadians everywhere of the long-awaited victory.

Tuesday was publishing day in the Steinbach Post so we and to defer our holiday is that week's paper to finish - just off for two days by the printers in Winnipeg.

So I was on my way to work on Tuesday morning when I spotted the farmer reading the incredible information he could not believe the enormous release of a reunion of hostilities in far-off Europe.

For some years I used to ramble other Steinbach "experiences" I met in Toronto and elsewhere with my cousins of the grown Mennonite farmer who didn't ever know the war had ended.

If I drew one laughter I evaluate conversion probably directed to me rather than - appreciations of my anecdotes. First of all he was not necessarily Mennonite Ukrainian German and French farmers probably also delivered cream to one creamery. Secondly, by the v-E 1945a almost everyone owned a radio, most farm families had telephones and while Mennonites remained fundamentally pacifist, large families and the growing influence of the town media almost guaranteed that many families had one or more sons in the armed forces. Thus they had an interest in the progression of the war and a stake in its ending, so every few years since even of the approach even on farmers and in hamlets.

I mention the incident because while my interpretation at the time was probably flawed it serves to demonstrate the village isolation and detachment from the world at large. The farmers almost surely knew that the European war was over and also that a national holiday had been declared. What probably took him by surprise was that celebration should be carried to the extreme of closing down the creamery and making it impossible for him to market his fresh cream.

Mennonites and other Europeans were attracted to Canada not only because they were offered free land but because they were assured freedom of religion and the right to serve their own little worlds unlike yesterday Canadian wilderness unmindful of and unaffected by what was happening to distant epochs and happenstances there.

They and escaped a Europe where for centuries petty noblemen and kings had the unchallenged authority to conscript peasants into armies to fight battles and wars that had no sooner ended except the misfortune to some almost of the bootlegger. The peasant-warrior's sons therefore was to survive. Failure to do so might have the further consequences of the peasant's inheritance being unable to continue holding their home lands.

In Russia, where Mennonites had been exempt from military service for a century or so, and had been instituted against most antisocial turbulence. Beer had perhaps even profited from increased demands for the products of their labor during period of war.

World War I was probably fought with little inconvenience by the Steinbach community and little effect on the population except possibly higher prices for wheat, and weekly prayers in church for peace. Exemption from military service for Mennonite boys had been guaranteed even after the military draft was introduced toward the end of the war. And enthusiasm was simply not of the question.

So here in 1945, an essential service was closed down on a day other than the Sabbath simply to observe the end of the phase of a war.

Perhaps my future-day interpretations as an finality as my original hasty judgement. I'll never know.

Steinbach's wide Main Street facing northeast from in front of A. von Peinen's circa 1949 Photo courtesy Derksen Printers Ltd.

8. Introduction to printing

Birth of a printer's devil

Having spent close to half a century in newspapers and/or the graphic arts, it seems fitting to write a few paragraphs about my introduction to an industry I have loved—save my first days even when doing the horrible tasks of a printer's devil.

I was always fascinated by the printing process and was inordinately proud the Scotsbush had a newspaper, probably because no other village had one in the southwestern section of Manitoba that is bounded by the Outside and United States borders, the Red River and what is now the Trans-Canada Highway. Never mind that it was printed in Germany, a language not among the most popular when I was in search of the "primary" skills one called locally.

The Scotsbush Post's two Linotype typesetting machines were so situated that the operators sat with their backs to large windows facing Main Street. I loved to stop and watch the dexterity of the operators dance over the large 90-key keyboards, causing the slimy copper matrices and metal spacer bands to fall into the assembling trays, and to see the finished "slugs" (a half-alloy pound-type bar) come out line of type popping into place on the "stick" to the left of the operator.

I would gladly have watched the process for hours, but Pete, one of the operators, did not take kindly to being watched so after a few minutes he would turn around and cast toward me a scowl that would bear patenting. What could a kid do but slink away?

In late 1942 my academic career came to an abrupt and ignominious end. Applying for jobs at all the local business places was another time-consuming and grind unless one was young enough to leave home. I had little to do but hang around downtown. At about this time the war was depleting the staff at the newspaper. One result was that George Buchanan—the owner's youngest son and, briefly, a classmate of mine—left school to help keep the business going. The printing office then became a daily to twice-daily stop on my day-killing rounds, and I would hang around watching the printing process with fascination mixed with disappearing looks of tender employment — or hints that couldn't be misunderstood — sent me on my way.

George was nothing if not resilient and it is probably to this that I owe the beginning of my career in printing. If there was any employment task that was his by virtue of passority, it might be entrusted to me. I gladly accepted this enthusiast of sufferance and as weeks went on my status around the shop became fuzzy. Except for the fact that I wasn't paid, on one was quite sure whether I was a part-time employee or he it contributing listener.

Where one method is used with it the static electricity problem familiar to all who work with machinery and paper.

Newspaper presses in those days were limited pressure into which large sheets of newsprint were fed manually. Four pages were printed on one a time all from the gale was turned over and printed with another four pages. After that the sheets had to be fed again manually into a folder with what seemed like thousands of conveyor tapes and guides.

Each pass through the press would result a charge of electricity into a sheet, especially in dry New Mexico weather. By the third pass the sheets would seem to have powerful will of their own getting caught in the last rollers to jamming the folder

Pulling sheets strips of ink-covered pages from half a dozen ink rollers takes time. A pressed folder might mean hours more newspaper time, making it necessary to run the press overnight or even through to (next day) a new one. Each of their stops affected not only the operation at hand, but caused a backlog in the whole production chain. A bad run would also result in considerable waste, sometimes hundreds of dollars' worth of paper.

The Post was a German-language weekly newspaper serving the Mennonites of the western provinces, so each press run was over 5,000 — since press with a maximum speed of one thousand impressions per hour. Printing, then, is a significant part of the production process

Several fairly large bundles of the Post were mailed to an Canadian Mennonite colonies in Paraguay. On one of two occasions when spoilage caused by static electricity reduced supply below demand, we had to come to the regretful decision to withhold part of the supply—because what had been made by the Germans and that the Paraguay readers to a consequence, must do without their copies of the Canadian sheet.

Dozens of remedies for static problems were devised most of them as effective as cures for the common cold. At the Post we used strands of tinsel into which the sheets were to release their charge when passing over their. The second was a manually operated fly-swatter.

So this was my first job. I would be handed an printing day at a clicks an hour — or perhaps a flat rate of two-bits a day — to stand behind the press with a fly-swatter fitted well, a rate and go to without a shot as it is all covered from the press cylinder by a rack.

Enough is small office for M Burkett, the publisher: the entire Post plant was housed in one large room (it seemed large anyway.) Farmers coming in to pay their subscriptions at a plant saw indeed naturally drawn to the immediate machines that fabulous Linotypes that large they are standard) rebuilder press on which the page was printed and two solid hand-fed platen presses for commercial printing. So it is no wonder himself for a customer o make his way past the counter and draw closer to the machines and try to figure them out. On one occasion a machinist — one farmer watched the crew intently for a while, then announced to Burkett — the owner's number two son and also occasional the press feeder — that he thought he had figured out what he couldn't understand about the fly-swatter was accomplishing behind the press. About a quick-witted, Reuben and in this years a specific service provided for Post readers: the paper were being surveyed with a solution used for the overhead.

It was a long after my acquisitive as a part-time employee that M Burkett looked at the handwriting on the wall. Both Reuben and a young him supervisor were taking steps to join the Royal Canadian Air Force and George's mother was to obtain a year from the Post. The labs about us was also moving rapidly away from being a buyers' market, as I had myself a job.

The printing trade as practiced at the Post had developed in a semi-unique and somewhat-by-way fashion. I know it one of the owners or employees such paper a inception but ever. Some printers' men had my journeyman printers are been employed Sometime the typesetting machines had been mastered through a drive from industries and from upcoming journals. The original owner had learned after a fashion the rudiments of operating the machines, mastering type and building up forms, and operating presses and this very elementary knowledge was passed along to succeeding owners.

As I discovered after taking my skills abroad most of one practices firm as the case of everything accepted as conventional and established in the trade. The newspaper press, for managed instead of being wasted my daily assistance, was obtained only weekly when the old fountain was cleaned only twice a year: once in autumn to prepare me for the Christmas rains, and again after Christmas to get back to March. I went to stuff the laundry before Christmas and it was part of my initiation first to walk down the rubber ink rollers and the inking plate, and then the fountain with its accumulation of a year's hardened ink.

Any picture visiting the top in the 1930s and early 1940s simply would have refused to believe that by the early 1960s it would be mentioned one of the most advanced small town printing offices in western Canada: a precursor to photo typesetting and later to offset printing. Incredibly, after World War 2 the Dorchester established an English-language weekly serving all of northeastern Manitoba. From there there was no looking back and before long, the Canadian-language Post became a thousand-page-tabloid to the enterprise. Eventually it was sold as happened to a Winnipeg printing house.

But back to the years of my own training. Working Tuesday evenings until the paper was printed folded wrapped and bundled for delivery to the post office, was an ancient health and taste. Overtime pay was unheard of for it was customary for Mrs. Dorkson to come into the shop from the adjoining living quarters with a large plate of home-fried hamburger (the best I have ever tasted and my own mother cooked a mean hamburger) freshly baked bread and a steaming pot of fresh coffee. For care of those evening snacks we would have given up our birthrights let alone overtime pay.

Wednesday morning my first duty was to take the bags of newspapers to the post office several blocks away in a small hand wagon and on a hand-screen sled in winter.

Another daily job was to fetch enough water for shaving, washing and to fill the humidifier on the small furnace downstairs. The task I remember was final on the hot one that dressed in a large pail which I also used to empty as required.

Frame-could always be counted on to make his interesting, to he did the day he filled the compressor with powdered paste. We had an elderly almost-standard proprietress who called the Professor, and I was still on the look out how best to intervene his hands had almost a free apart and with strands of past stretching between them.

Earlier I referred to the big quarters behind the printing office. One morning Mrs. Dorkson came into the shop and appealed to me to stop and frame George who was always difficult to get out of bed and on the occasion couldn't be helped.

She asked me if I knew which was George's room and I said "Of course. Bruno and George and shared a room for years and I and been in their home often enough to know this. I didn't have enough had been awakened and after Bruno left for the air force

I strode into the room pounced on the sleeping figure and was only a few inches away when I realized it was not George but handsome year-old frame. As I stopped in horror paralyzed with shock my silent life did no can through my mind. She did was certain knowledge of the charge, criminal charges and public disgrace.

I fled from the room only a meet Mrs. Dorkson, very concerned, and thinking with laughter I don't even remember anything unusual long enough to get George out of bed. Perhaps the sound of his mother's laughter brought him around.

Anyway, as it worked out, Frame back to Steinbach about eight years later and made an honest woman me of Irene.

Pete, the Linotype operator mentioned earlier the one who soon had discouraged sidewall. to printer industry - is married to the older Dorkson daughter Anne. Working with him, I found him much more agreeable than I had imagined but also learned to my sorrow that he could be good and ugly as far

I was a real starter in the early months of my employment, and needed, upon completing our task, to unload those and wait for my next assignment. Pete couldn't abide such slack and some, consequently, he struck up to me and said "Needled, anytime you have nothing to do, you'll find several gallons of type on that table waiting to be distributed.

He was referring to forms of business and and job forms already run and placed in galleys type hours on a table or stone to be distributed back into California typesetse and cases of sporting material

Several weeks went by, with myself heeding his advice. Then one Tuesday afternoon, Pete, who operated the mailing machine, was ready to go his own way with a big agreement the papers from running off the press. He took advantage of the short respite to chat with another employee

In his mouth me strode up to him and said with a smirk, "If you've nothing to do, Mr. Rosendahl, there's a few gallon of type over there to distribute

I walked away immensely proud of my immaculate suit. A few seconds late I heard myself being whisked around and with Pete's finger shaking millimeters from my nose his face flushed and fire flashing from his eyes, I was in trouble then.

"Rosehill, never, never again dare to... tell me circumstances when you've to tell me what to do!" I remember I'm a day. Forever after I treated him with respect. We might almost today but it was years before I thought of the problems with the mailing machine.

Consisting of recreational mail was received during vacations, and many of the envelopes received at the Post from readers in Paraguay and Mexico — envelopes containing subscriptions accompanied in some letters — arrived crumpled and damaged. "Examined by Censor." If it seems unreasonable it small town weekly newspaper to have readers in those countries' brain regarding that the Post was a German-language paper serving the Mennonites of western Canada, and was the chief source of news from home to hundreds of Mennonites of orthodox sects who had migrated to Paraguay and Mexico in the years somewhat following World War I became they objected to being drawn into the nonconformity of Canadian life through compulsory education

The mennonite constitution was an open invitation for Russia's fertile mind and mischievous hand. He was at his most dangerous when playing a powerful role on someone. I can't think he ever was quite as much to pre- d of his premeditations

Rosie and I shared a fine opinion of the hero-politics young Winnipeg men who was mounting on- Hitler my senior and who wrote here three times weekly with scathing regularity this man- ne, me was visiting in Winnipeg.

I wonder what the censor would say if he read one of Solomon's letters Rosie would see day A moment later the lightning bolt connected with his mind, and the idea was born with myself a willing accomplice

Now there was nothing simple about Rosie and he knew that no one would easily accept the proclaimed of local merit being announced. To get back advantage of several train derailments that had occurred in circumstances Manitoba in a short period — the probability of accidents of traffic is exceptionally remote hour. We casually suggested separately and only to a few gullible individuals the sabotage was suspected and had local ownership of one was being considered

Then we sit back and waited for human nature to follow its natural course. It wasn't long before we started hearing the rumour from widely separated sources and by the time it hit our business we were ready to strike

I have where Hitler loved her letters from Jake as in her absence I removed an envelope with a blurred postmark. At the day we pasted a sticker: Examined by Censor and used the sticker to seal the envelope but only after inserting a note

The next step and a tricky one was getting the letter to my sister without arousing to have anything to do with it. There was only one way to do — finally for the post office box shared with another family and Helen was, at this particular time the mistress of the key. She regularly picked up the mail at noon before walking home for lunch. Our position to was unnecessary personified and so big him to open the box was about an endeavour to bring for stamps on cards. To his credit, too the role was cast in stone and in any case, following was a lot of footsteps

However there was no other way to do it, and being on reasonably good terms with the clerks I went to the post office at noon of a Monday a day on which I knew from Jake was about to be the hear, and at a time when the postmaster would surely be out for lunch. Then I connected some outrageous font before-after for float was grudgingly accepted by the clerk on duty at the which would make him appear almost tolerant. If he failed to oblige. Even then I was taking a chance that he might simply take the mail out of our box and hand it to us, but back was on my side and he simply opened the box for me. I reckoned the letter from John already lying there and authoritatively "instructed" envelope and way home.

DTHEDOCTORSTOPETERSBURG

Shortly after half-past-twelve, when Helen's lunch hour started, the Arrival at home and announced with a peal of laughter that a letter from John had been recovered. She opened it, read the note and again burst into laughter handing over to Heather post herself the note which read: "Dear boy friend loves you but he talks too much. — Cousin Cousin "

It would have been wonderful to have left it at that but it was still necessary to give her the real letter and where I did in with a sorry grin, Helen figured it out in a second and taking Brown a profitable complicity and showered me with almost like daring to separate one of her old letters from its envelope.

She even threatened to report the matter to the postmaster, who would not have been amused and who would have sent every possible charge in the book against me. I knew now (and probably sensed then) that Helen would never have considered me, but to the Brian, gross her outrages. I couldn't be absolutely sure. My guilt gave her considerable leverage for several weeks, after which a small amount of humiliation compensated her.

In the safety of the great shop, however Brenda and I enjoyed a few laughs about the trick during the short period before he was off for training in the RCAF.

Time passed quickly and suddenly V E Day was upon us, and for me the realization that I would not count on the armed forces to take me into the world and unless I accepted to spend the rest of my life in Saskatoon, — and there to me at the least — I would probably have to get myself started from scratch.

So off I went to Toronto in July of 1945.

My new and can half years in the country print shop of the Herbertz in the 1940s represents only about five percent of my time to printing, but they were years with many memories.

Irene and I were to return to Saskatoon just over a decade later to become part of the loneliness which had come become a leader in the weekly newspaper and print field in Manitoba. Indeed, the Canadian Negro had won impressive awards in national competition and more than has continued to excel

Before long we realized that there was only so much room for family in a business so we must thrust-how stay so the church as a second support flourishing in weekly newspaper while waiting for our own opportunity in the field

Beside affording on the opportunity to become what the weekly newspaper had become in the postwar era back from more honored and modest considerations I was also given the opportunity to take charge of the sports page. I attended basketball games hockey games boat-polo football games and whatever else was going on in the sports world of southwestern Manitoba, covered organizational meetings compiled statistics wrote a weekly column covering all those items into type on the typesetter as I wrote them. It was early my only groundling in writing, and how to serve as my "license for taking over as publisher and editor

One chance came in 1958 when as a result of an advertisement in a trade publication we went to Weyburn Saskatchewan to take over the Review

Printing has two purposes

originally December 3 1980

My list of columns suggested over the ye. here at Mennonite included the t ng a word "Remembrances."

This purports to suggest to on that I might some time write about the Author-wrappers on used to publish small country newspaper shops

Author-wrappers, routinely processed for their end on (presumably) were bought in packages of 500 and imprinted at the local shop in the weekly newspaper plant

To accomplish this a form was locked into a platen press and forty little born like me would hand-feed the Author-wrapper into the machine one by one, and extract them (eventually)

If you think individual handling was cost enough, just hang on. Butterwrappers being this, were still early in benefits, and the pills of speeds follow the prose that the been inserting that meeting eyelid hair.

So it is evergreen hooked on the floor. Instead remarkably mumbled and the town wood: looking, it was quickly-smashed up and placed in the "good" trash.

Perhaps someone in the dairy had the job of further rewarding the wrappers for Peppermints an old smudges, and another that in those schools times, both smells which supply human part of the considered produce.

If you ever like a used butterwrapper about 40 years old and treating a contemporary Manchester dairy inspect, close inspection may even elucidate to the studious eye the knurled grain of my middle finger marks. Rogue that friend. A measure to its mouth for positively.

We all grow about governments regulations and inspections, but what I would like Butterwrapper experience is leave to agree some controls are necessary.

"They" do ask blame me

Guardian, September 14 1978

Some 40 years ago, about the time I was mastering the one-armed bowl serving because back in those days you didn't necessarily have a bicycle in most your life would and if weren't fashionable to get a bicycle quite gratifications from bicycle-ground a reply practitioners in the early years of his account towards opened a belt engine shop a few doors from my house.

It was a neat place to hang around until I discovered that bangers-on were refreshed only as long as they made themselves useful, and that a sharp tongue never you practising when you become a customer, which in my case was rather quickly.

Twenty years later I got to know "CCP" as recondition of his detailed house. He then alone retired and came out of retirement, and was my fellow-employee at the home town newspaper office. Now in his late-sixties age he was forced to my work such as reporting, cast up and flagging around from "jobs" that please.

There was one memorable occasion when the shop owner insisted that installed an intercom system. Whether "CCP's knowledge was unfounded, nor was placed over him and suddenly a voice boomed out of him as gas" all his hot and gold wall.

There was not a moment's hesitation as southerner. CCP shot back a reply that would do justice to Power. he signed the Loyal Opposition on the front counter.

Anyway she knew town paper turned assistant and sales-man CCP last week. "C. P." Fenner of Shipdham celebrated his birthday Friday. He is 102 although he claims he is "only three-hundred. I've just had a year. The retirement terms over in 100 then you must sit over again.

"What advice would he give to anyone who wants to live to the ripe old age of 102? I mumble. give anyone advice. Anyone who lives to 100 would most likely be thinking one by is most asking me advice about it.

Can't say. He only shows feeling at 102, has grown hearing and still likes beer, it would be interesting.

9. Toronto, Ontario

Introduction to the world

"Tomorrow you always wear the same shirt, Ernie!"

The child's expression conveyed wide-eyed innocence, perhaps slightly overdone. Her mother grasped with mock distortion, and the puppet while plunged into silence. I humiliated almost beyond endurance, washed myself instantly dead — with the child also dead. But slowly and painfully.

"Mommy, what a thing to say!" scolded Mrs. Muir when she had recovered from the initial surprise of her child's impertinence, and such amusing questions. "You were given but a number of shirts like that."

Bad-faced. I was cornered ugly and indignantly asserted him that this was the case, aware that everyone knew and knew that I knew they knew that the truth lay somewhat closer to Alistair' question than to Mrs. Muir's charitable explanation.

In fact I had two almost identical-colored shirts. I wore each on alternate weeks while the other was being laundered.

I was 8 my I was rich as when when I left Strathcona for Toronto and fortune in early July of 1941. But I had four or five work shirts and perhaps three white shirts for "Sunday" wear. Mother decided I had been here two more durable shirts and ordered them, out of my money, through the Eaton's mail-order.

This act would before I moved to ten, as clothes that one laundered in the sink and hung up to dry. For a young man living in a boarding house there was no alternative (that I was aware of) to the Chinese laundries that abounded. So I hadn't been in Toronto long before I discovered what Mother had suspected that he greatly-laundered shirts I had worn at home didn't stand many laundry weddings. They simply fell apart one after another.

Mother knew matters a good deal better well when she ordered those buttercup shirts. At the time of Alistair's devastating question I had already been in Toronto well over two years' all the shirts except one white one had long been tendered, and the buttercup shirts were still rendering yeoman service on a weekly in-reverent basis — and holding up well, Chinese laundering notwithstanding. And I still couldn't afford to buy me a replacement shirt.

Thank you Timothy Eaton!

I mention this incident first not so much because it so deeply and painfully etched into my memory — which it is — but because it seems to me to punctuate the realities of life as my own as I discovered it. I never suffered but if I had expected instant success (not unreasonably I did), I was quickly disabused.

Toward the end of World War I young people from Steinbach who went to Winnipeg to work over-used the weekends finishing spare clothes, studying safety-matches and with bulging billfolds feed from the vast cornucopia of people working as war industries a fabulous range of pay and with overtime gobbled at time-and-one-half and double-time

A six-month correspondence course in advertising from the International Correspondence Schools seemed me, I fatally believed, with sufficient training to assume me of honest revenue to some lucky Toronto advertising agency. Having read several Theodore Smith books in which the protagonist usually an advertising executive went everywhere by taxi it was my naive belief that I would live in similar style, and my sincere hope that I would retain more humility when spoiled by this sort of living

It didn't take me long to discover that I would retain a lot more humility than I had started out with

But I guess I'm getting just a few steps ahead of myself.

Until D-Day in late spring of 1944 it appeared to people of my age, and probably many others, that the war would last forever. So didn't expect very far on to think beyond enlistment when I pressed eighteen so late 1945 and perhaps earlier with parent consent I could cross common near-tears of self-pity as on my imagination I had a glorious death in defence of freedom.

D-Day changed this perspective of my future and I began to lay plans alternate to a courageous death. When V-E Day and Americans victories in the Pacific theatre made the prospect of an early peace a reality I had to look to new escapes from Steinbach, which to me represented a future of unthinkable monotony.

Several of my friends began to make plans to "go East" and by the end of June it had all shown to the Continental and myself getting on a train for the first time in our lives in Winnipeg, bound for Toronto. If we return you wanna like a sunday ago to leave the family hearth I now agree. Mother too was opposed but I argued that with summer vacationing from the war all the desirable jobs would be taken if I let another year slip by I also used the argument the bank of my mother had gone to Winnipeg to work as maids in similar ages The situations were not really analogous, but I won the day and received reluctant consent.

So off we went to Toronto on a crowded dirty smelly and hot day coach, with addition clinging on the overhead baggage racks. Big expectations of the Golden East lowered which we were hurtling sufferred the moment we crossed into Ontario. He never fully recovered

Easy interest considerations more quickly separated me as a be able to get employment on a Hamilton construction job and maybe it be good to return to Steinbach as soon as he had earned enough money for the ticket. I quickly settled for a job as power feeder in a printing plant in Toronto Eaglebrook several advertising agencies, but was dismissed with a shake of the head and an odd snide each that One manager kindly suggested that, with my printing background I might do worse than get a job in advertising production to be pleased it, until I got the feel of Toronto.

I quickly saw the wisdom of this suggestion I hoped me to see how swiftly my financial reserves trickled away While our home had had a thrifty lifestyle as we economized and remained from a job a the Fox had been totally stable. It had been required to save over most of my new first all my needs had been provided — even the clothes I wore.

Needless to say, the switch to a cash economy where nothing happened without laying out money could fairly be described as culture shock in the extreme Somewhere on the back of my mind there may even have flickered a faint realization that our mother's responsibilities had been enormous, and her high degree of them remarkable.

The first thing I did was open a bank account dispensing sufficient funds to buy a ticket back to Manitoba and have left to security I vowed never to touch it until I either fell somewhere I meant or was ready to throw in the towel.

Finding a place to stay was another issue My family had and no experience in this and so had been unable to advise me I prepared yet set out best from the railway station and checked out the phone displaying "Room for Rent" signs on the window. That's what I did and it worked too. Rooming houses within walking distance of Union Station were not luxurious, but the prices were affordable. The room I took was my worthy but not filthy, bed-sit in the second floor of a semi-detached old house on Spadina Avenue, many street lights and close to the old Hartford Theatre. Rent was $18 a month and I got the laughing without a shudder of revulsion.

My first job was at a medium sized printing shop on Adelaide Street, just west of Bathurst Street. The owner, after considering my credentials, interviewed a short-fed cellulite person and her eight months I stood at that press. Six and a half days a week feeding about 1,500 sheets an hour into the press, until it was time to break up the machine next morning time.

No, I didn't rate taxis to and from work. I was grateful to be within reasonable walking distance of my rooming house. It saved me street car fare. My pay was twenty-two dollars weekly and the government took over three dollars of that for unemployment insurance, income tax and compulsory savings in temporary measure to ease money for the war effort).

Eight weeks flips at Arthur-Boyce-Pearce were almost enough. I was stocked to the nose when a printer self-caught to be my father brought me a beautiful solidarity. Such solidarity was only encountered in Steinbeck, too, but the movements did not long about clean on the job, and Steinbeck not to many agents. I was eagerly shall no where a prevalent who had worked on newspaper and knew that shop hunted about he could and I and friends had shops at night. On one occasion they had been to deploy the wood as a result of a police union demanded to know from the head of the alley, with they were doing. "Loading wood," they replied with the cop and left. He wasn't, by no worker explained with a shuffle about to get into an argument with a group of boys armed with baseball bats. It's silly to be suicidal with the cops.

While returning servicemen did not bring about a revival of depression conditions as many had predicted, they brought a quick end to the seller's markets in employment, as if the days of unlimited overtime hours were also serving as a history. It seemed almost overnight that there came to work wearing the uniform of one of the branches of the services, and curiously on the whole military posts such (often) almost identical and relatively benefits into the ranks.

At night I would eat supper — the cheapest on the main — at one of two little "greasy spoons" on Queen Street, then forked myself into my room and read or just sat there until I was ready to sleep. Once or twice I ventured into the street on the evening, but the kind of people who hung around taverns and stores were no one I'd like to meet socialized in seeing to drinkers. Sundays, Mondays I hoarded simply to the nights and so on.

In the morning I must 90 the same routes on the breakfast consisting of two sandwiches I ate during the noon rest, so no more but I didn't know any people to anything to patronize as normal, and has none settled that I be easy my route origins.

It was my one of those restaurants that I hesitated to use a first telephone. I had no choice. A friend was trying to phone for a taxi and, not wishing my own will, dismantling assistance. The waitresses were busy so they asked me to help the man. I almost passed out. Red I learned. That's how I learned a lot of things I guess. wasn't the only one. A year or two later one of the old Trumbush crowd visited Toronto and looked me up. He had a room at a cheap hotel several miles from my boarding house. He asked how I was getting on. He didn't know which street one to take and what the fare was. And of course asking would herald his as a busybee.

One day an older employee at Arthur-Boyce-Lind (he called it Arthur-Hyphen-Gherkin-Brown-Ltd.) asked a few casual questions about my lifestyle and engage of I find a boarding house through the usual ads. He kept at it until I took the step and looked out on my floor by. At "Mother Beaver's" I paid $7.50 weekly for a clean room (shared with male tenants) a hearty breakfast and a tasty (if unvarying) supper every night.

The Beaver house was no lodge. Trust a quiet, clean, tenant-aware, and the other five boarders were normal, decent people. I felt as though I had been accepted out of hell and dropped into paradise. (By the way please don't tell my friend mean Emilia Rood or Indian Grove. Indian Trail existed and still exists. It is only two blocks long but was block south of Bloor Street and trans-east from Bonfire Grove through Indian Road to Allandale Ave., which is the first street west of Dundas Street where the latter intersects Bloor Street.)

Our boarding house

memoirs January 12 1983

If you've never lived in a boarding house, the way thought of it may make you nauseate. If you have, you'll probably agree — depending on your luck and it can be one of life's more interesting experiences.

The ones we rode up against where you have to use an ice or a bone steamer if it actually rained, by (the theme) you learn to appreciate people from many different backgrounds and in almost personal circumstances.

"Damp-proofing. From dry to wet as I did on my younger days. I lived in a number of boarding houses, ranging from rowdy to excellent but the ones that people remember as my kind are like this.

Maybe there aren't that many in the subsequent "digs" but in our age range from rather grim circumstances as adults living's appearance, I found myself when I went to Toronto in mid-1957.

A few months short of 18 it should have been what had never stopped, overnight anywhere except in a mother's home. Home only that I couldn't afford to stay at home.

I took a room in a rooming house until I landed a job three blocks from the Parliament Street Library and then I settled the streets as the crow sees it from the Toronto Star," maybe in a residential landscape.

Although, until the meantime it stood out to accept a room where the bath had been torn out to the floor by the previous tenant. I, a worthless landed as an ugly girl to the house on Sparkman Ave. near Queen St. east or two doors from the Parkdale Theatre. It wasn't actually the most savory part of Toronto.

Because the rooms were let on transients, so the really families there I ever saw after working hours and the life of the family and Bakka broker who owned it in the house.

After several months of the necessary in the sleep took place and augmented I might in better off and financially about it. I found a boarding house through the want ads.

An ad would have it, the first ad I remember and that still had the room available, was a charming cozy-cozy brick house on a short residential street called Indian Road, a few blocks from High Park.

It was run by a widow and her two sons and grand and two-or-less. Breakfast every morning consisted in fruit or juice, cereal, bacon and eggs, toast and coffee. And I ate it all. We were on our own for lunch, the supper was considerably more beef and vegetables, with dessert the same strange from day to day.

The boarders included two radio college students about my own age in total and the mother family disadvantaged from the RCAF. It was food-off our hands by my brother and as a army man trying to run his own working business.

They were a fun bunch. We played bridge at night, watched through High Park by Saturday Night, on Sundays went for evening coffee and usually wound up on actual talking about our great plans. The younger man never tried a different night since as much, but were caught by Member Reader who let us borrow in an unobtrusive man and we were exceedingly acceptable friends.

It was wonderful at 18 back! It's always been an a social where I felt safe getting out at night to have with the neighbors who might as least and as great big, and as much the wonderful arrives in cooking food in my age in the morning and most little is right.

It was like heaven to me.

And it for $7.50 per week!

Then — bingo! — of course. The radio college boys graduated and moved out, the unemployed was worker left town at their brother job, and eventually I was moved on over some real or imagined grievance. Perhaps it didn't matter quite so homey with a change of tenants every few months.

There were few boarding houses after the first one and become institutional about. But there were, nevertheless great ones, well that one and people in them andlie boarders

memoirs January 19 1983

Last week I wrote about my first boarding house. It was really my introduce to bed with a subsequent of month the people with whom I shared this and other boarding house. Space does not, however, and I passed them over with barely an introduction.

Except for 3. It came on Indian Road in Toronto one street, one shaped by two radio college students about my age who about the same as mine. Both with their responsibility.

One C. and Gerry T. were as different as they and might ever be by compatible. Gerry was particularly city-farm boy from Guelph. A mature heterosexual, well-liked and very attentive. Gerry who and joined the RCAF just in time to be discharged over a fever-ear, full of fun and always on the move. He was to the top in his class, whether listening to by. You while Cramer never doubted his ability to get a job, even into another fell in or conversation well because of couples. Gerry was an looking in confidence and he as we can be spoiled for a home job, the worst back on the Gerry job he had lived in Rutgers Park before we he joined up.

I exchanged a few letters with Gerry over last years. He was working as an assistant engineer in northern Quebec. That ended it until a few years ago, when I found myself in my home town, terrified by the aging process and got hit sideways. By this time he was in semi-retirement with his field at Bracebridge.

We met for a beer on my next visit to Toronto but after a leisurely couple of hour bleat and listening that he had yesterday returned and from Canny could in Kingston Pickerel Rod was his latest love, we found our way by mid-afternoon to the Royal York Hotel.

Also at the R. York is J. C. Bay, the well-connected Canadian-American Whose interests in the war shortage had all of a war glaze. Where it took or two fits one still, the pair a few days' work here and there — giving lumber interviewing or volunteer — and finally had to have the Boarding House because he couldn't afford it.

When he had money he spent it, when he didn't have it he went without. One of my lingering memories of him has him sitting comfortable a chair having the royal treatment of his New Yorks.

Until recently I'm up every few months. He might be having luncheon and come to interview enough for his next meal. The acts take his would show up in what desks, rope kit, mend his boots, and invite an getting the gas extinction his new self-paying job.

In the last time I saw him was in Vancouver. My work shortly to be outside a plum glass window facing Pender St. and one day my landlord was caught by a passing in the glass. There was both, in a flash; and said, new hat and shoes and even new sing glasses.

We went out that night and celebrated whatever good fortune had landed on him. I never saw him again, as he soon left town.

Talking Bob's photo in the Toronto boarding house was Murray B. I added him, the first day in myself, and I would see more. Murray B. is a man with it's your own business when or you're from

We never got to be first friends.

A survey on smacking
summary April 2 1960

A survey form, received recently from the Smacking Institute of Canada, issued to good old Toronto Taxpayers to establish a cause and effect subsidy which between smacking and being hospitalized.

They were, I chose to get as much out of me, since I like to sing, like I'm entirely three squares a day, smacking that victim, if needed is to my group-related line combined.

When I returned last the while, while would Toronto's second months short of my fifth birthday I noted we're the privately wage of $20 weekly. Since the war was on, all on the government took about 50 to income last. A couple of years pay-raises and compulsory savings lowering me $30 for years and hoard, families (not included with bonus), bachelor salaries (at least one every ten months), entertainment and shaving. And of course, especially, the vital necessity income to be at the top of the list, because of the making of was a big priority

That what to was the custom is my particular boarding house, the guys went to the Granny Spoon after an evening "something" to top off the days of "something" was a five-cent cup of coffee and that with the extra sandwiches. But, my profligacy might overthrow to results my to the dinner table.

Fortunately, my fellow boarders included two young ladies (or Dear Hitchens) and a sharp who had just been laid off at a new brewery on the poor pensioners to this complement with every beer.

So that, as I have said, is about I say the coffee or a dime for my normal aberration from austerity.

So why does my conversation suddenly stop as said this "How soon you can remember back to April either you were already drafted for the war and remember you years time when you were waiting a daily meal dollar and could barely save for clothes, rental (meaning and allowance) so you could visit you teeth take a fully dental?"

And how come you don't remember that to this same period. I may not be entirely accurate — perhaps without either a copy in Chatterton or the treatment of Rose Street and Davenport Road that served the best and biggest savings of Bonnie room pie in Toronto?

And those beautiful walks through High Park on Sunday afternoons. Do you think perhaps this might have been on account of your mind hadn't been on the dangerous days of Stonybrook Beach at the foot of the Don?

My memories of 60 million Total are good. But there comes a time when familiarity breeds at least a need for change, and after one year I found half's dozen blocks or a boarding house a few doors north of Bloor Street opposite High Park. I stayed there until leaving Toronto some eighteen months later.

On the south side I switched from the consistency of green-reading to a composing room apprenticeship at Warren Business Forms in Mount Dennis a suburb of Toronto. Warren's was a company that seemed dedicated to regime at on principles of high efficiency that scrapped a list of printing trade traditions and taboos, and policies that sought good employee relations. Activities such as staff bowling leagues, corn roasts and dances were encouraged rewards were offered for suggestions by employees, and warning conditions were generally speaking good for that period. In the booming postwar market, the company was growing by leaps and bounds, and with a company policy the favored in-house training in bringing in newcomers, the once-puzzling room was made up of a young crowd. Under an easygoing foreman Ed Brown, we had a lot of fun and got a lot of work done.

The traditional trade unions did not, as yet, seem not encouraged to become interested at Menzie's and a so-called "company union" instituted on behalf of all at once. "In name" employees.

Given my background I tended to be suspicious of unions and felt uncomfortable at the thought of having to join one. I remember harbouring something of my ignorance and suspicion when one of the committees asked me to attend a closed meeting. I didn't know what a closed meeting was, and one of the composing room jokers, obviously having some intuition about my background and it was not at a religious gathering for the Salvation Army. Word got around and on the whole department was singing "Onward Christian Soldiers" with several of the employees beating their aluminum lino gauges (resisting rulers) on metal lamp shades. They were a bit too obvious as it wasn't quite taken as intended the closed meeting and discovered the union was not composed of fiery fanatics. In fact I became quite interested in the union and joined the rest of the compositors as their one of the International Typographical Union (ITU) one of the oldest and the first one of the most powerful and democratic trade unions in North America.

By spring of 1948 I had reached the journeyman level on the pay scale and life however pleasant, began to be altogether too routine. Reading over a weekly police briefing, symphony concerts at Massey Hall , the movies and the occasional dance, swimming at Varsity Stadium in winter and hikes through High Park on Sunday afternoons and occasional hitch-hiking excursions around the reasonable vicinity on weekend but I suppose for a young and single person that is never quite enough.

Other factors deprived a greater length in the next chapter. also had their effects with the result that one brisk April morning in 1948 I found myself with four strangers on an automobile headed, via the United States, for Vancouver and a new life and new adventures.

Back, wed and almost domesticated

It was one and one-half years later that I returned, prosperity matured and ready to settle down, to Toronto if not resolved to spend the rest of my life a thirty-six hour restricted it was as good a place as any on which to live until life brought us to a new turn of the road

As happened when I first descended upon Toronto five years earlier where I expected to radio to and from work to train. I found it necessary to demand a few reasonable promises.

Postwar prosperity had as noted none-dollars-ness in advertising business. Moreover, was not yet necessary to the marketplace and daily newspapers were enjoying one of the greatest booms of their history. Journeymen printers especially in the U.S. constituted a vein that were desirable and as an unmarried young man enjoying these rules, I fell into the trap of thinking my talents really were worth what I was being paid

So, returning to Canada and Toronto, where trade conditions had not yet caught up with the United States either in employment opportunities or pay scales it was a sobering experience to return to earth and find under more realistic conditions besides learning the hard way there was living in clover in one

As long as I had been "in training," I had never had to or chosen to look beyond the inevitable day when I would settle down somewhere and what opportunities, if any I might then seek

But very quickly after our marriage, living in wedlock in any where we had four separate rooms, we started wondering out loud whether working day after day as a journeyman printer was the ultimate expectation. Jones had taken it question but he these days a woman's talents except as ears ministers did not command such large incomes except

It is not surprising the our thoughts quickly turned to the weekly newspaper industry and particularly the lifestyle it offered hard work a modest but sure return, and a fascinating involvement in a small community

We took stock of we assets manager had gradually some collected than those of most professionals of that period and enthusiastically looked into the market. We quickly learned that our business simply wouldn't equal the down payments required for any newspaper on the market.

At the Canadian Weekly Newspapers shandoned office than on Brunswick, the manager gave us a look-be-complied appropriate for our circumstances. The Gananoque Reporter, on the St Lawrence River just below Lake Ontario was offering for sale the Athens Reporter at a price — I mean at remember — of $2,000. Although $3,000 in 1960 was a lot more than it is today it still wasn't an impossible investment. We agreed that we might even be able to swing without much of a loan.

I wrote the Gananoque publisher —I still wasn't thinking long-distance telephone in those days — and anxiously awaited the reply. Although I was seeing half-honest, if not prospective demand the owner. The answer came remarkably on the been of a galley proof prepared by classmate my unnecessary letter-writing over this asset

The opening line went like this: "The Reporter' like Athens itself still never be big business." It then went on to describe it dying circulation and a collection of obsolete newspaper equipment. Issued-set type (sorts for tools), an ancient cylinder press, and other equipment common to a typical-for-century mid-town printing office. I hadn't even been considered worth meeting at the Gananoque plan where the Reporter was printed every week. The annual revenue about equalled the asking price but the optimistic assessment of the vendor was that the figure could be increased by a couple thousand if work diversified to improve the paper and champion the community

Even my rose-colored glasses lost their tint at the thought of paying for the privilege of the pain of an working unsold hours on antiquated equipment for a gross return of less than I was earning in a forty-hour week. We reluctantly abandoned our quest for independence "for a few years, a bid we worked at hard up upon assets.

Frustrated in my aspirations I handselled my energies into my International Typographical Union membership, acquired as my "stamping" days, and a thrash devotion to the union's laws governing many aspects of work and hiring practices in my printing office building a contract with the union. In the long run this won me popularity with neither management nor the union.

In the meantime hopes of buying weekly did below the become when the inevitable prominence surrounded. Suddenly it became a matter of finding an apartment at a rent which would accept children — including the who would at this a home.

The National Housing Act (NHA) came to the rescue with 6% percent mortgages for three-side dreams up with a one-third down payment. We barely qualified through belonging car and some comparable assets from had acquired and taking on a second mortgage at a higher (six percent) interest rate.

I still did not have it sturdy position at the Toronto Star but was evolving on reasonably well as a substitute or extra line operator. We moved into our Toronto flow bungalow in fall and handed over a basic waiter who I missed more days than I worked at the supply at the was greater than the demand

Every an rating we would "show" at about seven when the earliest shift went to work, and sit around playing bridge until shortly after nine when the last morning shift went to work. One operator would stay until quarter after the starting time for an alcoholic operator who could be counted upon to miss at least one day a week the rest would head for coffee at Woolworth's and then home to bill your could meet morning wake-up.

In addition to the shortages and approaching parenthood, we were faced with the imperative immediate necessity even to have a new house. Our house-hunting days were supplanted on the forenoon and luckless light features haunting classroom for the winter (and, storm windows, or anything else that conceivably could be classified as an extra. Landscaping consisted of field and thoroughfare, consisting of baked North York clay and allowed to find the small urban garbage can pre-ordained.

Blessed Communistic Event

Saturday, November 2nd 1946

An acquaintance who has managed to raise together some little loose money in his small area in central Etobicoke came over to see me. He lost everything the next month but he was a man who could not be beaten.

Just now having to carry out the duties every day to wash all manner of laundry.

By this time, June 1, I'd spent that momentous morning hauling load of rubbish to the small type of contraption of pile at the Sun Oil company and I'd placed the brochure from our two years' saving with a letter like number of letters what you want in. Above all features spent on the house fighting with electricity between agent.

I do not see going in my acquaintance with the heating system I grew up with. I like that was a distinct sentimental attached even the standards of those times. This, however, we made do with what we could afford, and that was a must.

Before going married I had lived for some years at boarding and rooming houses that after marriage we lived for a year at a council house in a private house, at these accommodations have rooms for meals, in contrast. It was strong and early fall, to gramatic about over as under-heating for we found I had no hot-water was with the coal lighting as well-eating.

There were the problems, we moved into an area here brought in suburban Toronto, and we — in great independence.

I might add that I was so unprepared for virgin independence that I thought we would were placed in by the city. A furnace. Very backward, was something that was local terms. You live in Edinburgh in northward fashion, and you assumed the heating is habitually when you go around to it.

The house we moved into had to be the best house built in greater Toronto with a plain, old-fashioned hand-sized furnace. I never learned to master the heat that shot before your could have.

We came home we banked up fire we woke up to a cold house at the morning. When you were down to stoke in the morning you found that either the fire had died with out, the coal was not to have been ranged, so the fire had polished up all the coals in it into that innocuous looking fine-like ashes.

The latter situation was better of course because one was you could shovel all the ashes and clinkers into the ash-bucket, and start from scratch. The issue was it was necessary to at least produce to separate ashes and clinkers from unused coal, having a mess to clean up and the furnace shotted again.

The normal condition of the house was cold and gloomy however even if the fire was burning merrily away and you certainly functioning something like a furnace. Then occasionally and usually on a mild day the furnace would decide to live up to its first potential and heat up the place to the point where you expected the whole house to shrink again.

As I said, it, you brought it under control by spending some dead air into the cellars to inhibit the fire. The weakest of means, the produced a crust of clinkers that could be removed by an iron-rod or one fashioned instead of filling the fire. Then you were back to square one.

Yes, there is nothing so beautiful as mountain here even during the most difficult time. It applies up when in recent inexperience.

Especially something is the luxury of saying on the fire you intervening, "I think we could have a touch of heat." So you insist the fire-poker to "on" and a few minutes later you have heat.

Without there is none.

Joys of the first home

Saturday, October 26, 1946

The other day my wife and I had occasion to reminisce about our first home and the glories of taking possession of it.

This is not a hard-luck story since both of us belong to the first generation of postwar home seekers and the cost of the postwar home assumed by our elders for the most of which we fell both in luxury.

Our first home was modest.

People not much older than us gave up during the depression, would have considered it a magnificent a result for gleefully low wages and when they assessed their present value our humble abode they could take cash for, some thumb tweak and mortgagees as those days were unusually accident about.

A larger house with balconies like running water came, and as when the family was half grown.

So now we have, having borrowed a trade in the final years of the war but the immediate postwar years with our assessment of houses for jobs, earning what was considered a princely wage and buying a brand-new home on suburban Toronto after only one year in a furniture for.

Not exactly hardship or pioneer trailblazing.

Memories even in Rhodes, I guess of affairs gradations. Inside anywhere stuck almost every one has and personalities, and on ownership was out of the question: we cannot fly but in make sure can remain development was turned by public transportation. If gas up to and from work. No problem, we were initiated by the tuition. A small the company provided bus service from 6 a.m. to midnight every half-hour commuting with the Toronto Transportation Commission in between Toronto.

The reader won't jog either The seven-minute after a bathtub, Allowing for regular leisure and breakdowns by the vintage vehicles. But when neither of us could locate was and the first two morning bus runs were unpredictable even with schedulations and would be consumed two hours after we opened and the doors.

That left hitch-hiking for a year or whatever it was to get early worker's moment At it happened, I developed several "regulars" who enjoyed the car every morning if I hadn't caught on another ride and who depended on downtown or within TTC distance of my job.

There were other surprises.

We had been above the water heater in the basement which caught me somewhere because I had always supposed that hot water was provided through the city's steam main by some magic process. Didn't connect in underground.

To our horror, however, the water from the hot water tap didn't even get warm no matter how long we let it run. Naturally we complained to the caretaker pointed out that the heating element didn't come with the lease — only the main, and that we would have to buy our own.

A number of things didn't go with the house, such as interior painting, light fixtures and heavy wiring, the rest we had known about.

The light fixtures had been purchased, and in the country shopping was a real thrill. On my way home from work I would leave the streetcar near Vaughan Road and St. Clair and for from the stop for the North York bus I would travel to stand in line to wait for the suburban bus, then every half-hour but perpetually late. It took a big under ten hours, my arms still sore at the memory.

Work? Sublime it's like that wasn't that wonderful driving my first winter and particularly not finding the sounds of cars like Second arrived, when I didn't catch a single duty a week. But we survived and learned and adjusted

Let's sing Inside a gas gathering, was another joy I think the hardest work I ever performed was turning over the hard pan of the backyard in preparation for seeding to grass.

We unbelievably and expectantly cut a three-foot hole into the ground and filled it with white peanut for support, planted some perennials and waited for them to turn our yard into a state of color and fragrance.

On my mother-in-law's first visit, and long after I knew I had the greatest sun that any garden wasn't during all that well. I admitted that it wasn't up to my own expectations but that one plant was doing exceptionally well

"That's because it's a weed, explained Grandma, and pulled and the throwing plant

That woman's gardening skill was something! She could break up a spot of soil, throw in a cutting, give it a pat and a splash of water and before you knew it it was a handsome flowering bit of greenery.

Suburbia, as we know it today could well be called a phenomenon of the postwar era and the accompanying prosperity. Postwar cities had suburban residential areas which tended to be rather dense affairs. Small lots on which to set without causing undue crowding. Houses were of a modest means, providing low-cost but adequate shelter housing for people in low-paying jobs or in professions. Like small towns, they offered single life up the ladder of middle class to those who are ambitious. They were sometimes described as rural slums, although they offered a more dignified alternative to the tenements of the inner city. For families had cars and those who did could get afford to drive them regularly to and from work. Thus the grocery and liquor and coffee shops, and the retailers for that matter lived in graded residential areas within the city, using mostly public transportation to get to and from work. Type of land for city use was zoning in formal terms.

Postwar prosperity and the automobile combined to create suburban subdivisions on a broad and planned scale. Blocks of homes were built on speculation at the same time by one or several contractors and would go on the market at about the same time. They tended to be populated by families with several things in common. they were usually fairly young with small children, had sufficiently well-paying positions to qualify them for mortgages, and were new to the relaxed confidence of the midlife.

These similarities were not unlike those of an atomic group settling in one particular section of a large city as a strange country their common background and analogous circumstances tended to throw them together.

On the whole this made for congenial communities, although the human tendency to overdo things sometimes produced a backlash.

We now an exaggerated example of familiarity breeding contempt between two couples who lived next door to each other directly across the street from us. From the moment they met, they seemed to hate each other with claws as blood-brothers and sisters. They were in each others homes constantly interrupted everything that was between them, helped each other build fences and install storm windows. They took sports together and the two would expect within a family.

One Sunday was that family at Sheet to the east of family "B" and both their doors were on the western sides of houses situated to maximize on the sun. Now No. A" was considerably busy about his driving block, and both families obviously had to cross its lawn many times daily as they stepped back and forth between houses.

One afternoon between showers, the A" s lawn seemed to be in better condition. He had a fountain with arrows his lawn from his driveway to that of the B" s. So they could both continue their heavy traffic without damaging the fragile blades of grass.

Time went on until one day we became conscious of a difference. The "A" and "B" were not running back a forth any more. At first we thought that they simply had just finished a bit with each other. Then one day we saw Mr. B" s wife in his garden talking quite animatedly to Mrs. A" s, picking up the flagstones from his lawn and replacing them with sod.

The "B" moved away with a for another two.

It was and

Back in Toronto Star had the necessity my involvement with the union and the prospect of using it to bring the subject was got no jobs but worse with both the company and the union, each having borrowed to live with the other's imperfections. I ended up almost losing my job, and a comparison settlement left my chastened and reflective and my personal sensitivities began to veer more in favor of the middle of the road in my attitudes and outlook.

Before leaving Toronto I served a one-year term as deputy chairman of the congregation to the chapel (assistant shop steward might describe it better for most). This experience as director between the employees in a department store 250 comparisons, and management left me with varied feelings hostile toward neither but regretful that the relationship between organized labor and wearing power might not have been channelled into more mutually beneficial initiatives than the adversary stances that have become a basic in our society.

In large newspapers were the decision, these two had much journeys between management and interested staff that dressed opportunity to both. With the experience men in the country union man did not appear to say apparent position to above department foreman (in scope in FTU affiliate), while management were off wider men for me old-scope positions that favoring found the potential and abilities of thousands of talented employees.

Strange decisions also developed as steps-master that existed chosen in a vacuum. For example, the Sir corresponding room was visited regularly (although not often) by a focus fourteen cubic at The Bargain offering stolen merchandise as a tenant-in-person. It was used — but I have no first-hand knowledge of that — that he first visited the foreman's office giving how first refused, that stockroom himself so elegantly as a corner of the composing room and displayed his wares. He even took orders for future delivery and, on occasion, made other small appearances.

Bookmaking was also carried on openly as if the bookie seemed to be generated jobs that had the flexibility to accommodate the demands of this calling. I say overtime another the local women one top management knew nothing of these activities, but admitted it by allowing the department to become an eyesore as its own right.

Spare their jobs in doing
RAMSEY Cooke 21 1971

Some year ever considered how many old sayings and expressions can now true and ever accepting them as gospel because they are so familiar but never really stopping to examine them?

Take the one about not swapping horses about people behind their backs, that if you have something unmanageable in my about a person you ought to say it directly to their face.

I suggest this rule has validity chiefly because no person in my my something behind someone's back, and one of the persons to whom you spoke your mind is sure to take the matter down to the subject and create more ado and — slightly garbled and exaggerated — out of control.

My philosophy on this point — as more as I am here pounding it — stems from an old feelings operator with whom I worked for several years a few decades back.

He was long departed, was a character. No one was sure when to figure out whether he was completely mad, he possessed that rare type of historical sense of humor which allowed him to laugh merrily at the ignorance of the people surrounding him.

Ken had occupied the track hair a thirty-type mechanic building block type apart that would have nursed have rate as comedian at the of not exercise and happy home like waging between years from his than with the people.

He loved to go from one another to the next carrying many tales from his fellow workers because and like "There" Dave grading off again and hearing all his work ran me to do. And back at the

Then he would quickly confess you not to tell Dan. "It's all right to say nasty things about people behind their backs," he would say seriously. "That way it doesn't stab them. But if you tell them to their faces it hurts their feelings."

Naturally the game was to corner Dan at the first opportunity and tell him that Ken this called this a no good jagged. Then, who had played the game for years, would put on his resignant face and march straight to Ken and demand to know why Ken had said nothing things mate this

What the one of us wondered from a shotgun Kenworth system his fortune with a wealth of gentleness, foreman made something and a try or two for the opinion. He would explain, we would state those, and we should not wherever to using everything he said this in fact to and had nothing his realize for them's acknowledgement but that it was fun he and real was goofing off.

The more would and walk Ken and Dan shaking hands with heavy laughter mouth back slapping and views of something friendship.

A few minutes later Ken would make his way back to the customer and berate him in turn anger. "How the did you have to go back to Dan when I told you not to. If you'd kept your mouth shut nobody would have known but it's too late now. Dan has his feelings hurt and he'll be feelings as he come and nasty from now and he'll do feelings as he come and nasty things to me and to my feelings. Get down you to record. I've shouldn't do things like that."

As I mentioned, we never learned if he was just pretending or not having secret belly laughs at us and our juvenile juvenile antics. But his philosophy remains with me

Just think of what a less-like world — would be if everyone was forever telling you every little thing wrong with you.

I would rather have my neighbors bowling in their heads that I'm a sloppy gardener and my lawn not a manicure. But have me to my face every time. Same goes my "Why don't you do something about your money your and put your hats out for salesmen?"

At home, our first daughter Penny was born and with a reduced mortgage burden, a property appreciated through improvement and paid-up second-hand car and bike, and even a few dollars in the bank, we began to think think more about risking it all on a down payment for a small weekly.

We studied the ads in the dailies assiduously, and one day came upon one offering a weekly in a small town not far from Toronto. I took advantage of a mid-week day off and on a beautiful spring day set out to see and purchase this for a new life.

Halfway to my destination, the car started to make disturbing noises accompanied by a smell of burning oil. I pulled over, stopped the car, raised the hood and, cool sheer looking helplessly and wistfully at passing traffic — the usual signal of an unacquainted in distress — until a truck driver took pity and stopped. He turned out the ignition and successfully and shortly diagnosed the problem: my car had thrown a rod. I didn't know what a rod was, but knew that it ran right there.

Fire sale of business

Saturday, May 4 1968

Ruminating the other day about the problems one can sometimes melt until with the well-known fire sales, I realized one positive function that I brought to Penguin with the last weekend. It might well have been avoided some by the bulk.

For people accustomed consecutive of times to not everyone had an automobile, for many it was an the system somewhere after many other things had been taken care of.

One of my problems I suppose was that I already had one foot firmly into the era of the spoiled gasoline-alley: that is to say, I was able to buy a brand-new car when I was still single. Evidence: baby-fever.

Then along came wedded bliss and some of the realities that went with it. The upshot was that the car was needed to help provide the down payment for a home in suburban Toronto.

Time lived a few doors from us a middle-aged couple who drove an Austin. Three days July 30 thought that

Mrs. M. who had been in the habit of dropping in occasionally instead to see day to say that she was going with her children and for our company she could accompany and either

She thought for our would be just right for you, and, and the price sounded reasonable. And just as we wouldn't feel bad about cheating on with the car, she insisted that if we were fortunate we should go and see a statistical second fill at a garage specializing in foreign cars. The garage had always serviced her car, and Bill had taken a personal interest in keeping it shipshape.

Well, to put isn't every day that a deal like that appears on the horizon. So we discussed it at length, had a sleepless night and the following day I went to see Bill at the said garage.

Bill sent only confirmed everything Mrs. M. had said about the car but volunteered the opinion that it was just about the worst little car he had ever had the pleasure of working with.

Naturally we didn't love the economy sum, and in our straitened circumstances how he could see to suggested to carry a mortgage or loan. So we borrowed from our friendly banker bought the car — and lived happily ever after?

Retrospect

Mrs. M. presumably lived happily ever after. She moved to posh suburb in the direction of Toronto, while her new belongings — Bill the mechanic — never to be heard from again in their previous

I have seriously wondered whether her husband a death was really natural. Certainly there was nothing natural about the behavior of that clutch-and-brake Austin.

I was hungry, knew every number, getting the car started every morning, replaced every fluctuated part, and finally after I threw a rod on a country outing one cool 200 for it to a trade-in for another lump.

My search for friends, neighbors and professional advice

The breather gave me a gift be a capacity villages where I had a service station operator living and his truck and tow me my crippled vehicle (and part of the payment for down payment for a weekly newspaper). Where I heard the estimate for a repair. I knew the car would never be a down payment for anything but hardware, and it had already given me a few

But prepared to surrender so early. Harsh-lidded to my destination where I learned that those putting the paper up for sale. the owner had changed his mind and now wanted it to keep it.

The trip was not completely in vain, however. While waiting for the garageman to get a spare carburetor in the village where my car had broken down, I visited the weekly and found the publisher most encouraging, my household environment now quite taking. Perhaps it was my temporary humility that helped me.

Little while chatting with the supposed vanity-publisher: he said something that I later pondered about, and probably helped in a small way to temper my own attitude later when I finally became a publisher:

He nodded in the direction of a man coming out of a shop across the street and allowed that the man probably had difficulty shaving his face in public after the editorial he, the publisher, had written that week. I said of what the man's position was and foresaw that he was the first editor

"He just wants to tell me his little town has a full-page first class!?" I asked.

"Oh, no. He says that his town's status has just dropped out of

And I wondered what a vainglorious fine editor giving his own town an essential and thankless status quo; could do to wrong thing he does or said against me as the local paper

As a publisher I was to make my own mistakes by the score, and probably worse ones. But many times, even considering the misdeeds and fine edict in the 10 years town, I was to persevade myself, often in doubt, to err on the side of encouragement.

My dream of becoming a publisher again first started. I began to listen to the unwritten editorial in just any man on the street and guessing some years of age he does in Manitoba.

Within a year we cashed in our holdings in Toronto, tried out to break about a fifty percent out in salary and moved our family to Steinbach to a new life in the world of weekly newspapering.

The happy motorman

Montreal, May 12, 1982

Once upon a time I had a wonderful street car ride.

It was the evening I met Isher in Toronto, on a valuable, windy spring day, and street people passing on the car displayed expressions that showed they were just on the brink of blowing up in spring.

But Isher expressions changed... and by the time they reached their stops, most of them were breaking out of laughter from their eyes.

The motorman

The motorman was a very young man obviously in one of his first weeks on the job. He was a motorist wit, was improving himself immensely and obtained many one-stop, comment-ready on the passing scenes outside and inside the vehicle, selling funny answers, guessing and mimicking hopeless passengers with genuine humour. He wasn't a smart aleck. He was just a young [illegible] [illegible]

Perhaps an excellent one at that young guy he was refreshing under difficult circumstances, and in every needed for more no matter than good humor

I thought of him often, wishing that all motormen not to mention many other people in close contact with the public, were more like him.

There one day I boarded a street car and there he was driving.

I felt instantly elated and made a bright remark to him. At least I thought it was bright. My memory was a blank now and an impression that registered I was he none fond of a me.

It wasn't even a bad day. It wasn't even rush hour. and he was very down cramped.

I think, too, as a he knelt in the car as I could, had noticed the longest person I could find, and all has crowded under the seats.

It was a miserable ride, no fun at all no witty moments

I still wonder about that young motorman and what happened to him in the short course of a year. Admittedly it is the type of job which only he has and pursue for the first few months, and then the wear and tear of the daily-weekly-monthly grind takes its toll and humour out of it.

Perhaps [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

10. Itinerant printing

Westward and onward

While I look back on my move from Toronto to Vancouver in early 1962 as the first step on a path leading more visibly to my hand bookbinding, I felt no less think at the time. I was even certain I was familiar with the terrain to any modern reader.

My background could be adequately summarized in twelve words — a steady and reasonably satisfying job with authority. Financial reserves and home hearth and family exercise injunctions of moving the world had manifest something in me that would not be denied. I was happy with my job as a compositor at Hodder-Eastwood Printing, was earning a good salary for that period and for my youth — due to a rapidly achieved journeyman status — but I was also subject to restlessness that led me to undertaking expeditions for their own sake. These, in turn, reduced me to throwing a portion of my first paid vacation and the trip back from to Manitoba to hitchhiking from Chicago to Toronto when I returned. Something about that road experience — finding myself in unfamiliar places and sensing that the road led to wherever one's imagination and impulses might direct — that made me vulnerable or at least receptive to suggestions of a move to another distant world.

During my first year in Toronto, I had formed a casual friendship with Jim Colquhoun who worked in the offset printing department of Arthur-Jones Ltd. Jim lived not far from my boarding house and we went to the occasional show, concert or dance together. He had been in the RCAF long enough to receive some trades training. Perhaps it was the abrupt end of the war that left him with a sense of unfulfillment, or maybe it was ambivalence about the printing trade in his destiny perhaps there were unrealized self-doubts but whatever dark brew stirs they led him to commute from time to time about a change of scenery with a particular emphasis on Victoria — maybe because it was the most distant major Canadian city and so unlike familiar Canadian terrain and climate.

One blustery January afternoon Jim summoned me to Sunnyside Beach for coffee and doughnuts, and as we sat in the warmth of the diner while outside the wind harassed a light snowfall and dashed the grey waters of Lake Ontario against the breakwater several hundred yards distant. Jim produced a current copy of the Victoria Colonist and read me items about local citizens getting and engaging in other parents about which one could only familiarize to moderate interest of Canada.

The fateful book was for me, irresistible and it wasn't long before I was committed to a move before we came. But, by that time, had opened for us the extremely considering, a contest with the Toronto police force as I was on my own. I always surprised myself when I accidentally found myself in British Columbia although, as Vancouver, rather than on Victoria. To talk about the comparative attractions of two cities is a worthless job prospects quite another

Recognizing a mystery

MISSETTA April 17 1980

In spring of 1980 being of an age when almost must learn to use place around like a full-blooms. I wandered in migrant in that to the Canadian Mental Vancouver.

In those days, when cross-country hitch-hiking with all one's personal belongings was not yet in vogue, and using the rails no longer respectable, the most obvious form of transportation would be found in the Personal vendors of the daily papers whose well-intentioned complete plumbing, long trips offered ideas in exchange for driving assist and a share of the gas expense.

Hitchhiking a driver's license in the time I was hesitant down by a few inevitably managed to talk my way aboard by paying a few dollars more.

The driver was an ex-RCAF navigator who had taken in love with Italian Columbia fishing while stationed in that province and was fulfilling a pledge to return some day fishing vacation.

His attitude demanded that he spend a short time trip. (Terrace-Vancouver) plus his fishing time 5½ days, and because it was spring, road and weather conditions suggested a spring considerably south of the American route.

Actually he had hoped to drive night and day from his original being undecided and the territorial sample of the back seat my assignment to stopping and passing time of any interested on that left only the car interior and a young discussion from it suppose for driving duties.

We made it through the first day first night and second day before we stopped for the night in South Prairie, Utah, and the assistance that we actually had in the motion was driving. We saved the first day a film Nebraska, started Cheyenne by that, and drove most late that night through mountains, which were visible only as outside shadows.

We spent the night in Brigham City Utah, and I'll never forget the following morning when the pristine sky awoke in a setting, sunny spring morning and his first look in mountains as an unspent ground and almost surrounding the little community.

My last impression that morning was a little closer where the freshness of the house and night while we were from a night and the mirror inside the small town like a flower.

The waitress looked with us and with anyone else who came in — friend or stranger — in a way that seemed downright homey after modern Toronto and Montreal. The burghers of Brigham were fashionably concerning their sidewalks.

Some day I intend actually to unpack and purchase on food in with shall return to this charming little place.

"Some day" was a long time in coming. In fact, 32 years almost to the day.

In Salt Lake City for a few days last month I completed the schedule at work in a down in Brigham City.

Again, it was a beautiful spring day with the same gleaming on the mountain tops. Again, I was impressed with the fact that the town seemed cleaner and more attractive than most.

We also had consumers in stronger, fresher, shopping malls, chain stores down on the business, making instant and everything a in this, gain with the modern outside small community and except for the hamburger, was almost indistinguishable from hundreds of others.

I don't really blame the good people of Brigham City for hoping to stay the course. Just shouldn't have enough 75 years

Whatever discomforts in my nature might have prevailed upon me to make Vancouver my permanent home, full credits to the economic highs and lows that seemed to prevail at that city at the point in time. At one of the city's larger commercial printing plants — the job printing division of the Vancouver Sun — it seemed the wolf was always howling near the door discouraging thoughts of permanence. We might be working every evening and Saturdays, but many layoff was always imminent hovering just around the corner.

It was in Vancouver that I became a member of the International Typographical Union, and was introduced to the things dominant property by that powerful union in most newspaper and, many commercial composing rooms throughout North America. In ITU offices of that era, it unfortunate assumed that the employer was the chief adversary and that management existed mainly to provide work. Grievances per cheques and how and five journeymen — although the latter had to be done very unsupposedly.

I was also a city from which many of the printers who moved in from the Prairies were invisible the United States and the higher wage scales of cities such as Seattle and Portland. I became familiar too, and naturally enthralled with the ITU's skilled rules and the possibilities these offered for travelling and seeing the country while working.

I applied for an immigration lark with the U. S. consul but he turned me down after checking my bank passbook. Chad had shown $50 bank balances was a must for a single man entering the United States – about $150-000 in 1980 dollars – but he wouldn't confirm this.

It became my goal in life to get that precious visa and I visited the consulate every month to present my passbook and the growing balance. The interest was always the same: a queer shake of the head.

My departure from Vancouver may have been set forward by an incident at my boarding house one winter night that might have been more likely to find favour in a steam version by someone with little respect for the laws on probability.

I had been downtown spending more than was good for me. I walked the three blocks from the streetcar stop to the boarding house in about the inches of freshly fallen snow holding my homeboy trousers with the deliberateness of the inebriated.

The key slipped out of my hand and disappeared into the snow without a trace. I spent almost half an hour fruitlessly looking for it, before brought up on a load pole.

What to do?

You might think it would have been a simple matter of ringing the doorbell and explaining the situation to at unhappy landlady. Believe me, that wouldn't have been the end of it – even though I have Mrs. Ayers was unbelievably unsupervious. But the unsupervisedness that we may need to exciting an alternative also provided the wherewithal to make it seem possible.

The front door gave into a sizeable verandah – by roof of which my last point so two before the window of a room just vacated — conveniently — by another lodger.

Now if only I had a ladder. I thought, and if the weather proved to be potached I might still manage some unobstructed

Lo and behold! Leaning against the side of the house was a ladder of suitable length.

Quickly I thought I brought it around to the front of the house and leaned it against the porch roof. Unsteadily I scaled the ladder crawled across the small roof grasped the window and pushed upward

The window opened easily and quickly before more quickly than the expectation that suddenly presented itself in front of the half-opened window.

"Yes, Ernest," said a stern-visaged Mrs. Ayers who had dressed in sheets in the vacated room for the night. "What would you like?" Few intelligent answers presented themselves.

Mrs. Ayers was kinder than might have been expected under the circumstances, but she didn't seem dissatisfied when my employment came to an end a few weeks later and I chose to and my accumulated salaries in the Ayers, leaving Vancouver, rather than risking a repeat.

I took the ferry to Victoria on Vancouver Island. This might be considered my first "voyaging" step because it was the first move in a city to which I consciously had an intention of staying indefinitely.

This might be an appropriate time to inject an explanation of voyaging — an invented meaning — in the mid-20th century and the ITU laws, customs and traditions the trade it possible.

The General Laws of the International Typographical Union during the era, which became part of many approved contracts with composing room employers, gave every journeyman the right to engage a his or her trade any compatible position holding a skilled union working card.

Further, the laws stipulated that any overtime worked must be compensated paid on the composing room a shape bulletin board and when the equivalent of a shift a overtime and been accumulated the member must engage the first available substitute to cancel the overtime.

The trade initiated who wrote these rules into the by-book of the ITU and by succession into the agreements governing working conditions in most daily newspapers in the United States and Canada surely did not do so in give succor to fancy-free young adventurers using them to rustle about the country

But it certainly worked out the way for some of us and whenever our workers gently admonished us to think about the family men with a mortgage who had to stay off work to make room for us, our flippant answer was that we didn't make the rules, we were only using them.

Without attempting to educate readers in the history of the International Typographical Union or the printing trade it seems appropriate to give some background to the rules my generation of young printers used as well as our sweatshop. Without it people have deliberately unfortunately how we could have travelled from shy to shy making and finishing work for periods suitable to our easy code.

First of all going well back into the nineteenth century disciplines imposed on daily newspapers by the market and competition dictated that there be enough workers on hand to fill the pages which acted as another from the day to the day of breakdowns a composition probably could not assemble more than a column or two of type in a day so didn't take a great number of extra pages to require extra help.

Vacations tended to be heavy load, as are some day newspapers, the printers days off — usually called shore days — were scheduled in a way that united the number on duty each day to fit the cycle as much as possible. On one day newspapers in the days of the pre-day week this was not possible. There were also seasonal volume variations that were not always easy to adjust. To accommodate the varying loads newspapers introduced spare boards, an which unemployed printers might post their names to indicate their availability to work. To the union secretary these names were supposed to show the start of such availability possible hire. The practice was and undoubtedly other paper boards as the shape-up of longshoremen.

Employers usually insisted that a person holding a regular situation (steady job) could not take a day off without engaging a substitute to work in his stead. This led, eventually to the ITU limiting that none that members were required to assign substitutes when absencing themselves from he job for any reason, it must also be their right to fix as whatever competent substitute were available and with out the foreman's approval.

Eventually those rules and customs were used for work-sharing to compensate for layoffs. Since layoffs usually had to be effected a inverse order of seniority situations often arose that there were men to be retained to maintain the staff as paper might work in prime duringit being have manned, then, when a sudden decline in business caused a layoff the lowest was known by the junior employees

At such times obviously responsible for the introduction of the overtime accumulation and cancellation rules, printers who had retained their situations were required to hire the laid-off printers (after the latter had cancelled their own overtime) as substitutes to the extent of accumulated overtime posted. This gave temporary relief to the printers with low seniority and gave those breathing room while seeking alternate employment, leaving town to whatever economic load and personal circumstances dictated

In the postwar boom years, a newspaper composing room might have hundreds to even thousands of hours of overtime waiting to be banged off. When this was intended as a sudden against local times it was also an incentive for young printers to come in and work all the overtime, while regular fellows took that off

You might suppose that management would frown on children coming in and making themselves at home. But let's not forget that they too were benefitting in that the paper board made extra help available at regular rates in busy seasons.

I have heard or read that some filmstrips governed their travels by the timings of state legislatures. Since legislature proceedings had to be printed, and fairly promptly, was one reason what the timing did to the printing trade, particularly in the days of hand-setting.

Discrete troublemakers may also encouraged. I understand by some early guilds and by their successors, the trade unions in certain trades in some certain in a tradesman was not permitted upon completing the usual seven-year apprenticeship, to start work on his own society for one year. This was intended to place on count on all — master craftsmen journeymen fellow another and the apprentice himself — in matters that the apprentice's opponents was welltranslated and soon published too. It also broadened the newly trained tradesmen.

In Victoria, in 1949, I worked with at least one fine operator who had not required to work for a full year in another office before undertaking such tasks as he knew he could "invent his time." This kind boom in Calgary or Edmonton in the 1980s, but I don't know whether that was a local regulation or against trade practices of the period.

Until recently, to me, I believed that the word "journeyman" derived from the custom of itinerancy. However I find the root in the French "jour" (day) which rendered into "journey," which the dictionary defines as a day's travel or work. A journeyman, then, was a man who worked for a daily wage, as distinguished from the indentured apprentice who (formerly) worked for food, shelter and whatever his master's benevolence might add, or the master printer who contracted his labor by the piece or lot.

Nevertheless, there is a German word "Wanderjahr" (wander-year) which seems to dis-order the neophyte journeyman who is obliged to see his exercises abroad for about a year.

In any case the itinerant or tramp printer had been accepted as an integral element of the printing industry for a century or more before my time although the habits of the breed included inevitably a high percentage of alcoholism and other losses there were enough journeying-like travels of various sorts of members of the printing trade to make my own little trek, that one was initiated by most of the "homers" with more enthusiasm than envy.

Much time was lavishly on interesting jobs, having learned the trade in his brother's newspaper in Hannibal, Missouri and on his way to the capital city of where he was to find some weekend in St. Louis about one hundred years before I arrived there — not dreamed, of course, for Texas horizons.

But back in Victoria where I had just arrived on the Sunday ferry from Vancouver Boss after "allowing me" (establishing practice) at the National Press, I looked up Campbell Small, working as a proofreader at the government printing office. He had worked briefly on Boss's commercial printing plant in Vancouver where I had been hired off, but had left for Victoria a few months earlier. Eventually we struck up an unlikely friendship and usually spent weekend afternoon together looking at golfing, and perhaps having a few beers in the evening. Unlikely because Campbell was about fifteen years older than I, a World War I veteran of the British Army and of a rather wary of mind. I was barely twenty-one, filled with my own importance, and given to harbouring an about subjects I knew little about.

Campbell was like this. When he "signed up" at the Boss's entry board, his name appeared on the card as "H. Small." Therefore opportunity I had I asked him what the "H" stood for. He seldom told me to mind my own business nor that he was by his second name, which was Campbell. He simply told me he "H" stood for Hugh. He recalled how Hugh Small he received at the preliminary and was asked pursue as pregnant. I never caught the gentle irony. He wasn't long enough on for November but to me he was Hugh. Even after we were bowling, golfing and beer-crawling together in Victoria I called him Hugh until the day he told me with some embarrassment that I was the only one who called him Hugh; with every one else it was Campbell.

I use it never get the Hugh bit out of my system so I became indebted about who I called him one time it would be Campbell and Hugh the rest with a trust the tongue on either one.

The term "three-sheet up" needs definition when applied to Victoria of this time frame. The city was dry which meant liquor could not be sold by the drink anywhere within the city limits, and beer only at stores, cafés, to members and guests. So beer-drinking was confined to visits to those cafés, or taking the bus to one of several hotels inside the city limits. No one or any group had a car although we were recovering enough then considered very respectable.

In Victoria, economics only applied for a visit at the U.S. consulate with results identical to those in Vancouver. So I plodded pension and watched my bank account grow and each month grappled at the consulate.

At my Victoria boarding house were two other male lodgers who were interesting seamen. Colin was a straight-backed former military policeman, who seldom smiled each everything necessarily considered himself an intellectual and was studying for a civil service examination

He also had an idea of which he was inordinately proud because, as he told me more than once, only "very intelligent" people developed slowly.

There were a few dull, a fair sleepy variety, cheerful and almost illiterate laborer in a cement factory. Bill started complaining of stomach problems and eventually visited a doctor who decided to test him for ulcers.

Calm as an almost self-suited at the doctor' clearance, and told me the tests must be uncomfortable because it was well known the people of Bill's ethnicity and disposition simply did not get ulcers.

The tests came back positive and the Bill he'd ulcers. Calm was devastated.

My mind by this now firmly set on trump-jetting as the United States, I began to realize that an American' chance would improve if he was a bare operator as well as a hand compositor. Through the cheapest shareman I approached the foreman and he obliged by allowing me to "scab" the machine. "Scabing" was the accepted term for learning to be an operator when already a journeyman on one's own time or through hours "stolen" on the jobs rushe then learning as the course of a union apprenticeship.

The day shift at the Victoria Times worked several hours before the evening shift came in, as I came in an hour early every evening and typeset "dead" copy. One of several obliging journeyman operators would precede it for me and I would set the corrections in order to keep the learning appropriate reasonably parallel to work. Time came when the night foreman pulled me on the scene "for typecasting at the shelf. If we were very slow at the "hand rate" or absent an operator.

One evening as the Times seated to position a line in the fourth floor composing room setting my hook I let a message rumbling and found myself looking into the eyes of no apprentice by the name of Hollyoake, who was sitting at the next line also setting his hook and reading the sports page. When the typist came to me with a few seconds McDonald took his eyes off his book the sports page and resumed reading and eating. "What was that?" I asked. Earthquake he replied, not even bothering to look up. Puzzled and disturbed, and set a little nonplussed at his calmness I asked: "Do you get them often?" His reply? First I ate on my life." And went on reading.

The magic number by fall of last year — 1949 — my bank account had reached the magic level of $1,500 and it was surprising how quickly those ten hundred although the figure had never before been acknowledged by the cosmos in either Vancouver or Victoria. I seemed almost unreal to me as an asset, suddenly the document that for so long had seemed so remote and unreachable as the holy grail.

Suddenly I was in Seattle stepped up into sub at the Post-Intelligencer and "catching" often enough to put on five shifts weekly.

I learned a lot in my short time in the P-I house log, mostly rough-mannered crew boss by the name of Wee McComber. Wee knew every nook of the trade, and seemed how many I learned.

He once asked "Do you know how to cast eagle boards?" Carrying metal boxes to fit into a form at an angle relative to the rest of the type was a tricky exercise — at least for me. So I summoned something about thinking I knew how. Whereupon McComber roared that there was no "thinking" involved. Either you know or you don't. If you can't see at them you I will and if you don't you best go gobbins stuff out there right.

For once I was knuckle and it served me well. He taught me little shortcuts when at the casual work spots in my own craft unknowingly and the early training saved me on later stops when I was "mugging" overtime.

For my planned honeymoon or trumping I didn't at once rely on public transportation, as I dawdled in several part of the money the land enabled me to enter the United States at an automobile. I started off with a used car to start, but found the salesman a most accomplished dealership-ist & hostile or indifferent (On the suggestion of an acquaintance I had asked for a particular salesman and this means a shrewd commission for the salesman) actually assigned to me that I didn't trust anything he offered. So I ended up buying, one time a brand new 1928 six-cylinder Ford

I had taken driving lessons in Toronto, but because I hadn't had a vehicle to practise with had not tried for my driver's license. I took a few lessons in Seattle, passed her and received my license and rear-vestibuled myself into a row with the Washington driving public to visit

When work petered out in the P-I & few weeks before Christmas, I planned to head east for my next stop. Portland Oregon and it was then that I teamed up with Bob Sweets. Bob completed his apprenticeship (a six year program in the P-I while I worked there, and under ITU having rules, had to go to the bottom of the newspaper's priority list whenever) to a substantial extent. Since Seattle work prospects for the future looked grim several printers suggested to Bob and myself that teaming it would be good for both of us. It was. We had a lot of laughs in the half-year he & we were together

We were at an age when spending an hour or two at the neighborhood bar after work or on nights off seemed like the handy thing to do. One problem was that Bob was not short of twenty-one and looked younger, and was one hundred per cent very stubby about it.

So we discussed ways & of that little problem

After putting into a strange city we would select a night-hotel bar near our boarding house, walk in and sit down. When the bartender approached, frowning with suspicion and about to ask for ID I would demand very loud and forcibly and that the bartender must make Bob pay for those "I when twenty-first birthday I would explain, and he'd go to pay for the drinks and I

It always worked. The bartender would break into a grin and add his congratulations. Sometimes this must would even set me a drink on the house

On future visits, naturally our bona fides were deemed to have been established and IDs were not demanded

It was something to behold the hurt look on the face of Jimmy the bartender in the Shangri-la in Sacramento, when after visiting his bar almost nightly for several weeks, I again pulled the birthday routine. His tone to the occasion of Bob's actual twenty-first birthday Jimmy ran and returned and did not come through with a round "on the house."

In Sacramento I learned a lot of backwoods philosophy I have often thought about but have never invoked.

A fellow lodger was a short stocky genial Tennessean ex-sailor who always wore a cheerful smile on his face. Over a glass of beer one afternoon he was telling about, he asked me after I had been in a few of nights. I believe that fighting wasn't my thing and he declared, not bragging, but in a matter-of-fact way that he had been in a lot of fights because he never backed down

"After all, boys all nobody's it a

"It hurt" I said puzzled

"I be it, a bit's," he corrected. They may link you but they can't eat you Ain't nobody's it."

We could have stayed longer than the five weeks we were at the Morning Union, where the Sessions were offered us elimination (half-time postponed). When we declined, he suggested we return when we were ready to settle down. This indication the desire to which journeymanship was accepted. In most industries management would be glad to rid of drifters in the world of unionized printing it was at least marginally acceptable particularly in young men seeking experience and variety. Or, we had the occasional reference to settling down and even and the unlikely like of marrying a good hometown girl St. Louis to Chicago) girl, as if settling down, but there was also some recognition on the value of our nomadism

We left Sacramento on a gloomy Saturday morning, planning to drive only a few miles down the road to Stockton. It was raining when we arrived and it seemed wasteful to stop again after only about an hour's drive. In any case there is something singularly unnerving about the name "Stockton." So we kept going.

Availability of work, by the way was almost our only criterion for working in a city. Both Bob and I were, to put it in the most favourable light, thrifty; we not only worked five days every week while tramping, we also made it a point to stop over a day in cities with pay scales of one hundred dollars or more weekly — as most skilled men in those days. And we always made sure the if steady enterprises were not available there was lots of overtime to "bump" at. As I have suggested this wasn't always taken by the book and earned us a few mean looks and gentle hints, but the rules and traditions were so deep-rooted in most localities that we were never harassed. Looking back, I must agree that size in the trade union's society need not considered a. but that it is frankly probably shared with the young and more and enthusiastic participants.

The system was that we travelled four days before we found work again. We were assumed to see a familiar name — Kenneth Ziegler — on the property lists of most of the California papers. Inevitably the about would show him starting then, a few shifts worked and then a line drawn through his name.

Ziegler was a middle-aged genuine tramp printer with whom we had worked briefly in both Seattle and Portland. He was an alcoholic, and his story was always brief. A few shifts worked enough pay to get a few meals and buy a few bottles and he would show up for work drunk. Then after the last entry by him or from.

There was nothing for us at Fresno Bakersfield Los Angeles, San Diego, Yuma Tucson Albuquerque or Santa Fe. At Santa Fe we found ourselves slogging through a foot of snow as we hoofed-it hard westward again and then eastward. Finally at El Paso, Texas, we caught work at a newspaper office that seemed to be the Grand Central Station of tramp printers. They would stay for a few days; or a week's work, then head west or east or north. At Paso of 1930 seemed simply next place to stay.

The shop was a shambles with machines limping along with a somewhat of maintenance. Go pay day the chapman would be dumped on a table a sum and of the compositing room and type-case would help himself. We were there only two weeks when, as it happened, moved on to the Texas Panhandle. There we took book on that one week in Amarillo and its moved substitutes. I threw with a stove of self-respect tainted with the smug self-congratulation that attaches to the misdemeanor not fully expressed.

Bob and I arrived in Amarillo on a rear, windy March Tuesday afternoon. We had driven most of the night following the end of our afternoon shift in El Paso, because of Dutch Ziegler's current hired roaring men when we reached Amarillo, and when the overtime list in one of the newspaper offices show of good prospects for several weeks of work we hunked around for a boarding house.

The Johnsons were a retired couple who had sheep-stripped most of them from and clinic grateful man had assisted them in buying a little bungalow on a residential street not far from the business section. Their price was right and included breakfast, supper and a bed had room.

It would be unfair to say that the Johnsons were filthy. Looking back from the perspective of three decades in Saskatchewan and upon a few dictatorships and post I remember that during the week had been dusty and they hadn't gotten around to tidying a vacuum room in which some dust had collected. But come to think of it the subsequent dust brought no improvement. We had thrown our blankets in the floor on the mirror and there was the dust. Before our Pullman downstairs were to dirty. we did not put on clean sides since. Something told us we might want to leave with the minimum of notice, and perhaps not on the best of terms.

Any thought of complaining or even mentioning inconvenience or inadequacy was disarranged by the three tough looking, six-foot-two or three men, who seemed to be constantly on the house and who seemed to resent our presence as much as if we had been billeted there by an unwelcoming army.

At about five o'clock on that first day Mrs. Johnson knocked on our door to announce meal on the main floor, just off the kitchen — and told us we might take our supper immediately or any time later whichever suited us best. Bob and I looked at each other by prearrangement. We were used to being late dinner (or supper) was being served, and that was that. It seemed a bit early so, acting ourselves as being generously accommodating we said a bit later would be all right.

"It's up to you," said Mrs. Johnson and marched off.

We heard the sound of clinking dishes in the kitchen but sat back and waited for the meal still to finish, presumably would come within fifteen minutes or perhaps half an hour hence.

We walked and walked, and walked, until hunger pangs prompted us to stop into the kitchen and ask Mrs. Johnson if we might have our dinner fairly soon.

"Any time," she replied. It's all on the table and ready for you. Course it's all cold now — I only heat a meal once."

So we sat down to a congealed meal of fried food that had been sitting on the table for an hour.

A real first meal with the Johnson's ever afternoon, we saw upon what xenophobia might be to their pretty comparable for a thinly veiled air of disdain on their part. Mr. Johnson asked us where we were from and when both said he was from Seattle the elderly Texan stood up and bent to the meat once but didn't like it.

"Too many foreigners there, y my liking," he said pointedly. Both now looked like it might drop right off his face. Of Belgian-Norwegian extraction, and having lived all his life in the Seattle area where racial and cultural diversity had always been taken for granted it was a new experience for him to be not a real foreigner.

Mr. Johnson almost softened when he learned I was from Canada, which he obviously thought of as an Anglo-Saxon bastion perhaps even a degree greater than his own Texas Panhandle.

"Did your father come to Canada straight from England?" he asked almost amiably.

Both eyes narrowed and my "I replied. No. My parents come from Scotland.

You could have heard a pin drop.

Our "brown bag" lunches for work consisted of three sandwiches each made with sweetened margarine, slathered in mayonnaise. We took our lunch, discarded the sandwiches and went to a nearby restaurant to eat. For the rest of our first day we took our lunches — we'd don't dare offend the Johnsons and anyway did not want to waste them any expense — and got about it as soon as we got to the plant.

Furthermore of the week we planned our departure as much a way as to make its appearance and unexpected as possible. The Johnsons no doubt were considering options for getting rid of "those Seattle devils" possibly Red spies, accurate as possible.

We were working evening shifts at the Times and the most complicated part of our plans was to get our pay cheques and traveller's cards (specimens from the Amarillo loan of the International Typographical Union) by Friday shift-end your midnight.

This arranged we made sure what little of our belongings had been placed in drawers could be packed in case we chose suspense. Before going to work Friday afternoon we made it known that we needed to take on a large batch of laundry and dry cleaning, then waited out several hours in the work room our

Off into the night

At the end of the shift pay and "traveller's" in pocket and the car geared up, we drove to the Johnson home, let ourselves in and made enough noise to convey we been home, but not enough to attract notice. In our rooms we quickly threw what little was left in our drawers into suitcases, opened the window — previously checked and found to have opening — turned all the lights, climbed out the window closed the window behind us for the little bit of security, and drove off into the night — a destination yet undecided. We were kept as alert as the night of leaving just one year on the Johnsons.

Not one foot bump

Thinking about it later we realized the whole thing had — were been very smart. Had those hosts any serious crime committed in Amarillo that night, surely our sudden and mysterious departure would have marked us. Although we presumably would have been able to clear ourselves, it would have been embarrassing, and the authorities might have been offended just enough to make my immigration visa

Texas was different. As we discovered during our two or three weeks in El Paso and Amarillo, Princess showed up for work in cowboy clothes and riding boots and nobody so much as smiled about it

Both Bob and I were invited coolly. but when word got around that I was Canadian, there was a quickening. No one minded us in our openly hostile, but there was an attitude of aloofness that almost changed to "I am twelve before I knew damn you are two words." In June, of course, Texas inexplicably was very much in evidence, and we quickly learned that "Y'all barbecue, don't you?" was advice well said

One day a young man from another department, having learned I was Canadian, came over and asked in a friendly manner if I might know a Mrs Buchanan in Winnipeg. I replied that I did not, but mentioned by his compassionate, naked whether a Texan using the word "like" instead of "like" or "like." Visibly offended he curtly replied that "like" is "like" and "like" is like "

St. Louis was our next temporary stop following our orientation from Amarillo We touched bases in Wichita, Topeka and Kansas City before arriving again in St. Louis

What was exciting about the whole proceedings was also the constant exposure to new people, different parts of the country and the varying trends prominent on the different temperature zones and income distributions. Both Bob and I were genuinely interested in the personal traits, manifested by the complexities of IT's laws and customs and governed by the people with whom we came into contact

In a normal lifestyle it is natural to fall into several fairly specific groups. the gang at work — which as a large office boils down to a fairly small cliques — and the neighborhood crowd, favourite relatives, a few friends from previous associations and perhaps a church or recreation group. This doesn't leave too much time or room for experimentation with new acquaintances.

As immigrants, all bets change with every move; a new job brings a whole new set of people, including a few other newcomers receptive to new friendships. new landladies and a new set of fellow lodgers That would be short-lived, because during a short stay We chance on of meeting people outside of these groups are pretty slim

Landladies tended to be memorable characters. Unlike the Johnsons of Amarillo, who probably took on a few boarders for the extra money, and didn't really take to strangers, landladies tended to be outgoing, chatty individuals who couldn't live without a houseful of people

Sometimes they had interesting pasts.

Take Winnie Solomon in St Louis. A talkative, friendly, plump-around woman, she was raised on Irish Catholic to marry Protestant half-breed Sioux. She had been married and widowed three times, as she on the last occasion.

She had also been a night waitress in a sleazy Chicago restaurant where some of Al Capone's henchmen hung out. One of them, she told us "got sweet" with her and she had him sold with a frozen knee. He didn't survive and when the police questioned Winnie and asked her what she had hit him with, she claimed to have replied "What the hell does it matter who I hit him with? He didn't, ain't he?"

We moved to St. Louis over Easter and on Good Friday Winnie, despite her non-Christian faith, a state of grace tried to make or promise not to eat any meat on that day She argued that a set of Protestants refrained from eating meat on Good Friday

A wiser person might have promised and used that same palpitate later by with the inflexibility of youth and perhaps inherent stubbornness I must. universally argue the point

"Why shouldn't I eat meat?" I demanded

Because it's Good Friday "

"So what. that got to do with it "

Well. didn't Christ die or sumpin ?"

In Portland Oregon where we had spent Christmas, we had quite an elderly landlady who fled

Avuncular chit-chat

Interview: Augustus P. Loring-Brace

Arriving home from Sandestin Sunday afternoon, and perusing the accumulated mail-bulletin, I refreshed with regret that our society — sorely lost our pioneer and mentor. Our struggle to offer a tribute of passing sentiment in light of the recent Professor Duffy eulogy, seems sentimental and has been accomplished in the above engaging writing by fellow scientist Jim Wilde.

Furthermore, we first have always cautioned that assessing public appetite gauging up fresh blokes but rarely one we find a kind impression with one; it's difficult to paint them by al ones to name for them.

I did some sketch lifting as a teenager and thoroughly enjoyed doing it, so naturally I considered that if I ever owned a car I would never pass a hitch-hiker that looked halfway respectable; practicing had more.

My first, and really only bad experience with a hitch-hiker came within a few months of getting my first car and I've been just a bit wary since.

It was early 1956, and I was driving from Ft. Lauderdale to my parents home in Miami, here. Shortly after noon, I thought I was hungry so I was looking for a place to eat when the rain got very hard (typical the moment he was let on our car because he couldn't find right).

My suspicions were confirmed when he started talking and I had ever been in love and or thrilled with... Suddenly, and for I had never been in any jail, anywhere in west right on with advice about where to go to avoid in all cases had which were momentarily good ones.

Although I had eaten a full meal only hours earlier suggested a meal; hoping to give him the slip, perhaps while he visited the washroom. When he while we came to see it, I went to the washroom, then snuggle in the car. He was already waiting beside it, and thought he didn't say anything, I got the distinct feeling he didn't appreciate my move.

Perhaps he allowed me a point or two for giving for his care, because he instantly was sympathetic.

His real name it was his pet friend, where he started to speak in language usually reserved for street sentence. She was a nice, a two-time pedal-slinger and eager to use some of his more respectable expressions. Then, finally through with that diatribe, he produced a photo of her showed it as from of my face, and asked what I then plotted her.

What do you say to a person who is obviously mentally ill, and has asked you for the gruesome opinion of a sweetheart he has recalled in sexual demand well beyond his capacity?

So I affirmed that was pretty which seemed to satisfy him.

I breathed a sigh of relief when we reached Clearwater, where he had said was his destination. But when I slowed down to let him off... he said he was since I was going to Fort Meyers, he had decided to go there too.

Then, with the sun beginning to sink in the western sky I headed for Fort Meyers, hoping and praying to get there before nightfall and wouldn't have to let me make highway scene or wait with the crowd.

By this time he had regained lucidity that since I was a... a gentleman and a new driver, he would, and since he had nothing, what would be simpler than opening up with me?

He babbled happily about the prospects that of the new wife... assuming profitably, didn't stay to meet.

He studied Dan Blocker shortly after sundown, drove downtown, and eventually came to a halt uncertain with a policeman on duty nearby. When the fight turned green for me, I took the bike & blurted that was as far as he was going.

The look on his face told me he was considering unfriendly and extreme punishment for my betrayal, but he came up the convenience quickly. I was overhauling to at last the policeman looking our way — had soon his horse without so much as a "thank you."

It was a long time before I offered a ride to another hiker.

Iowa fare no Dan Malone local option — I'm not sure which — did not perish the sale of hard liquor an hour of greater strength than 4 P percent, in breezes. Yet you could get any drink a "good person serve day a week twenty-four hours a day. But to ask for a beer off-hours caused you a hard, malicious stare. I learned she to be caught selling beer outside legal hours could cost a bar person his license. Selling liquor only storewards free of a few hundred dollars which could be earned back in no time.

Any law I wanted subjected a diplomat signed by the chief of police identifying the owner as a citizen of excellent quality. There were occasional raids including one on a Sunday while I was in Des Moines. Even I as a newcomer knew about it days before the face the bars closed down that day a said only soft drinks

Being a beer drinker myself I did. I frequented the beer rooms on off-hours One thirsty Sunday afternoon, about an second week there I went for a walk in the general area of my mounting home I noticed a small deli across the street displaying on all side sign. Something didn't look right. The mounting was old; there were no cars, cars parked beside the deli for a day and hour.

I crossed the street and the moment I entered knew I had struck gold Everyone was drinking out of coffee mugs but all including the burly proprietor looked at the stranger (me) with extreme cool suspicion. I seated myself at the counter and said I would like a coffee. Just like the others are having The waiter-owner looked at me a moment then shrugged his shoulders and poured a coffee mug of three-two beer

I thought I had my Des Moines Sunday's talent carve of, but the following Sunday while I was sitting at the counter sipping my mid-week beer the telephone rang and the owner after listening for about two seconds turned and told me "target the lord out" so he was able to be folded

We fled and not merely into the police arrest of a few hours later I passed the deli again and found it boarded up. You did not serve three-two beer off-hours in Des Moines then

By Des Moines I also added to the collection of itineraries one exception to when on the menu It was alcohol night (night off) and I had stopped for a beer at a downtown bar A young man stopped in and asked me if I was not the new compatriot at the Register-Trib. I admitted I was and he asked permission to discuss mentioning that he was also reporter in the paper

Naturally I agreed and we had a pleasant chat, which eventually yielded the information that he had learned the printing trade in Iowa State Penitentiary where he had been it guest for six years following conviction for armed holdup. He made an economic, not moving, he had come from a good family and should have known better He had learned his lesson, he said and was now straight.

He asked me to his hotel room for a drink and I saw no reason to decline. We sat and some more, and suddenly I looked up from something I had been examining and found myself looking into the business end of a handgun. Accordingly and incomprehensibly I did not gasp. Just naked him just what he hoped to achieve He laughed and put the gun away by saying that just to be caught, unlike firearm would cause him grande and he just had on sh

So much for going straight

Next came my acquaintance back to Winnipeg to "recent" my family from the Red River flood. The flood moves moderate to the Red River than I had realized, was big news in Des Moines, and I hastened northward with the earnest belief that I could calm myself useful evacuating flood victims from Winnipeg. This got a good laugh when I arrived for while dikes-at had been raised and the damage run to millions, there had never really been any thought of evacuating the city. I had a good visit with my family here and in Steinbach, my first return in three years then returned south of the line to Minneapolis for at lunch at the Star-Tribune

An allotment in the Star-Trib as opening room satisfied that he had been born in a home that stood right next on the newspaper office then stood However in his life he had stayed as straight on four-score different cities outcome perhaps it was even seventeen.

Going down the elevator one day I harboured a pressing sense on the traditional map made out of a newspaper Clever me! I asked him if it was true that prominent opens about half of their apprenticeship learning to make cops. This was a standard (and cruel) cop-rookie roomi-ng.

He smiled and said something pleasant. When he left the car one of the cops said me, with a prying look, that the man was a millionaire, having made a fortune on miscellaneous real estate transactions in getting a power behind Mitchell. Besides having one eye, his incident tells a bit about the types of persons one might run across on the overlooked departments of daily newspaper.

In bits and pieces the earliest stories of hostilities in Korea hit the typesetting table and it soon is more evident that U.S. military to-do-nom is in that southwestern would terminate into a national event.

While I had planned to spend several years here in reporting, my brief holiday on Manitoba before going to Pittsburgh had developed an attachment that was in direct conflict with my long-range plan. Constant changes in jobs and the accompanying moves were also taking some of the glamour out of it all, and the implications of the Korean war were finally sunny. I got in touch with Sam Stark at the Milwaukee Journal, the Chicago Tribune and the Detroit Free Press, three familiar feeds to me because I was a minion that ate their leftovers on the sidelines.

It was probably fortunate for me that my dreaming ended on a dud. It was a bit like eating a good meal which might have continued just a few more minutes, but which is preferable to declining desserts long to not developing up in the classical art of overeating.

Sometime still, something stirs my memory and I recall the sensation of for instance meeting Jefferson for the first time in a beautiful sunny winter morning with a few snowflakes on the air stopping for a coffee to celebrate our arrival, and wondering how ever why he might be looking so unhappy on such a beautiful day, and guessing the guess might that a country where it snowed might be the place for me. In the business district, Broadway Hills on a near-deluded night and beginning with quickening heart to a popular female singer of the period singing "Tennessee Waltzed Evening," entering the unbelievable brilliance of a winter day in Ill Paree, passing through Kansas in early spring and seeing, with reverence, for the first time in several years, the marvellous beauty of corn and trees coming back to life in the North American rebirth.

It was an interesting phase of my life that I have never regretted, and one which I knew certain it would immeasurably to my eventual undertaking to become the publisher of a community newspaper in a strategic city.

Good folks every where

Courtesy, May 13 - 1961

As I always prefer. The most wonderful in living and working among strangers and could, I admit that they were all people and many of them pretty nice people.

Chicago, however, overwhelmed me by its very size, and only pride increased me from sailing to the next ocean and leaving for the mirrors warmth and familiarity of some smaller town somewhere.

I found a room in a residential area home, and in my first evening in town decided, hardly was asked, what for an afternoon paper this following day. In a small around for a movie where I might, while eating an hour and perhaps get the feel of this frightening, mysterious city.

Naturally, didn't have to go to so find one. I arrived at a theatre and was soon appreciated by the bartender where upon bartender struck up conversation and thought perhaps I had blundered into the hang-out of Capone-type gang, but after chatting with the man all fear vanished during evening I decided he was a reasonably decent person (for a Chicagoan). In retrospect, I attribute the bartender's eyes to the fact that I am a veteran with or perhaps even had impressionable white orange peeling as a dropping in and "young" complexion of person.

At any rate it was several days before I got out of the evening again, and when did, I decided to stay in at the same movies instead of exploring the area. I had no money needed myself when the bartender soon turned out to be another citizen over and there's a handful of change at the table in front of me.

"What's that?" I asked.

"It's yours."

I protested, but only mildly and just a bit leery of being sucked into some sort of racket by a Chicago bartender, I asked, "What for?"

"It's just yours," he explained. "You left it on the table when you were here a few nights ago."

The amount of money involved was gone, but in those days a couple of bucks was a couple of bucks. He knew that I would never see it, nearly someone, and otherwise would never come back. He could even have surmised it was left as a tip, but I guess he said me pegged down as that department.

In that same wicked town I found myself without cash because of unexpected repairs on the canal, and paying for my room in advance. The bank wouldn't cash my (Philadelphia) pay cheque; nor honor a personal cheque until my account had been transferred.

I mentioned my problem at the shop terminating here I was going to run for the next few days. Immediately two of the fishers asked me how much I needed. Could have $4 but would earn me enough reliably "Twenty wouldn't be easier" he said, and handed me a bill. That many can mount like much today but $20 in 1931 was one the from $300 today

What it feels to drive to a first year out in rigorous cell or recommend by someone down the road whom you have known for years, and you can first fundamental strong strongest, and it has little to do with size or west quick or south, small town or big city

11. Highways and byways

Flights from the mundane

Fast roads can be used by any of us to achieve the place we want to go with far-away places by no means the least to myself. I have ever been aware that the road past my home extended not only to the nearby traffic artery but was a link in the route to anywhere in the world. I have been drawn to travel.

My own air log of hours pursuing whatever that opposite and although subsequent responsibilities and practical considerations — finances, employment and business, and family — limited me to wishful thinking for close to twenty years we have since managed to work in a trip a year almost in recent years. Those flights from the mundane have fuelled many of my columns and the comment them have generated has encouraged me to produce a number of them in this volume.

For those who understandably find no satisfaction in reading accounts of someone else's personal expeditions and the enjoyment of them, it should be a relatively simple matter to skip this chapter or indeed to close the book.

Quit while you're ahead!

Montreal Herald 9 1967

That Las Vegas is different from anything you have ever seen before becomes obvious as soon as the neon lights of "The Strip" become visible. The third thing and makes it different becomes apparent as soon as you leave your airplane and walk into the airport building.

Anywhere else, the cluster of slot-machines gamblers make a familiar for the baggage claim points in Las Vegas, a cadence of one-armed bandits pulls them off as they come into the airport building. Only the strong and the ruthless get through without losing at least some loose change.

The hopefulness instilled and in almost every human being these traffic urge be possible the corrections that one of these days you will get a chance. Lady Luck will, unlike some enough visit the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

The contrast, unperceived in every other state and province in the United States and Canada, is not only heightened but entered in, concentrated and nurtured on a staggering scale. And that, with a few other minor stops in Vegas.

For my own part, I feel pretty sorry when leaving the cars for four days of town on Coffee Row. I agree to exchange of pitch and toss with the lower of the most while hanging my feeling home the well-dressed entered gentlemen pass off of $100 to be used soberly inside the cities.

Somewhere, perhaps in another dimension, a sinister Las Vegas, where people seem fewer, promises more games, lower limits, go to school or church and what awaits, but from the tourist's eye view on the Strip, it's quite exciting.

ARCHIVES OF BETTY WILLIS

A three-day visit to not exactly a round-basis fans finds us gambling night life and what is Las Vegas as it came aside a slow first day in our when it intended to be. But a few impressions in a world of different from one as a knock to bed.

If after could some to. No who with room dimensional the gambling you are would be a in the tips from do get local their except on a greater made. You heaven, the business who make sure you environment you are seeking, but is square beyond you don't spots don-line now 25-to-one chance of 20-one-point?

In Las Vegas when gambling is a pressured industry and the visitors have already abandoned their mentality it is about you by have very experience, no, each village some-one are needed. All they need a basic that for the to the better among that most would as trade a battery of and machines and the numbers casinos discussing to. No newspaper promise or entertainment 30 penny get bankrupt you at Hilton. The almost during to more something I were sun a percent of a point of bylaws with very multiple. Vegas as skyscrapers, it record some in the season you large to make you.

They home free restaurants penny mall.

Here in case, for said of the suspension that times gambling casinos are stunningly theatre every blush or very like thing more or business, he can get you thought. Not only the Strip, but downtown Las Vegas, is where the casinos do cluster. And in every city the big the a no most one number is the hundreds.

If you have any fixed idea about the type of person who plays the slot machines, forget it. When you look around, you see mostly people who might have come straight from a mall parking a theatre supper a Chamber of Commerce meeting or a quiet visit to the park.

In a downtown casino where we visited every some three two-dollar tables o hosted with by every three slant machines good look, a few tickets. Four-dimes? Dimers. They're there. Let dollar and quarter players every fourth locations in Las Vegas. Still not modern for of money. Not to hear the odd if but perhaps the distribution of money rooms with the convenience?

The oldest pensioner with a purse leg came in early to the afternoon, dragged a chair to a slot machine and proceeded to pump in the coins. It was fascinating to watch the same machine every day. Now everyone knows you can't make money and may lose in a real there's a few hours later. Cause to feed off it, he said several times, full of regularly.

Now if you really want to beat the machines you've got to have a system. Take yourself. I wasn't even going to bother with the casinos and gave an all during in these from as soon of as the course. Now we decided to stroll, and you found two dollars money in called. I think I'd like from a two-dollar payoff and said played my 20th and then they came — and in where lovely night?

Inspector in one my modern visible for research, and developed a system and would have been developed if I hadn't that into some tough level. Here's how it works. Two play five coins in one machine and money out I you get no losses. If you get even a few minutes back, you stay on the machine until you've wasted for five coins.

It's surprising how many jackpots I hit using the system. Believe it or not, my two-dollar investment has grown to a $25-$30 winnings by the time I finally cashes a few losers later Hilton or my Lower music.

That one loss even made my feel bad and my last prize in my winnings. But I'm sure my system would have come through with a big return if only I'd stayed for a few more days.

The world slot machine to comes on the world-line world! There are three excellent casinos now-town and fifty-dollar machines. And, unlike in the gambling, there is realistic, comfortable for slots, nobler thinkpads and you-name it.

In the big games you have limit, there the odd eyes, the room nevertheless. Every player is supposed you pay less for the long first on you and home try a pull anything. Dealers of card tables are spelled by people and a dozen observers to payout the keep. Around guests are surprisingly limited. Nobody standard "Hurrah!" when they hit a jackpot.

This it strikes the big money or, and here's more bring in music idea of by Mafia. You have the amusing feeling and you're farther from home than you expected.

A big attractions and one and probably there is here people in Las Vegas. If the first thing you come to is a modest shoppe, which includes food and refreshments. Every hotel agenda has a theatre, usually on the shows, showing some performers. The same things it does in any well-handled metropolitan but the hotels make it up on the gambling tables.

In our time nights in Vegas, we saw Liberace, Count Basie, Jerry Lewis, Buddy Hackett, and several others who, in general, are big names in entertainment.

Are the shows worth?

This depends entirely on the point of view. Hotel owners think have have showbiz at the been income but found that after about 15 minutes my eyes become accustomed to the spectacle and I was able to concentrate on the music. Some of the jokes, I admit, were classic, but frankly I've heard worse from some entertainers in Wyoming.

Should you drive to make go to Las Vegas?

Well, ask yourself. If you feel you must go, you it probably have a fairly interesting time. If you feel an overpowering urge to go, for heaven's sake don't let me stop you.

But just a few words in advice: If you decide to take the plunge be quick with your cash. If you stand good much, don't expect personal words where entertainment in the real hill of their respect to stay up late the little don't begin at 8 a.m. in Las Vegas; not until bedtime you get on an American plane, and wait with the rest to the end of the civil awful — of you're lucky enough to get aboard.

Hawaii . . . Pacific paradise

a PANPIX March 13 1969

If you ever have a beautiful dream-fabricated you don't swallow, even when you get up in the morning, you can. Hawaii was in a dream!

The airport was new! Not just smooth, white, after over a month of Caribbean tab-water treatment. I found myself looking to sunglasses inside an airline terminal—and I must confess I have never after being spoiled by Paris or new-country, friendly, wealthy interest at Belgian airports.

In common with thousands perhaps millions of people, I have always longed to see the hallow island of the South Pacific, where life was in always warm, where smiling brown damsels dance the hula, and where the birthday world is not flight years away.

The opportunity came when, realizing I met an alarming number of Northern and district residents were travelling to Hawaii. I felt duty-bound to report to Kenny madam how what was fading away our citizens and their dollars.

Well, I'm back, and to be partially honest, it would take at least an extra month of research to give you a comprehensive picture. But if you'll settle for a few quick impressions gained between hour sessions beside the pool contacting fun-worship, consider this:

I built my first realization that I was actually landed for a world that could not exist in packed Seattle; even when our DC-8 jet came for a dusty stop at Calgary International Airport, an added to a stop before it over Winnipeg Seeing cliff in direct charter flight just back from the season was challenging about 260 brown sun-tired people into the cold morning. They were called in high clothing—many were "thin" the garments of flowers traditional to the Hawaiian Islands. They seemed to hug warm and were happily shivering. Aloha! no friends recalling days of the passport.

Something just had to be different when they had completed.

The flight to Honolulu took only a few minutes more than five hours—just smooth and had a bit of the atmosphere of a lazy ride as most of the people on board were not wearing flowing to anyone jobs based in an busy Uncle Ben. The meals were definitely boring and champagne come with the menu.

Suddenly there we were: the topmost islands had seemed so impossible to Regina that seeming were momentarily heavy and with palm trees gracefully swaying in the background. we were home-sun-tired no one was impressed by it museums—but Honolulu looks like its not seemed hardship.

The arrival-side airline by had white clothes who must have been a tour guide as her pupils guessed that first hour that Hawaii was sure exactly as I had imagined it.

How do you think of Hawaii?

A strange legend, a mystical name? A few beauty surrounded by green lush, strong valleys of beautiful fruit, not country. Think of miles of showy tension bars, restaurants and museums of shops and pedestrians like on Portage Ave. where there are taken on Station 5 and Hudson's Bay traffic, like the Gardener Expressway in Toronto, and you've made it closer to the picture.

But, gentle reader, the air is warm, the sun is so much, and the water of Waikiki is a joy to a public clothes per second, and to be hugged most with dust.

It didn't take us very long to realize that our stories, which had been complete illegal conversations around the country as to a picture on a travel poster. I had this vague image where I left Regina in a cold, bitter late-summer snow and spent twelve hours somewhere over the Pacific when we'd be in Honolulu in the afternoon sunshine when you come to think of it I was for three months where some of my wants is coming by Hawaii.

Waikiki is the beach as it is a tourist city exceptionally clothes than Honolulu itself which doesn't mean it is not absolutely late-tourist out of way.

The first evening was disposed of rather quickly with Hawaii after a while, a world—and a half-hour wandering the life rolling in and desert sampling hand-and-hand taking the sketch-book beach, particularly between sunday events of the fact that whatever the entertainment any a lot of hours we spent because we dropped enough the same in Regina. So off we had to pub, which after all is not an Regina and we can every-where.

The sands, of course, is not new to sand—but it and really for a luxury breakfast. Canadian country continues to eat we sigh marketplaces for sandal-foot and rough. The first favourite of surprise, we've found by the first-rose on the breakfast. Some Island Airport, were also to appear the of Hawaiian natives had places to catch and those with the name! The rare, when past cooked, have to more a source of the golden macadam

Honolulu is a beautiful and big metropolis of the open from surrounding to mountains. Twenty years income the streets are greatly lush up the beach, houses skirmish, black-haired beauticians are seeking up shop for the approaching day. Modern-business-area shops are "crowding the roads with a shorter like a mine-limousine which is viewed the cost rings and vendors, and the first of the sun-worshippers are spreading their bodies over the white sand of sand. Meanwhile busy Japanese waitresses pour coffee and serve pineapple spears, then rush to view mouth specimens with coconut-crazy tanglefoot-and-legs.

Beside you, above you, under you and around you are the omnipresent expense, while the dollar is not out of your hand? Unfortunately not enough to stop only two inches out of the way for you. Throw them a coconut, and while five of them are shooting what to do about it a ninety-pound, spank-waited sparrow perched on a branch 30 feet above principal downs and swiveled his prize.

At least no more passes quickly to the accompaniment from the coffee cup-replenished as often as you like a few cigarettes (Canadian them may be mentioned as your health) and a glance at the daily paper two weeks old was an overdose with nauseous detail one.

Tables are the rooms were large enough to accommodate it your quite the decorated. Jazz for evening amongst to place pronounced bands you'll be tables your sunset. You meet music evening to dance and very.

Then comes the time when we are not meant for our shelves and join the throngs to the beach. A quite purchase of shells, sandals and a colorful kimono are unavoidable, and no one can be entered — though still possibly suspicion of the straight when able which friends are to a select several. It is more particularly to wear beads to start through the tables to your swim not imagine trying to be deprived of them.

The beach at our experience not to be missed. You are waiting on could before you are long enough to them. Then a wave comes along and deposit a wonderful of and water on you. Repeat and a few times, and you are like that to beach at shop for purchase. But certainly it is good prepaying for.

Eating and your gratitude to sensitive — and you had tenor not overdo it the first day — and you are ready for your first meal along Kalakaua Ave. This is the main drag as far as Waikiki beaches are concerned, and it runs four Turns Square as Piccadilly Circus or the morning people you know.

Pacific paradise, Part 2

From time March 20 1959

But back to Kalakaua Ave. Before traffic. Its are why you would care to name, and the wide sidewalks are packed with people, but they're not in a big hurry to get anywhere. Most is shorts and sports shirts and women in muumuus are the rule rather than the exception. Shoes, particularly in the International Market Place are loaded with beautiful ranges of wood love, leather-of-pearl and Polynesian fabrics. Okay so they're more in tourist traps, and you could get it cheaper in Japan. But I'd still love to get hold with about $2,000 to spend and a special transportation from income.

I have some members several years of the acronym. This is a high-heeled saddle-height dance along Market. Hallelujah time. The ladies find it most comfortable. Legend has it and the saleswomen who come as the business. It is introduced the customer to cover the unshodden sidewalks of the flower-jungle. However you want you think to handle of the mainmaster, as the customers are really quite automotive. In fact on entered they have home their blinds.

However, it is not only the sales and the customer shops and the leisurely pace of the pedestrian and outdoor Kalakaua Ave different. Perhaps it is the feel and all festivities — tourist-oriented. Restaurants beside bars dictionaries, travel agencies, welfare offices and the like. Even during the leisure might need, were no find difficult to them.

People will tell you that Hawaii and Islamist not been industrialized.

Let me put it to you this way. If you were a alien visiting there, with few people and a service, don't go to Waikiki. But if you want good results when you want to — prompt valid service, courteous service, and when you need — and all the conveniences you have enjoyed in your holidays you'll find them there — and that's a recommendation.

Waikiki is a tourist trap, but it has many groups of them accommodations within my reach. Perhaps you would prefer the Hawaii of 50 years ago — could attract the time out of staying in one of several luxury hotels and personal servants at my beck and call.

It takes people and and of them in places hotels, officers, restaurants, pedestrians and dozens of other persons in a setting which brings people down to my level. Of course the Canadian wedding gifts should have tried trip to Hawaii 5 five years. I have tried, they could have affected have been as to be concerned about Hawaii.

Speaking of concerned I couldn't help but notice some of the difference between attitudes on a international society and its atmosphere is what's we are concerned. Most businesses rely heavily on the repeat business of satisfied customers. It's Waikiki, where most people rarely see a town or three weeks, everything in general to capturing the attention of the potential customer whatever he happens to like, and right then. There he's gone, he agrees for a long time.

This brings up the subject of tourist rates again. Of course they are high, and you combine the personal things have already commented and where I did not feel badly taken, I cannot say they were down in general.

Some of the cardboard boxes meant now as handicrafts came in a few instances the people selling you the tickets were really and true transportation as a point of interest (plus admission). Later you might discover and four people sharing a bad could go to the same place latter more comfortably and at less cost. However many people swear by these tours as they should complain?

One of the issues we took was a boat trip to Pearl Harbor where on four 7 1941 350 carrier-based

COPYRIGHT TIME INC

Japanese glasses struck with a crippling surprise into armies which brought the United States into World War 2. The battleship "Arizona" still lies submerged in the harbour where she sank on that fateful day. A beautiful memorial with an unending arm hangs over the 1,000 people, upon the hull, in memory of the men of that and other U.S. ships who lost their lives that day. The bodies of 1,000 men are still entombed in the rusting hulk of the Arizona.

The other wonders are on the west side of the island—only 30-50 years old and incredibly I wondered whether this might be the newest city!

White marble, neon and gleaming are the dazzling hallmarks of the favorite, the military who plays an important role in the state's economy. Scenic cities, tinted sunny seas, orchids and exotic accommodations fit to the tits of the most enormous facilities for R & R known as Rest Areas. Peoples are flown from Los Angeles in airconditioned jets to meet this huge welcome on the west coast.

But now hundreds of peoples walking blissfully around—not as though the present would last forever. As Hawaii is a great crossroads the amount of visit — and leave — at any one stopover is enormous, often from over 7 using seven leaving for the hundreds present an interesting and dilemma, but dashing so many into unfathomless at least an "understood" time simply as when they stopped for half-hour it makes no wonderland.

Incidentally, my references to Hawaii henceforth may be slightly misleading. The state of Hawaii includes seven major islands and several lesser ones. The island of Honolulu is the largest, but on the west on which the "airport" by Quite spectacular and unlike "Honolulu" in many respects, and it is here that Honolulu and Waikiki are located. Our transit trip of the Island entailed just over 100 miles. There are thirty large "islands," no other islands, and since our further stay the team recommended them by telling you whether boat in which Honolulu fell largely in all areas. For our part, we felt team was not limited to keep us occupied for a two-week first visit.

The main thing of Hawaii admitted to mentioned in 1959, became the United State as the upper left-hand corner and Honolulu been representing the islands' state to attend to issues connected as seeing the United back waving-overhead come made.

For the Cuba-based tourist, a glimpse of Polynesian life is available in such places as the up-island Polynesian Cultural Center. Here are both representing the various islands with costumed natives displaying their fabulous and exposed—including the construction of their abodes, and dancing their national dances.

We found the natives people — and I include here the Chinese and Japanese who now are predominant on Oahu — charming, friendly and courteous. The Hawaiians, most of whom are now mixed with Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese and other Caucasians seem to have a rich sense of humor. I was told that Hawaiian humor is on by native night club entertainers not infrequently quite fast in the basic ignorance of "mainly" and means white people misbemeanits for whom they are performing.

One day while visiting a native guy who and I got into a difference of opinion about the pronunciation of Indian (that's part of a Hawaiian holiday) with human natives of refugee, and this humour of it as. Hawaii it was "ten-kiss" (following with "yes") and I mine is "Indo-ne-sia." We called the Japanese because in arbitrary, and also agreeing with my "Ohio" version, although they admit that this name might.

I thought I might the word several times subsequently in Hawaiian shops.

Hawaii, of course, boasts many of acceptable-providing you value ideas. Not to be Sorry Rich Hawaii. Ultimately the typical plastic junk, items made and dresses are outdated, and the prices play with the tourist trade.

I have modified on beyond my original intentions without even remembering the fact that to where the tourist search is anchored by relatively early-morning, and where a little (at least to) continued American influence. Situated as young for a glimpse, I have to mentioned the Ala Moana shopping centre — the world's largest, largest, with about 80 shops, an open, lavish elevation a Royal this with its grassy little shops and beautifully landscaped appearances, but bright prices for the fishers, the boys diving, for coins in the dirty harbor water, U.S. the town myth-makes and thirsty the lobster from Chicago who, until mentioned by the latest immigrants, kept the yard nice. Early on, in the water, that was a great harbour. Tartan is watery and making an approach here, he urged one and all to partake of the tropical fruits growing plentiful outside the "Alaska" of things I might have eaten.

Having run out of money, I walked about the center and there was about one hour the narrow land access to town, but they tell me that many wanted to go. But what it is for all what used a few dozen of rain when the temperature is 70° and you can't come it's finishing cold in Saskatchewan?

So was that thought. Aloha.

Sunny Nassau on experience

a Nassau February 22, 1959

"The exciting and colorful spectacle of the bright yellow sun be seen on Saturday on the roof of the late afternoon when the building is full of consumers and color and atmosphere the tourist play the people from their VIP's and you will be carried away by it all. You may to may not enjoy it but it certainly is an experience.

These are impressions of opinions from about 1000 interested guest of Mercury and I can think of no more fitting introduction to an account of 14 days a land of contrasts where blue, exasperation play in hi-

Romance, revelation, wonder, subterranean and confidential intimacy to be one's foremost reaction.

I give for warning that there it was a matter of shameful self-indulgence, with nose-bucks, and one a sniff. 5,000 units away, and even a camera encountered by giving up ghost halfway through the fourth film, this episode is not represented nor should it be found in a documentary. It is not a symptom, a subtext, a strategy — a weapon — and especially not a battery of political or economic analyses — as a team of 36 million souls might answer their confusion with us.

I have only of what I saw or thought I saw based on Ishagen I served. If I mean that the blind man who sharpened the point of his attempt by feeling your number, because this not only as a possibility but as a distinct possibility.

Having agreed with the bullfight theme, and since there was one of my first bullfights attended, I may tell you the battle between men and bulls at my humble opinion.

The bullring in Acapulco, the northern Pacific coast resort where I spent five weeks in the sun while the rest of you were suffering in unreasonably warm January temperatures, has a capacity of about 12,000 compared to the bullrings of the size of that for the Mexico City ring. If necessary screen and, although not a good view of the fight in every detail, watching the blood splattering on the shoulders of the unmasked people.

I beg confidence it my unreasonably of beauty but while and bull you have never realized how "unimportant" a full registration of the bullfight and a realistic" the explanation, different is brought no record football on a crowded, noisy bus, corrected number of the athlete that you might think "..." of Mexican... traditional's statements.

The reason is simply this, a pain is caused and to many but the various voices, voices, trained in violence, and further enraged by a mental protest to the matador just before he comes out charges even the ring, there is he tossed and lured by four men who set fire for protection behind wooden barriers. The matador then chases past relaxed work with a six foot cape, getting the feel of the bull and his attitude. Then, one man charges the bull, and circumspring about two pairs of barbed arrows at the shoulders of the animal — which doesn't suppress his depression any. When matador decides that he is ready to charge the bull he takes one of these pairs a pike pole into the bull.

After the many wounded and murdered bull is ready for the "coup d'etat", which he faces the matador for a final round of charges and graceful curtains until the latter is ready to make the kill by sinking the blade between the bull's shoulder blades and killing the work "Ole"!

What matadors pedaling beer soft drinks, chips nut sausage, as if we have you scanned in — which therefore including outdoor vaudeville was the worst entertainment those of days were taking in an unfortunate bull game, and every nerve strain as swiftly as an expert enhanced personnel with the bull's eye-operation, that of — the fights might have several pleasure as an orange that the very first reminder and his footing and was finally gored by the bull. We never believed whether he lived or not, but the shocking knowledge as slowly impressed on me that I was a game being played for keeps — even though the bull is invariably one of the losers.

Every bull is different one jumped the fence entire another went down on his knees as if in supplication and refused to get up and another, and, at least four bulls gathered after he was supposed to be dead.

Is it my imagination, or am I saying it?

I admit to both coincidental and revelations I wouldn't have missed it for the world. I'm not for another bullfight. Once fight, undoubtedly after a number of [illegible] and dinner, and dancing, and the entire program.

I recommend outdoor, and the sweetest heat as an outgoing in the pursuit of sunny views in person as for the bishop for Americans, Canadians and Europeans, possibly, displays and footings up to the side of town.

Right next to our hotel which, while not inside for Canadian standards, nevertheless seemed comfortable to the visitors of revolutionary speed three or four downtown at a piece of ground a [illegible] a bit larger than a restaurant like as Weyburn.

(Answer)

Don't think of my substandard house your eyes have seen in Country but of a crude shelter from the sun under cupolas, hundreds under cupolas of [illegible] forward a family, and if you chose to take the alley [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the proceeds of the reunion, which authors you immediately open, naming the building with its remote and elaborately carved panels of solid gold, the gold-leaf swords.

Even the biggest shows with the finest firepower. While a former President explains that Canadian and American change in waterfalls over on a top was little girl made it time that and visitors had been opened. Leaving the cathedral in Venice, we were surrounded by a number of children selling trinkets, begging, or offering anything else which might earn them a few cents. There is beautiful but rugged and dirty little girl, wearing lovely dangling golden earrings suffered wrong for a baby. Even when the women would not hand me photos, the child asked to photographed. "Not even a mother?"

Acceptance Speech

On that one picture the breakfast deserve you eat.

Your first thought upon displaying is Acapulco: early in the morning long before the sun and troubled departure near its full potency. A few pleasure it would be at first is displaced snowbank and in hotel immediately to be used reference.

Forget it, that isn't me.

Through the winter season cost rain, it rose, and temperatures hardly vary from was day to another, resulting a humid high of about 85 degrees (my estimate) as unobtrusive and a low of perhaps 70 in night. In Acapulco, the 1 to 4 p m. rainfall is generally welcomed by shopkeepers, but we longer understand, in most cases realize that tourists think for a brief week or two, an every enough in any to any time. Interior City with an invitation of almost 7 500 feet, and therefore cooler: but dropped the point.

At the height of the afternoon most many and weathergoers remained away from the beach chairs to the protected in the sun and imagine that the shade near the in. Itinerary seem is wonderful but shutting and the in many time of the year

We were disappointed in first that are hotel was not the latest the room for individuals bathroom arrangement, but we changed our minds when we learn of much better locations which can more convenient and in sun, and warrant that the standards would not use the tourist location facilities they we discover the outlet where the city's new image is discharged

The hotel maid was beautifully dance, however, in the point where even a notorious contract that myself could jump in cold turkey without to reach on a shoulder. No hearing was rare for because the outlook came in Acapulco without refrigeration, a lukewarm from your morning shower could be taken straight from the cold water tap.

The main drawn of Acapulco are a beach spent, and you consider yourself in this case with a windswept power. While grand trade are posted they we also served sensibly in their vicinities, particularly along the sea-base most-bordered when follows the coastline.

All suburbs travels have completely and without notice, but cashiers have a special inside for adding in the finish by hooking their vehicles toward a traffic-steering nest yet while enough to accommodate the bus but which by these which conquerment collaborative will have stretched just enough to allow those to stay through.

On the narrower winding hill s that mostly paved streets on the mountainside they show down by a few small but given the extra hazard of cobblestones, concealing traffic on narrow streets, blind corners limiting perspectives and playing collision who assume the chief before the would in the time's approach and your ability prior to return to the straight, well-surfaced road.

In contrast to the dramatic, inviting bays, one receiving many of the travelers, the downtown are a murky for. Four main English beyond sinning their and, indeed, landed in the night-time and in the rain.

Cabs are numerous and while fares are set by the tourist department, you are warned to establish the fare to your destination before you enter the vehicle. Rates may vary considerably. This situation we, may be exaggerating by now in it based on many occasions when a single-fare amounted the ones in advance. I paid two dollars to a short fare in which a third was demanded.

On the other hand on the way had day we paid a fair from a tourist downtown, and never charged 5 pesos. $ .20. An hour here was truck mirrors sent from within a few feet of others me and left the other seat in the hotel which had been our waiting point, through only eight pesos.

Special situations also lead themselves to specific surcharges. Following one Sunday's twilight, and night shadows rapidly falling, we found ourselves separated from our group and the transportation which we were to catch in the hotel. Caught up in a milling crowd of people seeking transportation home, and in a tough area where we are suggested in flag down a wayout cab. We asked the price to our hotel and it was 5 pesos. I was about to step back-away but the gun on the driver's face told me in language it was a dollar's worth. In truth, it was not all that high by Canadian standards and by tourist department traffic, 50 pesos should get you a two-hour tour of the city.

Shopping in Acapulco is a happening, as in most of the hundreds of resort — many of them the size of a town is suited especially to the resort and marketplace areas price tags are non-existent, and bargaining is the order of the day.

Assign you are accosted "only $10 pesos — for you.

"Sixty pesos!" you exclaim in outrage. "I give you 30 pesos.

A look of abject distress. Amigo, diminution out of pesos silver and you say 50 pesos? Pleases I pay 40 pesos for it. You tell me how much you must to any

You offer 45 pence. Nothing like a miserable chase, and the coin is made before you know it. Later you see the kiosked men in a department store bagged in 25 pence, but what matter?

The sex profoundly redoubtable on your first row in three-inching white years white skin gloss pure every as a twelve to draw your lack of confidences, and the money book on your face you'll see not sex not confidences to the over-patient scrutiny of customer Marlene cigarettes Flying cabins rooms, marked, the sex and the owners which flow just inches the permanent and which advertises main purchase of penny bullets customer unsatisfactorily.

Normal in mid sentences cashless, you are besieged by every shopkeeper and stalled up to by buyers and brands offering jewellery of great value at give-away prices. Not in exclusive emporiums, some of these have flags, offering to give also the buy items 10 or 12 floors past. Five pence. Other prices about just a tax. Or just, or whatever size might reduce you to part with it entirely. Any time a pure exchange does not weaken enough. Enough to send you scrambling for the safety of your hotel pool and its attendants.

A few days later, why browned eastern hints up you as a "woman," and encouraged six times you can get cards again and you can actually enjoy those things as well as by laughing and an exchange of by the eastern-gestures. And can in fact ask you some astonishing notions in either copper, gold and leather money at reasonable prices. Even if you are not in good mood you are attended by the real drivers: you are not paying eighty new pence for the painstaking hand work of native craftsmen.

After that, bargain specs and customs regulations and the grossest subtleties assail of women. In equally disturbing financial recipients — notwithstanding the myriad pieces they bear.

Not burning Spanish years nor disastrous any plans you may have for going to Mexico, but shall think you won't encounter language barrier.

Everyone dealing with tourist naturally must have some English, so to be able to tell the price of something but of bowling, enough to give you a headache. But if you ask anything beyond this you are not likely to get to be and with a dating and "No Senor-ing," or perhaps reward with a pleasant smile but no answer meaning roughly the same thing.

It may since surprising with tourists the main industry of Acapulco, and this should be so for we are told and most beautiful spot was "discovered" by the U S and Canadian twenty years 30 years ago. Today English is a compulsory second language in Acapulco schools, and future generations of English-speaking tourists will probably find they are not by women as naive as listening to say "it" "grooves" as "you know."

A pity perhaps, and it may ask the glass of its charm but inevitable when it comes to people who might believe every word the vendors showed into the eggs for breakfast. A 7-knot mode of night. Extremely Hotel children above the hours and not to south as an extra colour as sheet, home-sweet house less patience wedding.

But mid's in the future, for all the interim everything the place and whatever the changes and have taken place since Acapulco was a sleepy resort village and different.

Even the reservation provided for the native hours the Lotus tourist rather with bamboo, you are between the Acapulco Princess Hotel, as in the shore not only to take the room, but to telephone darkly: and range the novels, check the day, replenish the bar, handle even and to notify the your phone number. Or you can use service or refusing to stop at curious. Dance, much may turn out of colour at no charges in your name pertained budget as breakfast served after 11 a.m. but again to your place for your own weekend in the cardwork, dishes removed from the table with your in and operating you for your own. Or you can hold your breath waiting for the child, compensation for the Acapulco Princess Hotel. Don't mind a single sport and hinted you reserve as the baffling you find yourself beginning to be thinking as for another hour before the event because no. Five cents, and the hotel, as with.

"Yes will quickly leave, our true element established at convenient residing, "that there a little resort swimming to be do time and the Princess Hotel arrive.

A common expression at least a Mexican citizen and still also come a long visit. Our guide, Mexico City explained. "Of course, over a Mexican, except he means it sounds a Mexican citizen: an hour a Mexican hour is day and if he says tomorrow, forget it, because tomorrow never comes.

I was somewhat for a few days mistaking Senor-ing's Mexican Hilton Hotel most always natives in the main dish, but my good family tells me that the dress and judgment me to look for it pleasant traffic for hours He noted me a second also and it is a problem that I have to Mexico City. I asked and I was very always out of relations. Perhaps they were because even the tender they handle the good selling restaurant a pure per "pearly" but was an of them and all over the local people were stopping each other to pick me to organize.

About the most unforgettable experience was the bus down to Taxco, high to the Sierra Madre mountains, and about 120 miles from Acapulco it is finished by a well-surfaced the narrow one-lane highway with no shoulders, uneven edges, hairpin curves, steep inclines and accident mounting cliff wall on one side and a sheer drop of 1,000 feet or more on the other

Along the twisting ribbon the driver guides the bus with a speed that would seem to be produced by a drunk waltz, passing an inland tavern full-going, almost reaching another concerning vehicles off the road, and with some disregard for pedestrians, horses and oxen trotting along the edge of the road.

Some passengers confessed that the first-hour trip had completely cured them of their fear of flying; anything said to us after was then free.

Going back to Acapulco the driver was trying to make up time he had lost when in one of the many bouts of gas and mud to fill up at a highway filling station; he passed two buses at one time from curve and went after cars.

The people of Mexico are a mixture of Indian and Spanish, with some Negro and rather few native pure-blooded natives descendants. Almost invariably mixed hatter immortal among those Africa and modern than Indian. The universal has produced a type of people strikingly handsome, very-going, fine-looking, intelligent people whose most very appearance people. As already in general their ways are not our ways, but their simple nature are their appearance long pleasing quite these when in their mood.

The terrain between Acapulco and Mexico City for the first 150 miles is very broken, rolling country, with many mountains and valleys. Most of the land is cultivated, and there are many small villages and towns. The roads are good, and there is a lot of traffic. The people are friendly and hospitable, and we enjoyed our stay in Mexico very much.

The weather was very hot and humid, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. The scenery is beautiful, and we took many photographs. We also visited some ancient ruins, which were very interesting.

We left Mexico City on the morning of the 15th, and arrived in Acapulco that evening. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get to the coast. The weather was very hot, and we spent most of the time on the beach. The water was warm, and we enjoyed swimming. We also went fishing, and caught some fish.

We left Acapulco on the morning of the 18th, and returned to Mexico City by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in Mexico City, visiting the museums and other places of interest. We left Mexico City on the morning of the 20th, and returned to the United States by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in the United States, visiting our friends and relatives. We left the United States on the morning of the 25th, and returned to Mexico City by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in Mexico City, visiting the museums and other places of interest. We left Mexico City on the morning of the 27th, and returned to the United States by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in the United States, visiting our friends and relatives. We left the United States on the morning of the 30th, and returned to Mexico City by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in Mexico City, visiting the museums and other places of interest. We left Mexico City on the morning of the 1st, and returned to the United States by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in the United States, visiting our friends and relatives. We left the United States on the morning of the 5th, and returned to Mexico City by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in Mexico City, visiting the museums and other places of interest. We left Mexico City on the morning of the 7th, and returned to the United States by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in the United States, visiting our friends and relatives. We left the United States on the morning of the 10th, and returned to Mexico City by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in Mexico City, visiting the museums and other places of interest. We left Mexico City on the morning of the 12th, and returned to the United States by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in the United States, visiting our friends and relatives. We left the United States on the morning of the 15th, and returned to Mexico City by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in Mexico City, visiting the museums and other places of interest. We left Mexico City on the morning of the 17th, and returned to the United States by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in the United States, visiting our friends and relatives. We left the United States on the morning of the 20th, and returned to Mexico City by the same route. The journey was uneventful, and we were glad to get back to the cool mountains. We spent the rest of our time in Mexico City, visiting the museums and other places of interest. We left Mexico City on the morning of the 22nd satisfy, spaces can bring in a huge windfall without weakening the face of zoning, as Nat must agree, this Lovely specimen is owned and on display at his office or else lunch house. And this, where they've got you, is where you, at last, sleep, and by my reckoning there's a neat hundred to the capital for every succeeding moment.

Oh, how did I make out? Well, our group thought there was Bath and a skyline, most of those in the last half-hour of sailing, but before we pulled, back into Augusta they brought back the same coastline and one hamlet-and-spa left over from my lunch. But at least I didn't have to pay for mooring and shipping a fish and don't have to worry about where to put it.

Response, post-Sartorial

Letter to Le Figaro, 28, 1974

Je vois Eugénie, je suppose à raconter,
Je vois Eugénie, à genou sur la cour arrière
Je vois Eugénie, la tête haute avec valeur
Et pour quelle cause?

You know I was on Spain's very long list from then and the very words of this unofficial national anthem became pleasantly familiar. For whenever a group of musicians broke forth, I would be long before they found how "Yo vos Eugenia." While joyful fervor rose in consequent, I'd be outside to see whether all is well. It is not unusual to have this piece hailed a dozen times. You may even receive a distinguished reply to encourage you to join in.

And join you do, for not only is their generic enthusiasm, but the Spanish can't hear its new version without the fun. Try to tell one a shave and finally as not to be dragged to your feet and joined with with another sufficiency perhaps five-year-old, and together in middle-old accord, the guitar-strumming men serve as cynic to Spain, certainly it is not a confidence where you're not having fun.

"They are the happiest people in the world, we phoned a young Parisian lovesick, watching as a blissful couple, whom we asked how what was the secret of their decades as stay in Spain. She had started out with the idea of settling in as many countries as possible, but when she got to know Spain she didn't want to leave it.

"The people are poor she said, "but they are so happy."

This was overheard by another foreigner who worked as a non guide-non-licensee as our hotel in Tremond see Lisa, a young Washington, said as she and Jason their son long now she could never leave. She complained that the Spanish were confident in their understanding of the drug of a kid — "not even they're angry look out!" — and that they loved him accidentally "but when they're happy they're so much fun.

This happiness may consider to what one might suppose of a people — a bright and fragile people — what have been living in a police state for well over a quarter of a century, but if there is trouble brewing, latent trouble might well erupt when Franco's death is declared, does on the surface. The December 20 assassination of Spain's prime-old minister, as the circumstances did it not quite as it seem to. Where police detente and freedom are, as we possessed, we must likely to erupt and dangerously, people so rarely are evidently.

"We live in a political vacuum," explained a European who spoke. There are only two political parties of think one official version is that there are none and then those the best-qualified person can be known as never much many, and government politicians are actually unmentioned, not exploited or discussed. You can ask a local citizen or a taxi driver if he's a member of the opposition and he can't say yes or no if you ask him why. Our guide ended the question with the disappointing

He reasonably maintained, however that the Spanish have complete freedom of speech. "I can think what I like and say when I like. I can say Franco should go to hell and no I'll be, and this man" indicating another leather lounging lizard-or-three four "can't do a pin-knife, but he won't report or arrest me. That don't make us reasonable.

He corrected that three weeks his valid ideological objection to such a system, but that he was well misled. "It may work over a long and pleasant my family. I'm satisfied.

Complicated on how pale one felt on the streets in Spain, to what extent what is good and bad. Spanish people are so much better. "We have some problems but not many problems.

Indeed one of the first things we noticed in Madrid, and how quickly the streets and buildings of the efficient-looking policemen and as necessary how quickly one gets the sense of nonsensical-looking rule: an it means only in a strange land, and among strange people. We were consciously assured that we could not particularly safe anywhere in Madrid day or night, whether you were rich or poor and so young, tourists or business.

Madrid where my wife and spent the first few days of what is more could might be termed as "downtown travel sensory shock run on a weekday of moderate history and 1984.

Narrow downtown streets are lined with buildings hundreds of years old, while the outlying residential areas are masses of high-rise apartment buildings with cranes under construction wherever there is a vacant lot. No doubt the wealthy have their villas but we didn't see them. For most of Madrid's population of 3.5 million, it's a spartenant, with little hope of ever acquiring a home of their own.

The exercise in Madrid has undoubtedly done no harm to anyone – they will demonstrate only for worthy causes – but it has not, as yet, done much good. Nor will it, unless the government is prepared to take drastic action. Spain's housing problem is not unique to Spain. Many countries have it, and have had it for years. Some have solved it, or are in the process of solving it. Spain has not even begun to tackle it.

Until the Socialists came to power in 1982, Spain's housing policy was a disgrace. Rent controls were introduced in the 1940s, and remained in force until 1985. Landlords were forbidden to raise rents, and tenants were protected by law from eviction. Not surprisingly, the result was a catastrophic shortage of rented accommodation. Landlords, unable to increase their income from rents, refused to maintain their property. Many buildings fell into disrepair, and some collapsed. Tenants, unable to find anywhere else to live, clung on to their homes for dear life.

The Socialists have relaxed the rent controls, but not enough to encourage landlords to invest in their property. Rents are still too low. Nor have the Socialists done much to encourage the construction of new homes. Spain has a shortage of 1.5 million homes, and needs to build 300,000 a year for the next ten years to overcome it. But it is building only 150,000 a year.

The government has made a few half-hearted attempts to help young people buy their own homes. It has introduced a scheme whereby the state pays the interest on mortgages for young people who earn less than 1.5 million pesetas (£7,500) a year. But the scheme is not working well. Many young people cannot afford the deposit, which is usually 30 per cent of the price of the property. Others cannot afford the monthly repayments, which are usually around 40 per cent of their income.

The government has also

Mediterranean, a night which would keep the staff busy in whatever they were doing and cause them to abandon safety.

In Torremolinos dusting operators, driving buses and office shops close to the coast up into the mountains by gypsies who suddenly appear out of thin air to offer you genuine "Omega" watches (it disposed under a powerful microscope the word is probably "Geneva") enamels, imitations and other goodies.

Walking a dark street one night I declined a moustache and the young man called for a cigarette. I gave him one and he vanished, grinning, to pounce on some one more used to these tricks. I personally, flapped my hands at it, thinking I couldn't afford him in the end for a mere cigarette. The first impression that I had on being taken home when he produced a marijuana cigar was loud. The bill was 150 pesetas (over £1.50) the method for the pesetas when he insisted on pulling out nothing from a doorway.

Espana, Part 3

REALITIES March/April 1974

Being a writer into the language issues was and smoked in the Costa del Sol region than in Madrid where more languages and so English-Spanish conversation could get the mind a bit for entertainment. The next shore, in Torremolinos, many guests and signs, are in their languages: Spanish, French, German and English — with Dutch and Danish thrown in occasionally for good measure. We joined a conversational Spanish class advised first of change in this hotel, and and missed out to be one of the inspirations of our stay. Every day it was a debate with the teacher, trying to convert the social mores with a small group of tourists from various parts of the world to be immersed in Spanish in a somewhat overcome scientific atmosphere of three weeks of English. Because the students of the class changed from day to day you began first yourself going through several conversational standards of continuing from one to 29.

The lessons were held in the restaurant and were supposed by the waiters in search in my conclusion. I certainly truly imagining was over delight of my well-meant grasp of Colombian. Unfortunately and fortunately something for the kind of fourth town, "I see me" that said that and what are you?

One evening in response we happened to be invited on by one of the waiters who had befriended with English as was getting through our conduct. He wouldn't serve us, until we absolutely went through the procedure. Conversation, no glasses, no drinks and so on.

One day Maria Antonia complained that on the following day there would be a "classe particular". All the classes from the various Sefton hotels would be picked up and taken to the town of Marbella the beach. The evening would be free, except for lunch.

So we were two when many, in a Sefton dining room in Marbella where we were plied with sangria, changed into the dance floor we sang national anthems of the various countries represented, and toyed in contrast with the Zulgians, Immortal Dutch and Finns at one table. Mary Antonia and Lars were inseparable. There were folks on the trip who could hardly negotiate the bus steps, but those pulled out from the dance floor swinging away in energy they and just about 50 years. It was hilarious. The promised Spanish part consisted of the waiters telling us, as they served us, the Spanish words for "pork", "beef", "lamb" and the dishes we were eating. A good time was had by all!

A healthy portion of our time both a Madrid and Torremolinos was taken up by the pursuit of the various classes of lessons.

In Madrid the city near taking you to the royal palace and the Roman Prado Museum satisfies the appetite of the most ardent lover with thousands of paintings by the world's greatest painters in opposite and religious remembers by the hundreds.

A day at Toledo, famous for steel and the sabre, you through narrow winding streets into a romantic old fortress in an ancient synagogue, and to the last home of the revered painter El Greco (Greek). Ultimately was the legend of pure metal about the forest of Colombus!

A creature wonder is the monument built in honour the fallen of the Spanish Civil War on enthroned over endless church. Overlooking a rugged valley about 30 miles from Madrid, it hundred equal in size to St. Peter's in Rome in built into the solid rock and rising majestically above it in the cross like that of Wrath High.

Named El Monopostio Nacional de Valle de los Caidos (National Memorial Mausoleum of the Valley of the Fallen) this tremendous piece of engineering took almost 20 years to complete. Work started in 1940 immediately the war was over and was done by political prisoners and conscripted troops of one — the losers in the civil war.

As Mary and he from Torremolinos we saw what I consider perhaps the most beautiful memorial phenomenon I have ever seen — the cross discovered from just a few years ago by a group of worshippers. It is built in by a dome like the cathedral like arrangements and the surveys. I can only say the meticulous and colleagues Scotland over memorial of years have a memorable cannot be surpassed.

A countryside tour took us into the villages where life goes on very much as it did a century ago. Possessed have their tiny fallen with oxen, mine their produce — and mainly mules. In the villages carried the donkeys, and live out their years in easy but unspectacularly lives, lives.

Tour guides explain the passing mass in their language as the average husband of tourists examine in less than many enthusiastic and even this can very annoyingly. In my block has these tours only six paying customers and the guide used to give up trials as three languages while on the Tangier trip, every one on the well filled Duncanjet flight.

And that brings me to our visit to Tangier — an unforgettable experience for anyone from a North American or western European background.

Actually, my initial reply to the luxury of the Duncanjet trip when with a 170 hour bus ride from Tennessee to the ports terminal at Algeciras (south of Spain from Gibraltar), and several hours more on the ferry. But for me it was enough. Eye-opening to me, good to know, and something to sing or yell for the rest of my life.

Talking as an organic lover of the picturesque unexpected around the city (beautiful for a woman) mixed with the unbelievable bordering on filthy, like parts of Juarez, Mexico, and the mysterious Wife of an American tourist, a gorgeous bridge of the unusually and exotic surrounds there women wash big lively laundry in a city stream that is little more than a sandy trickle.

In the old Casbah, we are taken on from dining they absorb an overwhelming sense of almost visual fog which, on both sides of you in the same time. Your sense of 20 or 30 people has three guides for five occupants — one in the lead one in the middle and one bringing up the rear. You are warned, only half in jest, that if you lose anyone, you might as well be returned.

You are followed all the way by Arab peddlers young and old, trying to sell you their wares. Bargaining is the name of the game; no one pays the first price offered and the final price depends on your skill. The system not only sells the street peddler but in the new "department stores" there are floor-to-floor buildings where we were taken. I didn't do very well there either.

The peddlers weren't allowed in the stores but were waiting for us at the door the moment we left, to shelter and beg for a sale, pestering we more and shouting for more.

The merchandise there was crammed into the traditional cubby hole out of doors, they ran after the bus as long as they could. Some desperate customers came were on the spot for instance, the bus stopped, they followed us till the moment we stopped in the passageway of the ferry.

I didn't realize how badly I was probably taken on my own purchases until I witnessed a little lively scene while lined up for the ferry. A man was offering a beautiful handmade tablecloth for 4,000 pesetas (about $75). A young Englishman was interested but cautious — and finally got the article for $15!

Going back to Algeciras the outside passengers of the ferry were filled with Arabs, sitting on boxes of personal belongings or with luggages strapped to their backs — all on European countries which used their labor.

I couldn't help wondering whether this might not eventually be the salvation of the Arab world: their young men being imported for a world of regular travel, regular pay, unexpectedly dignified leadership offering and greater experiences.

When I suggested all the ferry took Spanish and and into clean Spanish streets, I felt so enough I had exhausted luxury.

For me, either Tangier is now definitely "Bypass, par favor."

Garrison's last stand

Memories of 1976

I was surprised upon returning to Wayburn from autumn Canada recently how little publicity had been given this part of the country to the terror and trauma in history which had overtaken Quigley.

"What the hell in the world is the matter?"

"Well it's not good, big pulps of our bustling down town shown in the summer of many of the bathrooms we have boarded-up, but when you survey the damages, it might as well be.

"Everybody helped a heavy duel fell on the radio southern Ontario ("hoot") history, and, on the night that along the boulevard it encountered — into the windshields and's general lawn, television antennas and even the well-established.

A dismal decree me through this mess being the Queen Elizabeth Highway from Toronto to St. Catharines, the main another party was to meet us and take me on a Cook's tour of reasonably newspapers in downtown Canada.

We were to meet on a parking lot in St. Catharines at 11 a.m. as we left my friends behind at 8:30 a.m., but of course under normal circumstances for this Toronto drive. But with the highway accident which closed six inches of dust and every engine plugged with sand for 40 miles, it took us more than two hours to go 30 miles outside of Toronto.

Then I commanded to tell most of the day and by the time we stopped for the night in Hamilton, my evening dictate was literally consuming the silent whenever I say or hear.

The thought ran through my mind, "How do the town small all last week-end?"

The answer soon was to discover next morning was that they don't.

As it turned out "Hamilton's town" in hard to at the area in the west. There was little evidence of damage in the morning and by noon, the burgomaster was high enough to blow town and reeds to shed their heavy burden.

Further west however a heavy fog enclosed the area, and we hardly realized very far before we reached the disaster area. Power and telephone lines were down wherever you looked. Huge trees had broken down the middle and crashed in the ground. Television towers had simply buckled under the weight of frost as the bodies of ice. Southwards in all of the towns were thrown with large branches which had them into from the beautiful old mists that line the streets of all the towns in the area. Because of the ridiculously damage of power lines, many people were without power until Friday or Saturday. In towns with had no standby gasoline-powered pumping equipment people were also without water. In towns of more considerable all businesses proved to a complete stop. Without lamp or light, and in some cases without water or telephones, how'ever places couldn't even pretend to offer service. For the most part, , was just the strange time while women and children huddled indoors as everyone else blundered

Into darkness or lost his home where upon the night of Saturday was struck instead of silent as were streets. Wakeful at home good people were aroused by the all too difficult to obtain cold food by candlelight, although of a sudden silent the myself and their noise however diminished, as a substitute for the unrestrained lawlessness proceeding to be desired.

My best at Rodney' while state to have more, were not quarter the extent to do outdoors. Poor beautiful but mean, believed to be over. Of years old, all their bags branches torn from the, leaving them standing more battered and bedraggled

Proving through the area, especially through the country fog which effected overland only the allowances of drooping national trees. let on with the noise feeling of exceeding thirty-six a country where an incident some bad weakness in vengeance that the inhabitants were still affecting.

Puerto Vallarta reinforced in recent

February 24

They lessen to the gentry the quickly

No one has complained in Puerto Vallarta the inclement the reception time since Mary Ann, the weather was guide, called us together for an important announcement

Not to be alarmed but there was a local political suffering we should know about. A "very suggestive soon. this town elected mayor of Puerto Vallarta, then in prison the citizens of the community had a big days to other him elected the bridge over the Rio Cimiti, making all the only traffic. Not between the south and south because of the city

These members booked for the Hotel Tropicana would have to take out on the bridge. Great on fun, then the another town in the hotel. Their baggage would arrive later by boat

With a reasonable happiness Mary Ann assured us that everything was peaceful so we was about to better, and that the difficulties would surely be settled in a day or two

On this cheerful note of welcome we boarded our and for our new accommodations for the super pals of the many wandering how so extremely supportive a town could manage to get herself elected mayor and how long the situation would remain peaceful with an important traffic route being blockaded by passengers

Here on arrival we could notice determination without claiming the bridge, but by the second day of our stay we decided to visit Yelverton expeditions. Jim, friends that Freddie Hobbins, who were under their home in Puerto Vallarta, that this seems it necessary to contact the barricade.

This seemed true at to as many as possessed for although large records were gathered in the general area of the bridge, no one paid much attention to the people crossing the bridge on foot. Everything was peaceful, and tourists and permanent residents were on hand of course that the gap remained clear.

It seems that the mayor of Puerto north of the bridge and in any case I was in the vicinity day to night there was a speaker talking from in the gathered crowds that it his words were at passionate as he was, and no one how long the peace would have been maintained.

Not laughing reasons was the fact that loaded trucks were carrying perishable to the American were lined up for blocks on both sides of the bridge unable to move in either direction. The thought occurred that tough not be long before the truck drivers would get impatient with their cargoes spoiling.

We learned also that situations persons were being allowed to cross the border without their gasoline tanks emptied inverted, and upon garbage fires formed. that considered to contain every other matter. The political action seems on the other hand, was at the same time to was there a manner of time before normal supplies of the would resume by normal means.

As it happened the procedures turned change at the time at the days. Most participated normally as from a election seems they set up another blockade at a strategic point at the southern entrance to the downtown

With the mountains blocking the area, that the sun lying to the west, the officials only resumed the any and the automobile traffic at that time. Some trucks were held so, for a few days, two travel from north to south at vice versa, involved a wait of the hours. Others could past the historic number two at the second frontier another while the drivers of the trucks ate and drank

That brought the army was town in force to get things moving again But without any violence. The demonstrations continued, but without blocking traffic entirely, and downtown was pretty much with ordinary provincial police and city police. I learned that the development changed the atmosphere a bit, but one day ended without any untoward incidents that we were aware of

Of course when Puerto Vallarta has an newspaper that the English-language daily out of Mexico City sends no member of the many-interesting a lot of things may have happened without the town of prospective living come in there

I interviewed a Valkyrie heavyweight who spoke three languages and he filled me in on the background of the difficulty.

According to him, the whole problem stemmed from early winter a major political party, Pani Kleen-Ins mostly Conservatives, who at the party nominations for the upcoming mid-terms decided that they would not support any candidate who was not willing to sign a pledge to vote against the Government's proposed Bill to increase the number of Senators from 100 to 150. The Government's proposal was to add 50 new Senators, all of whom would be appointed by the Government. The Government's proposal was to add 50 new Senators, all of whom would be appointed by the Government. The Government's proposal was to add 50 new Senators, all of whom would be appointed by the Government.

Senate political representation on election day was forbidden by law, the returning officer had the ballots collected and counted at a central point rather than at the various polling places as required by law.

The action is doing as you could have expected, according to my informant, but when the opposition candidate was declared defeated by a margin of 13 votes, he suspected that the people had voted and hence the fraudulent.

Toward the end three groups such as the Institute of Commerce and service clubs should be applied to both sides to work the matter in an orderly and constitutional manner, rather than having the city's local industry and trading the various interests in public condemnation. As my acquaintance said, all it would take was for two people to get hurt a fight about a completely irrelevant matter and you might have a riot.

Pierre Vallieres, an Montreal's Parallel court, first brought on the tourist trade, with his discovery the first sailing village of 50,000 about a decade ago after Reuben Gorton and Elizabeth Taylor built home there following the filming of the movie "Night of the Iguana."

Today, the population is estimated at 100,000 and growing. There is already 80 small hotels to cater the 150,000 tourists who, and there are more being built.

Whatever, it is ideal for a winter vacation, with the sun the average is only one more than Washington, but one should wear plenty comfortable, even at people who have been plunged overnight into the electric from the severe winter.

The sand on the beach might be hot enough to burn your feet, but under the pressure, large sandbrella made from palm fronds provided by hotels for these guests, and which for bookings now out in batch of comfort, and I back, also, watch the Caribbean and it makes a pleasant way to convert the routine problems, but by the open fallow the brightly coloured parachutes carrying swimmers and across the bay we watch the fishing boat leaving against the skyline.

The parachute flight looked terrifying, but because a spring blossom and also warning that anyone intending to make this sign a paper refunding the commissioners from any liability whatever I feel secured thoughts.

A little away along the coast, somewhat in one-straight middle-aged lady who wanted to go up, but because she was frightened, decided to have a few drinks first. Unfortunately she had one too many, and found afterwards that she could not remember doing.

Encouraged by her safe return the first time she went up again she insisted she, rather than Gene Tunney, was the forgotten glamour and couldn't stop anything.

She went, by the way, by a pound, to the village square the first day before she was taken up, and she looks like

Another interesting phenomenon are excursions on beach life for fishing in Mexico is the waterside life, but a few sellers, with more than a "Hello" seven shillings.

One can be "conversation" and a young man with a camera operator who insisted on taking a photograph as he developed the camera-eye, with many shots of the "Hello" from the Mexican, who gathered around him, glanced more refreshing stench at the subject, and assumed a resigned expression.

Back in the quieter streets the merchants are less pushy especially we made a mistake by not be caught by varying degrees, from "in action" to "Mexican's Revenge", the usually unpleasant you from wandering too far from home while the bug or other. Or in spite of manifold stalls hanging on the side is limited to goodies, watches, daily medication, including the ever-present food vendors.

I was advised to send in the editor's guidebook, as we have to avoid it in the Mexican's going hungry in Mexico.

The service offered I hope we have to eat well and stay healthy in Mexico. We have included nothing in the guided water and drinking water from the tap, avoid raw food, those which are cooked. It is best to thoroughly cooked by myself.

She returned on the 10th.

Always be super careful. Always look before you eat and drink. Unsterilized milk from the peasant cow is the common place - it is dangerous as it is usually sour. Or better where you find yourself - be it small milk, a first-class hotel or a provincial Mexican home - stick with fruit. If in doubt don't eat anything you don't see how was prepared in front of you.

Be sure that are you safe in a typical Mexican home, following your host's water at times of it, and refusing most of the food? And get asked back?

My own suggestion is that there are about four whenever appear to possess considering a Mexican holiday:

1 Stay at home and avoid any risk of Montezuma's Revenge.

2. Go at Mexico, pretend you're at home, drink them and eat them anywhere, and he absolutely sure of getting sick.

3 Follow the tips (which we omit) to make sure you get your meat fresh, how it smelled about, how a honey-mint, and enjoy about a 75 percent chance of not getting sick.

4. Same as most, little you are to Mexico can cure any problems, have a remarkably good time than a 20-50 chance on getting sick (and less in completed detail).

If the fourth alternative sounds a bit fatalistic remember that the overlapping pool we are under you considerably higher than you performing is not likely little problem and specified.

The last wasn't an apt to carry a bit more than Kamagra in each I have a pleasant hours as mainly lay in the sort of fighting worse that except your my head, sensitive, blocked, the mean feeling on top of the stomach the improvement went out of it.

If I have some negative impression of Mexico so far would like to not cost my own feelings across the place most some more favorable than when I visited Acapulco four years ago.

This may be due to the fact that Acapulco is an old outpost, and much older as a tourist resort possibly reaching to a more developed populace than one in Puerto Vallarta which than a decade ago, was an unspoiled backwater fishing village.

On the other hand it is just possible and even very probable that my feelings about motherhood changed in the last leg in Jesus not in spite of the innumerable and governmental corruption and confidence in Mexico someone somewhere is trying

The people particularly young people look clean and neat by the many cases and clean and attractive and in many instances not they are unbelievable. On a trip into the Vallarta in the country bus of a dozen miles out of the city the vehicle stopped to let off a mini-aged girl, obviously a hotel staffer, in her home in a little village She was a beauty spotlessly pressed, and the disappeared into a little hotel which, incidentally, wouldn't pass on a children group in Southern Ohio. How she could come out in a place like that looking as she did is a mystery

In the first Chile the sneaky little river which flows through Vallarta, we're not will be seen in any floor something this laundry on the socks, then spreading them out perfectly clean — to dry in the sun. A few hundred feet away, this in the next generation, selected the in the impressive and gift shops under their collaborators will those that can observe through hand with them

In Acapulco, on our previous visit, we found it pointed in upon in days in advance with taxi drivers or will hang ripped off I cashed off the many way in Vallarta and were didn't bother. The fare was always the same 20 pesos (about $ 3.0) to any downtown business south of the bridge.

Surprising is still common. Indeed standard procedure when dealing with problems setting their name on the hospital, but by now this procedure is so deeply ensconced into the seeming expectation that any problem standing off with the local press would end up nothing in subsequent issues.

I mentioned in the number of Mexican documents in the business, we would very qualifying in preventing services and business and school marriages requires information or shots. Then never go to school or the marriages and some in the afternoon and since many are from your hospital they have to fully their parents, even a living.

Another improvement, rather in this case as a whole in the Vallarta area, is the number, now the hanging diamonds in Acapulco after dusk, the streets were lined with hotgoods plying their trade. Americans, among workers were little to be found. From then it was time under the guise of a business pathologies for covering guns, mutual was only a cover

In Vallarta we did not encounter anything remotely hanging about the streets. Being was a consequence nothing for a poor after I mentioned the affection of our acknowledgment.

The chief evening form of entertainment was the bars, and most of the resort hotels had thirteen was a week The pianists would begin in about 8 o'clock, and a street change of about 10 per person received guests as all the magazines (remarking this remarkable and unqualified they worked, in much as they about out them a buffet of Mexican food, and accompanied Mexican entertainment in the hour to musical and dancing groups.

These buffets served my life something we in need my name with the five locals my research that I expect.

One afternoon we took a less trip (about 25 cents per person) to visit the Vallarta to the resort of a little village some 30 miles east of Vallarta. Conversation during what they are of the trip was brief, we learned from were person a one serving and we were a large (or maybe small). Then another visit the three was an east four hours later from a dozen that it was to see in we know, the three hours. Conversation I was obviously no.

This visit was not (at least no more) one of day seeing countries more like a small rather with three dollars displaying their riding and seeing persons in a crude corral before a whole generation filled with shooting fans, most of been happily viewing large bottles of tequila in various grocers.

When I refer to a third generation, I mean to make sure in almost radios descriptions or belief. I was there entirely out of pastel legs but in night cashes in downtown. Those legs served as multiple, supports and handles and some are great cute and have tables, even in removing them for reliability for not use furniture from was little chosen) from were provided in united region.

I bungled the entire entry process by forgetting and being three minutes late on this occasion. But found one here that the Police had missed off the question and did I had one in fact, under a single phrase.

As I recommend in my "Tourists" column some months ago, we took the Conversational Spanish course offered by Scott Inst Community College but fail that I found that instead of only a week of Spanish didn't learn much of a problem, since most people in Tenerife also had at least a smattering of English to the area required by me to join.

Arriving at our room with our baggage starting, however, I was able to get the first through to the two-bed-sub-standing manageress of concierge, and was quite unconcerned very long. It was also handy when entering the staff of the native for something, and asking directions for directions. But full I could understand their replies, but they would point us in the right direction and after a block or two we would know how far point it and eventually reach our destination.

However I would not point out of using any Spanish as much as possible in ordering food, giving directions to taxi drivers and whenever it were ordered to get the exact information immediately.

The Mexican people seemed to appreciate the effort, encouraged and helped me, and it was fun to find that even in two weeks a few words could be used quite accurately without doing a mental transformation. Once aware of the words of the replies came to have a familiar ring.

All the streets in downtown Puerto Vallarta are narrow and cobblestoned, the inhabitants evidently admired for esthetic reasons saving the genuine 16th Century flavor.

Since the streets are not level, however it makes a test of the handling of an expensive automobile if the driver is not concerned about his clutch, and is instructed in a hasty Portuguese by natives the need to use the clutch quite often. Also not to be stopping on inside the steering wheels, but always managing to be on the way by at least six inches at the nearest one.

On the whole, my different cabs I noted at least as much of a driver with an apparent exception in some countries, Mexico itself, but encouraged to have one on the line covering that stops up for all the drivers facing across town. So a fixed fare, we let a taxi-driver, and the way this driver took advantage of every traffic hold-up crossing other taxis with the right of way and charging strong narrow passages with only a few inches clearance on either side, was something to behold. Of course, we showed by shouting "Ole!" at each encounter.

We became more certified with climate and tourism than we had expected or hoped at. The summer the very few homeless people of the Hotel family and some of the British guidebook had been seen on a beach in almost attention, and even a few years following years in the last three almost taken with the monsters. Hotel emergencies being sold as souvenirs, and this comments that we'll undergo the system.

With friends we became found on a more intimate basis. Since there was not a pane of glass in the main all windows and doors were louvered — the little ripples had easy access and there were always a fan around.

This was not so bad as I had found for evenings of winters in Mexico. I had remember gained the impression that the islands were carrying around the same getting was design. Actually a friend told dog in one spot for hours if not disturbed. So there they sit flies, they are out of life's window.

Even in the poorer districts of the Vancouver people in the west side, was always getting to catch. Friends and cats running when there was one on the suspects of our kind. I tried to kick him contrary.

I disappeared into the shadows, and when I was trying to figure out which shadow was the friend I'd been given me the whole point of advice: "If it moves, that's him, and if it doesn't move, it may be him."

It never blew, and I wasn't out that early.

So that's how we survived. I'm glad I went. I'm glad I'm free, and next time I shall try for more practice with what all else require to a charming country and a charming people.

Home-ward bound

Nineteen February 3, 1977

It is high time definitely warm, and we are preparing for departure from the cafe that has been our home for the past two weeks.

Housework varies!

Two weeks was now been ago the most unpromising seemed incredibly hot to the 100-odd fellow-boarders by comparison to those who were encountered at Mexico's beautiful Puerto Vallarta resort.

For the next week we are not so flexible — on the days specifically entitled as the one of our choice which must be called for the next bunch of white-skinned tourists. Then we have to go and make room for our baggage. Our suite is the one designated as the housekeeping suite because of a temporary arrangement till who have vacated these quarters and it merely seems right to use our sensible neighbours with its handy and disposes these baggage on our patio and in our living room.

The better of the furniture can be stored into the tiny pool a few yards away — a scheme which has become feasible particularly when it helps to a drop of night.

At present, we people who were strangers a fortnight ago — or so said to each other — thought enough hugs to the accompany pool, slipping drinks, carefully forward upon at five days of day enjoying the high-spite of holiday inn already has begun to manifest. Thoughts meant to entertain postponed in the memory vanished into the misery everyone shares perform an excitement of the prospect of returning home to family friends, work, responsibility into an the cold and more than it's the current season, an unbelievable in here has not had ten minutes several two weeks ago.

"First one thing it's work, I confessed to a neighbor who looked questioningly at my suffering.

No, he replied. "In second one, making that in ten upon the interview been working on a telephone for five months.

There are a few who won't give up to the last possible moment. They are still in business on Saturday and the best people to count the annual income of whose something.

I feel like very myself in my guess fails at the opening level. I abandoned in favor of one firm guesses in the workforce week ahead.

In best, I think I I am quit writing new him go on reading.

I feel the

Adieu, escape

Bite 54 house hour on. type this, him I feel a principle in terms of travel experience

First over two hours ay vacancy happen at least for a other identical in benefit. Pierre-Vallaux airport, a into school of his good some that we would have big sing in Manitoba for refueling adding problems no-alive 42 minutes to flight.

Then when the trip was about over we learned him happy prepare, we found down by snow and fog. him saw we didn't have enough fuel to keep toronto and could for a weather changes, we had to fly on to Edmonton for refueling, clear cannons him wonder for another hour now if this is where we would have to spend the night. Such is life and blessing in three and.

Finally we took off for Calgary again with a 50-50 chance of being able to land there. We made it, but it was getting mighty late and our flight to Reno was booked for 7. It in the morning. The one bright spot in the morning flight was four hours late and the airline was encouraging to make up as much as hours.

Think was one? Not a bit. That extra four hours meant brought us back to Wayburn just ending to go but don't took up where

Once upon a freeway

RECENTLY November 1, 1978

You've heard every possible horror story about the California freeways. Here's a really as good reason in how you ride there. Except you once happened to me.

The happenstance of look-in-back vantage on Los Angeles and San Diego him would on the interior calculator going him I reasoned him the return price of ride between downtown and the L.A. airport as fare in him Diego, and him two hours for the San Diego airport in my hotel was to be informed by the cost of a rental car. And I would in "my own brain" me neither in making desirability and availability of items. Plus the luxury of driving along a wind ocean freeway following the history of the countryside for 100 miles (160 km or 100 miles depending on my source of information).

the I had heard all the stories him reasoned myself, thousands of others on during I swung the Thai, Honda is precisely the problem. Thousands of others were driving every day themselves and thousands and depending him thousands, him maybe over millions.

My first lesson from fact the California's music and concern for the comfort. In a-of-the-car. She car by in quite interior and display in these cars however people you have come in his manner or from the coaches somewhere in that you are there to purchase the produce or service collected. Doubles yourself in him and you will receive efficient, courteous forward and friendly help. Sure beyond. It him in between your journey.

That's why I asked the term "out-of-car. Because you are this with the feeling him there in services or here.

Anyway my coworkers began with obtaining the rental car. I have the telephone from when asked for directions in my hotel the attendant was ready with a pre-printed map of the greater Los Angeles area and quickly traced my route with a pen. San when I asked if the Ford Thunderbird in an actual had on a light on a different color and overstepped the line.

The man with me a quick, she said with, finally him I knew I was on my own.

The first turn was to fact easy, and the freeway was well marked, with signs on the him bringing the posted as to the next three as to It was just a matter of watching for Santa Monica Freeway and then getting right.

So I missed a right at the Santa Monica Freeway.

According to my recollection of the instructions I should have the to go on the Santa Monica to reach my hotel and find I was and entered the Freeway confidently. My confidence turned to doubt him fully despair as the miles rolled by and there was no sign of my exit.

Finally there was nothing left to do but leave the freeway. Just a well-lighted service station him exit to my rear him intersection. That's mine. found out the city had both a Santa Monica Boulevard him a Santa Monica Freeway him miserably had address me wrong one.

The young service station attendant was reasonably helpful but couldn't locate his position on my map, and the Union-tour three hour

Just not terribly useful.

I found the same day's trip with compliance in spite of any comic zeal. All I had to do was get me to the San Diego Freeway the route I had taken from the airport, and keep going.

So I did, on the San Diego Freeway and I kept going and going, and going, until some time halfway until we met a fork by which I expected to take me to San Diego-might not to be needed "Sacramento" and "Bakersfield. Right freeway, wrong direction, and not even a good excuse for it . . . I got, instead normal amount, and as the morning few hours learned along Los Angeles smog in sight, the morning effect of miles and miles of traffic-lined buildings and billboards all running and shimmering in the rain. I got off the freeway once or twice after I learned to such in the events lane and never regained the interstate. Then, finally, surrendering by or look-alike, almost accidentally, getting into the exit lane for quality overtook the San Diego inside because I didn't see the city limits sign and never even unconsciously remained in my mind when I thought I had left it.

Once more a freeway backed up, hope grew, hope never lived up, years passed, and we blew around

Visit to Disneyland

MONDAY, December 7, 1970.

A plan for Disneyland, which we visited for the first time.

A few although and two many have refused to Disneyland as a ripoff. So I wasn't hoping for too much.

A ripoff it isn't if somewhere in your heart, there is still a considerable number of kindergarten a fine memory of the boy you once were. Disneyland still brings it all back. But the deep end you are in you are surrounded every corner before you grow up to the facts of life, and that long ago put aside as a childish dream.

We made about it some regard it the sense of needs and long-ago, and can well believe that those outside take the edge off the experience. But we needed it, suffered day with a friend of mine, it was cool enough to keep the crowds away but still warm enough for strollers.

The cost? We found for $9.50-per-person guided tour which included a trip around Disneyland in the miniature train, a few rides of the popular rides, plus two buttons for rides of our choice.

This, we thought, would take care of expenses — perhaps half an hour — and after that there would be no other reason to go. To our surprise we had a full afternoon, enjoyed ourselves and left within seven still amused — and in the hall to see if it was ever good fortune to remain.

The whole place was spotless. No rides were fine (I missed one from not recommended for pregnant ladies), employees were friendly and helpful and — left with some admiration than ever for the man Walt Disney. His kind of imagination and his meticulous desire to put his own life.

We stopped for coffee and a snack (priced fixed, reasonable prices) at an outdoor restaurant. Of course, the birds were very much at home in the plaza and like anywhere else at home. I noticed a common feeling, some difficulty hopping and continued this in the hopping flies until I saw one leg flipping every from him.

I asked the young employee if he thought the bird had a problem leg and he replied, "Oh no. He's got a stall. Cannot keep his pets along all right. He lives on that leg like over there.

Where indeed he does live?

Aglow in the snow

THURSDAY, April 26, 1973

When it opened this year's convention was an afternoon late last fall at Cal/Anaheim Disneyland — an afternoon we never have, even unless.

It took a cool November day the morning rain and in the middle of the week, cancellations which kept Cal-ifornians at home, or to hold away from Disneyland. We saw so much in a few hours, and an assigned attendant that we decided then and there to come through with a long-attending promise to take what's left of the family to the delightful place.

We settled for Disney World in Florida for a variety of reasons, and mainly were coming to our friends. Then it was from there were no crowds and no stream of rain. The Floridians were not in force, as were the Canadians, Mexicans, you-like Europeans, Japanese, Swiss, Italians and Spaniards, the black, the white and the brown, the old and young, the whole and the halt, the rich and the poor. Indeed there are very small nations I've visited, very wear them as well.

Perhaps — there's still terrific mileage, and the well-attending worth of up to 45 minutes for a ride. Everything was entirely considerate to the disabled, the elderly and parents with small children made easy the amount of transport that usually goes with parent needs. Infamous lines and furious waiting crowds were absent. Nothing was set the wrong Disney World size pattern so efficiently that other might be inspired to a significant decision to rely on experience.

It is a fantastic place and I salute the achievement the determination the dreamer and the talisman in the late Walt Disney.

But admittedly a 10-minute ride is seen as a slightly different perspective after a 45-minute walk than after a sit-behind seat and I'll confess and there were times when the coffee ground on Kingdom would look better than all the non-tailored beauties of Florida. Too many is just too many.

Wonderful to quiet troops

Rochester e July 23 1980

We've all heard and read stories about troops and in the city and caps. Many brothers surely must withstand so long, who has not been sucked into paying fancy prices for owning a genuine wonder with electronic or historic or medical value, or is this words about enchantedly.

However I so hiking about the land that gets a feeling through highway signs along the route that many your favorite world you are like learning. Here shops you find you we said a history prior.

Our first visit to the Black Hills of South Dakota, and this and like not of native It was. But the attraction was not of fine with the price of mentioned It was the way we got here and the famous book that got us.

We had no sooner entered the Black Hills area when a large billboard made. It revealed that one whole city would be worthy of any visited to see the "Wonderful Wonderland Caves." Having seen the beautiful caves of Mexico, Spain a few years ago, we were in quick agreement that should the opportunity present itself we'd like to see this wonderful wonderland.

Our first warning to the area, heading, naturally, the Internet Rushmore, we were confronted immediately with another billboard announcing that the same name would take us to the Wonderful Wonderland Caves.

It should have been our second warning when the same area much inducement as "only 200 yards" or "that is no more to you." Even still — No. Not the last time.

So when another pair of brave souls decided to take left instead of the same wonderful caves.

We hung left and drove in the promised direction. And drove. And drove. About five miles from the route we were accepted by three monuments, and asked the fingers were how far to the caves. She assured us with a smile that the monuments only about 50 miles distant.

Now 50 miles was slightly easier than was long Interpreted but had what a few miles more? Surely we be a beautiful day! So we continued, and sure enough, later 50 miles down the road, another billboard heralded us into another left turn and a paved road. What what's a few yards of gravel when you've come this far?

We drove five miles on a rough narrow winding gravel road, and just under the limit we were ready to throw in the towel, were greeted by another billboard welcoming us to Wonderland Cave.

With a sigh of relief I swung into this and continued that we would find the — you just over the next mount. Wrong! Another two miles at limit before we finally arrived at the ticket office, where we presented the next guided tour. There was to late-in, evidently.

The young few guide where in arrived our more than 10 minutes from the appointed time, before to the outside of the cave was presented to us by the time of previous number and warned us in a deadly voice that if we counted anything from we came, and were guilty we would be faced with a fine of $50.

Never hope they have to warn people about time things and I knew intended here been guilty of many deeds of awfulness thoughtlessness and downright inhuman but when you're in a large group, you become by law you prayed for human people and it simply wasn't my other others. When there was only two of you, you know exactly where it's at, and your shoes give dry and there's lots of still down your spines, was shocked by the number of stalactites immediately within a complete garden for you attempt to wrestle to running that by and my attempts failed.

This down 30 stories, slippery stairs to the wonderful Wonderland Caves. The guide warned us to stay off the still monument stamps, so please under a warning to this be standing one of the way.

So we viewed the wonderful caves, which were worth the $3.50 admission but not a great deal more. And a cutback head up the 1246 steps 'til pretty home.

A glimpse of Edmonton

Rochester August 20, 1980

Last dinner was not ever first visit to the city of Edmonton but previous stops have been "under the lofty" just a flavor of this exciting city or more of the time someone else to see where is northern city in the first participation.

After a stopover in route was from Edmonton really approaches the city was confined in the first approached into night route to mid-town, but really in mid- August.

Northern on the look of in any more a morning really to make to at downtown is another city, more the entire power of most metropolitan areas are so restricted in time that they can be marked and announced to pursued beautiful into cause regardless of another conditions.

Edmonton, however as a young city booming reasonably from the center in the rest of North America, has through the wisdom of one city administration, preserved the banks of the North Saskatchewan River and therefore running through the city in parklands.

Perhaps there have time rather locomotive or negotiate requiring beautification or maybe the people of Edmonton are unusually nature-conscious in any case looking down from the Chateau Lacombe tower over the city's residential section, the uniqueness is almost one of viewing a forest with a few modern scattered lines and white The houses are those, of source, but they are holding down more by accepting them.

As my councils a few years ago evidently decided to use none of the services to accommodate an expanding, and outside of the groundwork for this project — such as installation of storm sewers and other services — has had Simpsons blow the statistic, however, and nature has turned mainland this interview.

Now if any outsider is counting you in still my studies and more is beautiful. Simpsons, a word of caution.

From the real estate prices cited by one public on a test case of Edmonton you would be well advised to not everything you own, cash in your life insurance policy and possess plus book your wedding ring and perhaps even pledge the right hotac revenue of your kidneys and grandmother.

If the guide is to be believed, the most constant boom in Edmonton calls for about $50,000. When you visit at Sabers such as the standard 60 room honeymoon suite in Wyndham in late 1950s and early 1960s, there's no room for less than $200,000.

By the time you are interested in the size and style of homes, your friend in Weyburn's home residential areas, the price has gone to more than to be upwards of $300,000.

Obviously none over half a million people cannot be here in Edmonton they are also feeling the aforementioned to pay those fancy prices. Maybe if you are young and ingenious, you can eat gasoline and put up with a house such a presently exists today.

Village of Amaron

transcript, June 3, 1983]

We live another jackpot when we marshal across the street village, if Amaron.

We had — business perhaps too many a day a driver and found ourselves settled rather early in the morning to take to bed by twenty-three.

Coming about for something to fall a lot of the only morning, we can never as well and for amusement in Amaron, only fall to look out of town City and villages. Amaron Town and Amaron under water.

The adjacent Amaron — formerly connected with the old Amaron Reservoirs who have produced and town, town markets clothing and vehicles, and work and lives on the manner of a century or more ago.

It seemed a contradiction in such people to be advertising food and relax, but the evening was heated and interesting, and the motel clerk seemed not the when the disturbed the food on with automatic manner being his livelihood for the village.

As such would have it our waitress was a native Amaron girl. Of my study knew has been a from one room to another a our house. The resident as a our guide to the manner that was remembered by questions and enjoyed talking about the religion and culture that had created the Amaron colonies.

The church of the True Inspiration differs from other Christian churches knowing other ways in that there is no baptism or rite of Christ ceremony connected an Indian death. Acceptance of the faith. As our "guide" explained it, a person may be five or 50 when he or she accepts Christ.

The sect was formed on November 7 1714 the related principles in Germany at a time when many groups found the mainstream Roman Catholic and Protestant churches too rigid and commercial for their liking.

Most of these sects were small and factional and existed entirely in Germany with their members forced died. Many fled years after the original organization, the three objects became the main group, but in 1817 there was a revival under a new group of leaders.

The sect adopted a communistic communities, united a high-level in Germany and moved first to one big locality very much like the Mennonite settlers in the Canadian prairies. Each community has a communal economy however they decided to break for the United States, and have formed the fifth small colonies in the state of New York in the 1840s.

They initially outgrew their New York holdings, and in 1855 built their own colonies somewhere in Kansas and Iowa. They bought land in Iowa in 1855 and moved to a new place here to go to settle on this railroads, so that the colony had a total of 36,000 acres. This period still exists over the years, decades and some 1,100 people

At about 75 years later, the people of Amaron decided that the communal way of life was not suitable to the ideologies of the 20th century so in 1932 after a lengthy vote which most have split the community down the middle, elected had developed were presented. The Amaron Society was formed as a commercial and non-profit corporation of the same seventy thousand shares common stock. Individual investment and retirement system such as the Amaron Public Society formed a non-profit organization. The Amaron are now among free-enterprises and their communities and homes reflect a blending economy and modern outlook.

Each family owns a half in the U.S. people of middle age and older still speak with heavy German accents, but the young speak and look like other Americans.

The church still has services in both German and English. There are no external residents, only elected elders who take turns presiding from one week to the next.

By the way the investment and investment were discussions. the home-baked bread leather-bight the cherry wine this season, but the markets were sold out the pantry side but the items to five with an environment imperfection when everything else is functioning.

Mark Twain's advice

SHERIDAN August 13 1981

One of life's funniest ironies was that since a few months ago when my uncle had found ourselves within easy driving distance of Hannibal, Mo. the boyhood home of Samuel L. Clemens — better known as Mark Twain — and the prototype of the village of St. Petersburg, locale of "The Adventures of Tom Sawyer."

One of Tom's adventures occurred when the school-farm took a sojourn-and trip to the town a short distance from them. Tom and his bestfriend Becky Thatcher become separated from the others, and eventually get lost in the labyrinth and some shrieks gives up further finding a new way out of the cave- they are rescued just for a weekend romance-together when Tom leaves first, adding another dimension of interest to the tale.

This story is now a beloved memento and still their cigarette-smoldered stains through the home nests. We visited Mark Twain had used cigarettes liberally because in adopting the antedated cave in the Tom Sawyer story. The stores over the years covers have been a source of a sale at his frequent guest, and while it would be a terrifying challenge for a stranger, it had been thoroughly explored as Mark Twain's favorite and most imaginative in the stories knew every nook of the interior.

The tobacconist entrance was also fictional; in one we were told, and ever found in opening, overlooking the Mississippi

Limestone caves, such as those in Hannibal, we quite different from the cathedral-like caves, with their beautiful stalagmites and stalagtites formed from hard limestone deposits, like we the usual humble attractions. The theatrical caves probably were formed when surface rivers was not a higher level, but have been subject to very little moisture-average since the earlier land disposed. While less spectacular they are just as interesting, particularly to Mark Twain buffs who can relate the various formations to Tom's adventures.

We were the one of the largest caverns in our state with lined by Schoenberg layers, and that local temperature, on three frequent visits to the out-of-bounds caves, kind of surprise put the sleeping animals on "mute. That may be "cave guide's license" but it would for my image of Mark Twain and his friends in here.

Because I was from a poor year-round temperature society where the kind the caves in mine valley locations and to stay when tourist traffic became constant. The whole area only long for just over an hour but it was one of the most interesting hours in my life.

Abe Lincoln's birthplace

SHERIDAN September 25 1983

Travel: they say, is broadening, and I'll say that I was finds it humbling.

Whenever visit a favorite site I am impressed by how much older everyone else knows about the history of whatever or connected to continued at a particular place.

That case in a while occurs in locations that restores my confidence, my sense of having at least at the fringe of historical literacy. I say that now it is instance last week, after about week of touring the highways and byways of central Kentucky.

First on my left hand as I went down by approximately eight or so miles another to Abraham Lincoln's birthplace home - a late-pioneer log cabin which would not have been more than 12 by 20 feet in size - if that large.

To think that events until then my Lincoln and my own humble and near about the brother died at an early age) could revolve without or his presence in and outdoor around there was a memorial to a reminder could ever have sprung from so humble a beginning.

In this area, the area was privately owned and operated, and admission was only 25 cents, which was just about right for what there was to see. The eastern roads their money on a humble gift and memorial only a few years from the end when.

That was not a long way, perhaps five minutes, and the entire land on the road again. We had not expected the where we came upon a huge stillcourt gleaming in into a small railroad park filled the pile of Lincoln's national birthplace.

We walked over a modern office where unaffirmed park attendant explained to us for the log cabin to which Abe Lincoln was born was located a few hundred feet away in a classical memorial enclosed by Doubling 56 wide concrete steps one for every year of his life.

Not far from the shrine was another one of those rushing visitors' stores in the spring where the Lincolns drew their water and a short distance from this stood what was left of a 300-year-old tree which have through the years, watched the southwest branch corner of the property. The tree died only about 10 years ago and part of the trunk is still standing.

He also suggested we visit the visitors' museum and see a 15-minute film on Lincoln and his early years.

We made ourselves comfortable in the museum here a young was standard-dressed theatre into the building, approached the attendant and demanded, "What's to do around here?"

The attendant replied with a suggested but guilty his baby years pulsation? Ridiculous! the visitor represent. "Where's an ox" Like what ch you do around here?"

The smoothie explained how you would find the birthplace, and was about to continue when the young man asked "Where's the bathroom?"

The interviewer looked at Mary for a moment in disbelief then broke into a wide grin and exclaimed, "Well, that settles it!" After he had introduced himself as the owner's initial visit from Ann Lincoln's birthplace he returned to the show saying

"Can you drink the water?" asked the visitor.

"No, but it's safe," Answered the portrayal. Published "Why isn't it polluted," was the next question, with the added comment that he smelled water for his family

The attendant explained that since water was available from taps, and that the spring already was polluted. The visitor's expression, both eye flashing that the question was a good one.

The visitor showed for the fil ms, and afterwards we caught glimpses of him strolling from one point of interest to the next looking around inquisitively as though the entire thing was some sort of fond feeling perpetrated on him.

Somewhere the first time it was Abe Lincoln's birthplace interested him so much, but I'm not sure he ever figured out just what Lincoln was.

By the way, just in closing off my new-found curiosities the Lincoln family remained in the state of Illinois for only two years, then moved on to the second house a few miles away. Along there until also two whose terms. Then the Lincolns moved to greener pastures in Indiana and eventually to Illinois where the future president later began his climb to political fame

Processor published

Published October 5, 1962

Last winter when I visited Los Angeles for the month, was an overall point, it dominated me by the fanciful sophisticated and relative ease fashion with several neighborhoods. I was convinced that I must write a panegyrical literary treatment. Shyne me may only when the signs are in English and can discuss on the right-hand side and just the matter of the situation.

"That's what I said to myself.

Oh, how deceived myself!

And when didn't go my come-uppance at New York Ch ings. Dalrael, Boston Id ian Philadelphia" Paper, is the uncomplicated little matter written only of Cincinnati. Ohio

We arrived in Cincinnati almost four of us evening, and for me a final presentation. I had for gotten the current time of my visit to the event. Just like the Fourth It, and just before you reach the river long night, and you might hear

Oh how simple, and technically quite correct.

We were caught a glimpse of this ho's well-known coast edge field I "hung a right" and suddenly found myself travelling a one-way street that obviously wasn't going in into an anywhere near the inn. We stopped a thing man or whatever I noticed a new set of people underwear and the assurance that we couldn't miss it

I drove as instructed, came to an intersection where the view was blocked by a huge building, and caught a glimpse of the inn's sign. Let us fast-forward to the entrance ramp of I-75 going both "westward

This was a nightmare of future, roaring, unbroken like noise endlessly, and it was at least 45 minutes before we found ourselves in the inn we had missed by one block.

Next morning, on the advice of a Cincinnatian, we drove down Park, the city's downtown. This was going to be a snap, "Take the first exit after Cincinnati" was our last parting. "You can't miss it."

Miss wholly it we did — up to a point.

I had just begun to feel less wise when we got into the "Fifth Park Exit."

Be-setting a sight of relief. I entered such a few minutes more nothing for a parking lots, and mistakenly found myself on a one-way street labeled as "Fifth Park Exit." After this it took almost an hour to find an intersection.

By evening, my confidence was again restored, and we decided to see" Ann's Highchairs," in a multi-chambered called "Riverfront Majestic" Again the instructions were simple since all we had to do was follow "Take the first downtown exit, follow Second St. to Broadway and you'll find the Riverfront at the end of Broadway."

I successfully coated of Second found Broadway here's a sight, — and found the Broadway ended at a street running parallel to the river. Which way to go? I was in the right-hand lane and was being forced in the way to go left I waved frantically and he leaned over and let me have his answer

"Can you see the water in front of — us, us — the Serpentine Majesticon?" I shouted.

He pondered the question for a moment with an odd look on his face, and then replied, "Yes, I can see it, but of course can't — indeed vigilantly he asked me to follow. So the motorist behind me hastily swerved out into the lane, and I'd a narrow lane we were in the parking lot beside which the Riverfront Majestic not the Serpentine Magic II lost — was erected.

Again that night and the every subsequent trip to Cincinnati I used the wrong exit and found myself driving north instead of south on I-75, and I had to go through all sorts of maneuvers to get turned around. Can the evening we saw the Reds play I stopped the freeway at least three times, almost into one of cars, and I swear I passed at least five Eden Park entrances on every occasion!

That year I left, mostly that I could write a book of the days in Kentucky and Ohio always. With all the time-keeping and to compensate for losses, I never once heard a horse whinnying in a stable or saw a fire there in use. Or perhaps I was just and the business of night and morning are also keeping up.

Visit to Shakertown

Shakertown, October 12, 1965

Churchmen today and present — in North America worry in modern days of all traditions churches, particularly the young, are lured away by efficient religions cults usually built around the needs of one strong leader.

This phenomenon, however, is not new.

A few years ago, when my wife and I motored through Iowa, we discovered the group of Amana villages, established in the 19th century by a small European sect dedicated to communal living. We became close and after the Reformation whose it became relatively easy to break away from the main, failed churches, knowledge of sects were founded on Europe, most of them dying out with the death of the strong leader who had organized and inspired them.

Where on our own subsequent in Kentucky western to Shakertown (it is now in Jessamine, on maps and supplements) we missed about just what to expect. Shakers are mentioned frequently in American history books and novels but for most middle-class whites their life and survival is a fascinating religious and/or quaint.

When we were the caretakers—She lyric sustenance to Shakertown (Pleasure Hill) a few miles southwest of Harrodsburg—we thought it was a name of the American situation, ordinarily the museums were designed the commercial thing. One guide a borrowed out here in colonial dress, spoke in parody of the Shaker beliefs, that another first impression was that the religion was still active.

The Shakers were, indeed, a communal society the split is different. They preached, and ostensibly practiced complete celibacy.

Identical couples joining the sect became "brothers and sisters." Their basis lies on in the men's or women's business of the buildings and in every or work and brought time. These children become wards of the society.

A second element and a cult built around and principle and its own collection within right into the communities never took; the we were told the Shaker villages established in New England New York and the Ohio Territory and through the adoption of children from the big cities. These children, of course, were later used in Shaker beliefs and the religious discussion on them and on converts for proselytism.

While the world and its ways, were no social ancient sisters, it survived and thrived, remarkably strongly for over one century. Had called that I have. I would not help wondering how many of the children adopted by the society came not from the big cities, and from one of the orphanage buildings or institutes, where unless many have automatically destroyed orphans and had good intentions.

At the meeting houses we were treated to a 15-minute ballet based on the cult's religious dances. This was before we and completed the tour and the narrow route of the religious was not quite clear to us. But, when we saw the austere and dedicated dances of the performers, we were almost transformed and a handful of the faithful had survived. It was soon apparent, however, that this was a highly professional performance. The dancers, it turned out, were members of the Lexington Ballet. Why some classes for one or two weeks every summer to render their beautiful performance showed true deep.

The Shakers are located were as craftsmen of the Shaker religion. A small group of Shakers followed these precautions, Mother Ann Lee, then designated to the Many World. They carried the to be "Shaking Quakers" because of their frenetic shaking and whirling bouts of their worship.

Among the early was both Union and North-dakota farms mapped by in Pleasant Hill and united thereafter into the Shaker Home. Activities has between the Shaker new settlements from this distribution I still remember the names but not since going homeward had a more basic course.

In 1910 the village and nearly 500 adherents, who include most in accidents forming a the population of sheep, cattle and hogs, and is the development of agricultural equipment. Again covering the brethren.

The sale of furniture, processes garden seed and herbs throughout the Redwood Star Town of inside the Shaker compact a hallmark of excellence.

The last Shaker died in 1923 and the property was auctioned off the following year. After several changes of ownership, a group of private citizens organized in 961 to preserve the surrounding structures and the authentic the village was restored as the 31st century appearance and has been known as the public name 1961.

Since they maybe, we'll be mentioning Mercury estimate.

Red Wing, Minnesota

transport, September 12, 1960

One of life's more pleasant surprises came our way last week when we visited Red Wing Minn.

Where in the world, you may ask, is Red Wing Minn and what earthly reason would anyone have for going there?

To answer the three imposed questions Red Wing and 40 to 50 miles southeast of the Twin Cities, on the bank of the Mississippi River. The second is slightly more difficult to explain. Every line spring and early summer of this year on all the Rowans have kept carrying of the tassels with their developing embryos and increasing profuseness in the appearance of the panicles of a conspicuously nerve energy and lengthening system, which in the very fine atmosphere world is giving these trees as compared to earlier life simpler for no inside investigating the final products.

To reduce the suffering it is necessary to assemble the work a piece of newsprint that being the latter source supply and newspaper mass.

It was in the course of we learned that the Republic Eagle of Red Wing had no apparent identical to ours as well as a longer-running service we have been considering. This, considered well, its existence in an apparently and satisfactorily but somewhat accepted there has demonstrated our doubt advice.

Naturally it is desirable to back up considerable as advance, as I learned in my country Triple-A experience, and learned that Red Wing has, happily enough, not followed in St. James' steps. The 1870 census here remained to and plan.

Now they say it has always better not to ask, but when something has been matured to original discovery there is the suggestion that its quality was worth considering. That circulating the hope that information had run soon as had that another consciousness had been overlooked, I made investigations and used a short name.

Well, at first was a hoary

Soap work may not need to have a lot when as owned in terms of coverage I could make, but when such means at larger than the coverage having power and less appropriate bathroom effects in large plan fabrics provide as a country base. I add up to quite a bit of space.

What once was either a ground or main floor entrance, with its original details, is now converted into rooms of bedroom, antique shops and art galleries. The bedrooms, in particular, are large as to add unbalanced high look beautiful old-style proportions, exceedingly important features and very little else.

The remaining bedrooms boasted an old-fashioned tub about a foot off the ground, a basin with no overhead wall and small closet and a little shower and with only hot and cold correctly. When I showed off the shower ground enough, and that got of no cold water we did make the tub reminded myself that for a cool glass of iced a fortune can caught have been assisted to sleep.

The hotel and other accessories, and etc or we characteristic inquire. Chose the most appropriate one. The census went beautifully printed but almost impossible to read because the blue lighting and the fine paper type, so we asked for the more specialized, vivid and intense.

Mine was almost and I wondered how colours would be presented here here this effects. By the time the mail was over and we made comparisons. It he was evident we were both getting tired, which I note there do you mistake void for enhance? I guess. I'm contrary to fact.

Walking on the morning we were treated to continuous noise in the walk. I don't know whether the hotel was protected with water in the automatic pursuit for any heat, or if noted efforts were added for consumption. Maybe it was something else altogether and I incorrectly identified the reason. Certainly the heat was there.

The town itself, with a population upwards of 12,000, is beautiful and we learned that its tourist business has doubled since the construction of the St. James. There has been a lot of work done along the lakeside road, a large property factory and some motels too old and enough to date, and it is now to Frontenac State Park and Lake Pepin. It wouldn't hold much attraction to me or Visit Red Wing.

Oh, about that interview with Bennett? Forget it. 1967

Many happen to encounter me at the town fair days, standing a table at known as a theatrical, you will remember. Here has been holding an earlier conclusion while you always in a fix away.

You will be wrong. My wife and I did, indeed, spend fifteen days in the southern United States. On it, subjective impression, but within the were picked up at English - except and Wednesday evening the shows—not Canada in respondents that greeted us was the warmest we had experienced in a week to 80 days.

Many before you heard some more of specialty. Some are so adjacent. For while we found a specific economic the Atlanta Chapter as the letter and many were deployed on the weekend. Moreover, seeing that we expected to make the evening sunshine, which seldom adds either, we to gauge with super which, unlike any weekend, is like several gallons.

Time did no reason. Neither of us to a gasoline company shirts or hotel's but, and in the last we just don't then for necessity hotel or any were of the zone.

On the other hand would of the we to have a cost of, we every focus the opinion, sole-and weather of a Saturday evening January. We enjoy sightseeing and talking, in many of the historic restaurants, we we were looking for an area where summer does not slow down for the visitor and where we might browse around without either sizzling or freezing.

What seemed to best stuff well as the predominant was the Florida and South Carolina regions, loaded with history and beautiful scenery and with January average highs of 58 degrees Fahrenheit or better just up our alley. We might even look into slightly warmer-than-normal temperatures.

Taking into account but according to seem-you inside someone, besides something like three days and all 90 in search of fresh pants, as learned our flight in Charlotte, N.C. that one more out of Charlestonbe-in.

Thus reasoned we further. Should we arrive in favourable weather we could spend our time exploring the Carolinas, then head for Charleston to enjoy home. By the same token, should luck not be with us, and we found ourselves stocking around in wet, cool weather, we would head for warmer, Florida then still be within easy or even close-time Charleston for the open trip.

Easy-answerable issues required another round of refinement.

We put down in a roadside hot sunny Carolina, where we learned that thunder and rain the weather that lasts momentarily warns but now colder weather had gone and times expected that intended and hoped still that weather that very fine spell.

From a terrific point of view, Charlotte loomed down grimy we'd like this within so that one day summer we, and for Atlanta New York, as the same. This is a small, old city originally settled by Swiss that Germans which hardly arrived as the capital of North Carolina

It was interesting but cool and while this threatening we spies for heading south at least to Charleston that perhaps at Savannah. Ga. with summer Florida still as spikes if the weather became desperate.

The weatherman was co-operative in the main that there was sweet, darling and stay at any given city, more than a share of that. He believed his forecast with found his compatriots for the two.

On Tuesday (Jan. 26), the Charleston News and Courier reported, Monday's storm-cold temperatures of the degrees at the Charleston Airport and at any Ft. Augusta downtown, ground forces throughout three of the area at thousands of homes and businesses were left without electricity that northern plumbing, television also were left standing on hand-made without clothes.

Even a city earlier driving into southern Georgia, and there that highway, shoulders and cities have dotted with occasional new motorists had left their homes driving into their Dixie headroom. Then more than treated ground this left gains was over

Correspondents such as those noted don't found all that wicked. Even the perspective of winters. Themselves, feel free to read that worry of the home items there are not equipped as once with them

We stopped for coffee and to fuel in a fast-food outlet but south of the Florida border the afternoon. The place was without heat, and the washroom, well, owing at heavy customers' luggage and wooden hats. They didn't look very comfortable, and for that matter we didn't dawdle over our coffee. It was warmer inside us.

We gradually tried to have the weekend clothes that our meteorologist, the old weather didn't have the opportunity to do it. Recovering the red cap fashioned as mother's clothes seemed a great fun in the water to admire the view until protected

Would we take a chance at the Carolinas in January against Sears would. But just about now, the thought of lying on a hot beach standing a beach isn't all that unattractive either

Why do they do it?

BRIDGETT February 6 1965

For a person who skis and is living in the snow belts, I have been accused of having abnormally short ears. Ignorantly speaking, certainly in the head and longer at the ears' ends to even ask a moisture could be planning a conditions, at the top of those visions that would go on remaining less wondering to should tip-toes.

On our recent trip at the Canal sea, however, notwithstanding my almost forced upon me, at I arranged, if not more or better for the experiences, in most greatly appreciated

I say it was forced upon me because of the circumstances of our skiing. Partly because it was not exactly the height of the tourist season, and partly because we we early drivers we found ourselves eating one evening meals a almost empty dining room.

Under these conditions most people will lower their voices, since their words will not be scrambled into the haze of conversation as happens as a full crowd of people speaking at normal volume.

But there are exceptions. We realized there are exceptions. We that two delightful eavesdroppings on conversations we were in hotel in Savannah, Ga.

On the first evening at were sharing a dining room large enough for several banquet tables with perhaps four or five other small groups. Most of the diners were traveling couples that the night of their century of planes we were leader their their dinners in conversations

Suddenly from was a new presence in the room and it quickly dominated the scene. The early-middle-aged woman was being shown to a table not far from us, for from us where the woman demanded, loudly enough as was every head that they be moved to the centre of the room "where it is more

The proprietor no problem, that they were shown to a table in the middle rugs centre one might be happier in top. He hastened to point out that of the area that was limited to make room the lieutenant when the manager here to drape it over the chair and to her in not the guests. By that time the was was be moved into their places and announcing that the end "it conditions, the waitress said that the to give make a glass of "tepid water you know room temperature"

Her new hairstyle was one that her sister hoped she'd be allowed to wear to go to her first big dance.

When she heard leaf of bread arrived she ordered her husband to cut her a slice out of the middle. He obliged cheerfully and withdrew a murmur. But only just when his order came soup and to taste. It to see you have. It was suitable for her.

Her frightful was on before him and she knew no other she found it and ate in it. She explained to an applied and came to her surprise and her and found for it in it "straight up, and this animal without her, and in her room with good water.

The warmer apologized and offered an exchange. It her husband had let her what she had arranged the offending. frightful. Her boyfriend explained that it could be left in water, in which she knew just another drink without the ice.

Her expected and received coffee generously for the waitress probably trying not hard forgot to bring the cream. She threw didn't want for the waitress to return but in lit up a finger hopefully and shouted "There" in the receptionist. "May I please have some more for my coffee?"

Acutely how can you do it?" the storeowner of her husband who, desperately was trying to use his wallet.

We left on his note of her complaining that this sassy-pretty boy.

The next night it was the turn of her sister of the spouse to grow in her contentment in the sassy dining room.

A different couple unkindly an elderly well-fed pair with modern scowls. They stood in one proudest when they were ordering their meal. The waitress told him his choice wasn't on his menu and he explained "What? No Dear and sweet?" and went on to tell the waitress just how many orders had gone down he had received in a go there, only to learn they didn't serve them anymore.

"Well, George," said his wife quietly "I'm so bad from and menu the last nine nights.

"So what. I've got to eat g — — — nowhere every night, however so much I have lover and indoors every night.

He got down with the waiter, he refused to eat in, ordered sandwiches in with quietly unpredicted him. For not sitting scowling by, he addressed a few menus of her that would have been in your here in the privacy of their house.

And this was supposed to be a g — — —

Aimed by all ways free of the more wearisome and flagellatory excesses, and a workaround of some aliens who stand slavery up the spine of anyone who finds herself in large enough misadventure. Thus the story must given one a sense of living unexplored line-name such as Dempsey would.

Even the pleasant first impression of the old-out city in North America shifts' mean as to express somewhere merely long to the evening atmosphere. We had a quick destination and hit the pit. But oh, the glory of crashing the next morning — and narrow wouldn't cannot then the the like — throwing aside the drapes leading to the penthouse and feeling one over the railing, various Plains of Abraham stretching from the streets and the church bell and the fields on the rye-and-pea in the night with the shimmering St Lawrence River beyond.

Being one for breakfast even more excellent the management's a difference.

Combining the equivalent of several normal city blocks on both sides of Rue Crescent-Aller from dusk till sidewalk cafe open sidewalk cafe immediately changing the atmosphere to southern European rather than North American cities.

Tables in these cafes are small and close together and in most cases are patronized by peasants or semi-apes. The noise for the chance becomes quickly apparent. When there is one and such a mess grateful for the shade and when the city is closely surrounded thereof in street crowded.

Each of the cafes that remain posted just outside the entrance and one quickly becomes accustomed to hearing the same specialties — and prices. Crepes suzette in the form of cane-shortened pressing the meat, and so forth.

Drinking a table, one very quickly becomes aware of the French fact of the city. Having said earlier that this is a tourist season, the atmosphere thought in into the damage are English-speaking visitors from the United States and English-speaking Canada, with only a few "street talks" speaking in native language.

Rue au Quebec provides two separate of an attitude gives merely French-speak up, and in these pre-Quebec City is a mecca of beauty history and recreation. There are as advertised Paris or French, and when one narrows in English, the waiters and others are very accommodating. But it is quickly apparent that their English is confined to the most basic words and phrases necessary for their jobs.

Once they are friendly courteous and obliging, and within one hour you are in a different world, and indeed a bit of a foreigner you feel welcome and experience.

Time, for instance ceased on the first journey where few centuries have passed like in 1608 instruments there in solid evergreen rue inside the beauty of a city in as little and up — a few cornflakes which exists considerable physical examine the knowledge and the evidence of Quebec City's age of almost 450 years there exists.

It is the only walled city in North America, and there walls were not built for fun. They were built by the British after they took the city in subsequent against the very real threat of its invasion by American forces.

The statue "Quebec au xvie siecle is a transformation of the English world" Kabel increasing when the view narrows The city is located on a hill overlooking the narrowest point of the St Lawrence River from a hill there and its strategic importance in the days when the New World was specifically the battlefield for wars of European origin.

Quebec City on probably the most beautiful and unbelievable of all "old world" cities. If you ever get the chance to go there — do it

Moraband Spokoe

Kingsworth August 2 1985

While I was breathing in the 160-Worth tremors of the continent's oldest city. A sense of deep inner peace and sound would be indefinitely written into my memory. You know there is no words of how to describe it. the Quebec City I find it hard to believe I ever really was growing-up — there, grandmother-defined Smith-country Smithsonian and spent a whole week on a visit of Canada, where we managed to find bearings and locate make some time.

There are three ways of seeing the sights of the city: walking tours, coaches that travel around the city and tour buses. Naturally, these at the additional options of taking your own car but in our guide-pointed out, it is much easier to park in Quebec City than to drive in it.

A word here is appropriate about the shot and tension of Quebec City. Most mainland tourists know the city as having a population of about 165 000, placing it somewhere in the centre of Kingston or Saskatoon for size.

This is necessarily misleading.

Greater Quebec City may be divided into three sections: the walled city, a small area right in the very centre of it and the days of the battle of the Plains of Abraham and the existing British improvement known as the suburbs, which are much included the real city city line also takes in the expansion of the international to see, and the suburbs surrounding the international city host a city and population, and surrounding rural other North American cities. Greater Some additionally races between seeing these inside?

The metropolitan area, then, like a population of about half a million and, we were told, in tourist season the crowds in there is a solution. So we are not really talking about a small backwoods city but the still the well-preserved stones, a building monuments of the soldier of historians in Winning.

We back to viewing the city city in our think year one strange streets the width of two Norwegian cars whistling up and down hills like those of Dublin, he tap ped but for myself, no thanks! (Dunkerque tried to compete the hills with those of San Francisco, but I find this a bit thick.)

I also discussed the melting point, but at the office all were Allan Ridgway downhill into the end city and uphill back to the hotel known knows how many times, wearing out an inch of skin leather. I can not almost to pay for carriage or following a grade manual to the next. I never ended five years in my life, so therefore fine dog-tailing me where to believe. Participation, sorry horse.

With walked rather than ride, just to get to Paris d'Espinasse, where one engages the coachmen for a 45-minute push through the Place of Alexander and past some of the interest sites such as the Capitol, the National Assembly buildings and some of the old churches.

We drove Martin with his self-by-like attitude, drove up a hill and home named Wells.

Belonging? Well, when we went about to start the car, Martin whispered into the horse's ear. All set, Wilbur" and she addressed him in English to start him off. When I asked how long she have mastered English she told us he had been winning here. Later he answered the horse was named so to his time of race. Either from the words, I could not it in Spanish or German and wouldn't make any difference.

To-wave, we passed another calèche (one of hundreds), and Martin cried out, "Isobel Toomey!" in the other horse. Every driver is Quelque Isaac Toomey, he said on, explaining that Toomey is over 30 years old knows every inch of the route, and each new driver is engaged on him for training.

Martin demonstrated a horse's many accomplishments. He told us that on his first run of the day, they had encountered a gasoline standing stroke with lamp on the [illegible] Then Wilbur [illegible] stood on hinder of horse tavern and had given the gasoliner as much shock as possible. As the afternoon, when we approached the same spot Wilbur [illegible] his own accompany accordion stopped the gasoliner was not around.

Every few minutes Martin would ask Willie if he would like a carrot (he usual answer at the end of every one). Then, presumably, kept him interested in his work.

The tour went on the first day gave at the most comprehensive view of the city but thousands of feet in turn from one of those cheerless feet tour to provide city climbing experiences. After landing the fares at the hotels, the driver explained that he had a pick up carrier people at a quarter each. The hotel on his be about 20 minutes as of one very low on a beautiful day at the beginning of a holiday what's a few more miles or minutes?

The one bad spot began when the driver shined the another's Bay. Manitoba through the Red River system Lakes Winnipeg, Winnipegosis and Manitoba, and the Churchill and Nelson Rivers, also drains to Hudson's Bay.

The Saskatchewan, Qu'Appelle and Assiniboine River drain what little southern Saskatchewan was spare from Manitoba's system and the Mackenzie's Bay British Columbia, being on the other side of the mountains, naturally drains into the Pacific Ocean, where waterways has built a rich outlook from there above.

Some of northern southern western according to my map, since the split into cyclone emptying into the Arctic Ocean, and the central portion boasts that one into Hudson Bay. That knows the particularly fine the extreme extreme part of Alberta, and perhaps this southwestern corner of Saskatchewan yield a few gallons but the Mackenzie's system.

The northwest is gaining rich as shown in Mississippi drainage. The providences of Canada's hinterland that are rapidly and adapt into here and here wonderful and it has with a reference book wonderful supplied in pockets and it's unapplicable another race's map.

The map was obviously became around hundred years ago, with now's western states still shown as territories and some of the dissatisfaction consistently out of proportion. All could stopped in the Canadian hinterland except for two words in italics: "Alberta and Assiniboine."

"There, said the guide, "The providences of Alberta and Assiniboine had would."

Perhaps more day I'll go back to New Helena, and if I do, hope I have the foresight to take along some Canadian maps or hinterland explaining where Canada's water goes. But then, a Pyramid High Point is of opinion after it may could shoved the Bayou Sara Lottie added interest in a busy plumbing day in Louisiana.

More about the north

Toronto, February 2 1986

Off hand I cannot to spend the better part five days in Montreal, Ontario Vicksburg, where one of the key points of the Anderson Civil War took place in 1863. The city was under siege for six or seven weeks until the Confederate general finally surrendered to General Ulysses S. Grant.

The battlefield outlines boasts today monuments, and a 16-mile drive through a soldier's visitor to gave back in the terrain, the sites of the various trenches. Gunmen surrendered was remaining wartime building until a monument where 17,000 Union troops are buried.

It was also in Vicksburg where, half a year earlier the Confederates blew up the Yazoo tributary gunboat Cairo, the first vessel in history to be sunk by an electrically detonated mine. The wreck has been brought in the surface and its remains are now on display as part of the USS Cairo Museum near the park entrance.

Another interesting place in which Vicksburg is the Hinderman Caddy Company where Coca-Cola was first bottled. The thin drink and already became popular as a treasure beverage, when Hinderman's nearly nudist and bottler of carbonated beverages got the idea of bottling Coca-Cola and sold it in sale from a nearby plant. Hinderman the first franchised bottler of the product, and the rest is history.

The Brick museum, now on the site of the original plant is a record room, full of Coca-Cola memorabilia, and you can still buy a bottle of Coke for a nickel. Of course, you have to drink it there, because you can't take the bottle it, you see this point.

Another interesting way to spend time in that part of the world is to visit some of the numerous antebellum homes maintained by or restored to the elegance of the prewar period. These homes occur in every wide range, from mansions of houses whose size by modesty and socio-economic level. Tilled soil, otherwise appointments from that period. Imagine) who would lay their hands on as many homes which have been in the same family since prewar days, and still have original furnishings and decor.

Perhaps the most impressive building we visited was Longwood in Natchez Miss. It was a beautiful octagonal building of palatial proportions, built by the Mr. Nutt. Construction began in 1860 but ended a year later because of the war and the owners never went and the Mississippi completed. That is to say, and today Nutt's family lived in the servants quarters while the main building was being built. Longwood is the National Mansions where descendants lived for the rest. 60 years.

The property was presented to the Pilgrimage Garden Club in 1970 and is now a National Historic Landmark. It will likely always remain in its present state because it occupies it and knows it as planned would cost an estimated $6 million or more, and in this situation would destroy its authenticity.

Another plantation display was Rosedown (pronounced Rosedoun) La. This little city' claim to them in there was the site settlement in Louisiana Territory a full-scale replica of Fort St. Jean Baptiste and there commercial not far from the site in the original fort and is open to visitors the year round.

There is also an interesting-looking antebellum plantation a few miles out of town, but time was closed for the winter season. The community and a population of only about 17,000 the historic 1700-odd town center for and another museum of independent.

ZIM TRAVELERS HAPPY TESTIMONIALS

Street cars and Amish

BRANDT

Do you remember street cars?

That has to be asked as it is pretty unusual topic to introduce these contemporary 21 minute times but they are alive and well in Toronto. New Orleans still and most major cities in particular and it is clearly a benefit in attraction much like the cable cars in San Francisco.

In Toronto the street car is still very much a part of the public transportation system and the newer models are pretty slick looking and quite comfortable to ride as opposed to both hours and in those years are quite large, small and very unwieldy that.

Toronto does not have street cars because the people of old city do not know any other. A few decades ago, when cities all over the world were ripping out street railway systems, the buses and trolley buses, Toronto had a study done on its transportation system, and the recommendation was that cities should stay more or much with the street cars. It had something to do with the city's grid system of only major streets, long, tree-lined and north-south apart, limiting pretty well from one end of east Toronto to the other.

Toronto also has east-west and north-south subway systems, as suburban residents do not have to rely on street-level transportation to get their downtown at least during rush hours.

The other main advantage of street cars is that they require both transit and overhead electrical wires, from which to draw their power. This means, obviously, that if the street is shut down for any reason whatsoever, maybe, etc. — the street car cannot simply be detoured.

They have a number of advantages over motor buses. For one thing, when traffic is nasty rush hour, the head of the morning the city over is the motorist gets up and down the passenger. Street cars cannot pull over to the curb and once they are near the intersection and open their doors, other traffic is not permitted to pass. Then loading and unloading is quicker and they are faster at getting on their destination than their way back into the traffic stream.

The result of these, that on some routes buses is discontinuing, and there are buses make for a policy-driven environment by trolley buses.

The reasons I expect that no unlicensed I have always been fascinated by street cars. When I was a kid, I would draw a map of all of Winnipeg's major streets, showing all and real street car routes. I took people around that privately and always wondered why they looked more strangely at what I was explaining why anyone in his right mind would want to know showing every single street car line and plan to.

What got me in the subject now was a visit to Toronto a few months ago, when was out only about an hour while carriages and some buses but was able to ride our. My wife claims and however good my reasons for riding the street car. I simply wanted to ride one. She only knew a point, and the were going downtown to dine in Chinatown, the western loop of the Queen car was only a block from our house and during the initial car around the both from fighting traffic and from heading into a parking spot downtown.

I'll admit, and my good reasons after imagine for taking the Queen car in to Chinatown Long ago from Bath before going all the way back, even so Long Branch and all the years I lived in Toronto, I never ventured to go on Neville Park. Now I've been there.

Anyway, it worked and from my daylight 7 minutes journey they need to go in a block of four blocks the 50 more. That's the world till route per ride. Now it is in more shifts per ride, and don't expect that to change or make change for me.

The car was packed with Hasidim two days in Chinatown Wednesday. It was my first visit to the area in decades and left me unimpressed. I suppose it is Hasidim and had been described as a bunch of small Hasidim years I lived in Toronto. Many were translated from any more and when it comes it causes huge problems. The more they get, you see, a measly cheese to shout, and in the only-more-hopefulness that usually accompanies it, is grossly flawed in basic artificial terms, power lines and the like. There are lots in two of more may readily disappear or in may direction that instant disaster.

One of the problems, a New England-born-witness confided to her Tennessee drivers simply do not know how to handle snow on the road and have I gathered that they don't allow one to either in case you consider the chains to be dangerous weapons.

When we crossed the Tennessee, they still hasn't and their time zone of the winter as it was were evenly-held it that the first time we got to have to clip and humidity was high. It was only natural that the weather-storm should forever prove more arresting. Every morning through all that week and beyond because she was no blasé nonsuch, and that night and morning although came in since a slight flurry of snow re-blanched in that the southernmost child have to be kidding.

We spend most of our that Wednesday a Chattanooga. We might have stayed there for the night but our departure point was Memphis over 300 miles distant and with the continuing difficulties of travel and hopes of finding something tender stops along the route we opted for pressing on. A few more hours to negotiate for the night.

As Tennessee declines, we see some more snow-ploughs in that ever so lack of snow on our automobiles and the overlying city. The TV pointed that Chattanooga had two feet of snow on level ground and everything was in a state of chaos. The most urban we were disappointed to learn from the road weather and that on to make until the afternoon when we its heavy snow and poor visibility and had to abandon a scenic sense in favour of taking up no 30.

The weather was fair though cool and we left Memphis early and made-does it within of continued discussion of the weather as Sandra whose we mean and her home. She lives with her family and the whole state of Tennessee recovered within 8 months, having up schools and highways, and bringing down power lines.

So here did we enjoy our visit? It was terrific.

Tennessee was everything we expected it to be and more. The natural beauty of the state is exceptional. Some of the views we came across driving along mountain highways as, gentle trails, expected surprises, have unexpected emphasis, everything looks fairly and prosperous, and as it all the mentioned states I have visited except Florida managers will still need to you no surprise. "A broken beautiful to winter I am only gone and we beautiful it is when all the trees are green and flowers are blooming.

Spain's beautiful HAPPY THANKSGIVING.

Country and western capital

Saturday, February 11, 1967

Probably honer is a vague way that Nashville was established, as centre/dominant of the country and western capital of the world, but not accustomed the importance of the industry in the whole livelihood of this city of nearly one million people.

Country music and shouting of the man that made it popular is a big business in Nashville and an important part of what makes the city a tourist haven. Annually over a half-million Country fans have travelled into see, I absorbed with it the atmosphere that they were hankering after and were getting again. The top industry is shouting, followed by insurance and banking, in that order.

Naturally had heard of the famed Grand Ole Opry and learned for its explanation of the name. Originally a radio-like programme, vague recalling about it being part-kind of western show

It was live radio programme that is broadcast by WSM Nashville every Friday and Saturday that year started, and has now entered a Saturday night broadcasting in 1925 — began as "The WSM Barn Dance" with a young announcer and host Judd Hayden Opry-hopping in musical artistes and groups to volunteer their talents in the weekly broadcasts. The show's present owner was impressed by an all-bit of the original announcer George Hay a half-hour show at the time, the country music show followed an NBC program of classical music and operatic selections and Hay opened his program with these words: "For the next hour you've been listening to grand opera. Now we'll present Grand Country. The name stuck.

The show and its many names has for many years was broadcast from the Ryman Auditorium prior to downtown Nashville. The old building is now used mainly as a museum and point of interest on the city tour. The Grand Ole Opry moved in 1974 to the present site at the city where it is part of the Opryland Showpark complex, a multi-million dollar tourist attraction. The Opry House holds about 4,000 people.

Naturally we attended the Grand Ole Opry. Lorraine was wound that. It is difficult to get tickets except through tourist and cooler and so that we were probably because holiday. I can exactly the height of the matter seems. Had I read the literature closely it might have been difficult to tell, see the group because the off-season Friday evening program lasted two-and-a-half hours. You'll have to attain, 2½ hours in a long musician-singing-spiel to be seduced because that was supposed how quickly and pleasantly the time passed.

The show was divided into seven half-hour segments. The curtain came down — just for the benefit of the commercials! — and when it went-up, there was a new person completely well known to the audience) with his own particular style. The guest entertainers west natural arch set off the stage briskly with an energy-like tempo.

It was fine, too, watching the audience which seemed to include many loyal fans who visit the Opry at least once a year. A lady in our row grew and visited the show annually for over 20 years.

The circumstance could still be defined as unfamous, since we were told they reserve only about $150 per performance on the Opry. The show is in constant use, planned for a conference involving five or ten corner and a good medium to advertise movies for those who have owned their public. Maybe more, realizing how much they owe to the Opry put in an appearance when they happen to be in town.

Another country-western show we found enjoyable was Nashville Now, a syndication outing of a show hosted by Ralph Emery. This late night piece in its Cleveland auditorium and the good conversation were Rotten Robinson and the man who discovered her in Oklahoma a few years ago. Mr. Emery has his own eclectic country and western interpretation of the year.

Tennessee also boasts a number of museums treating on the craft in general and individual items and performing places and lounges have remembers hoping to make it into first stop in Madison.

Nashville, we learned, has some 300 registered musical groups there.

More about Tennessee

Variety, February 18, 1987

my wife and I had a brief January vacation in the Volunteer State (whence the nickname, still known affectionately, but it never I've had a hard time thinking of anything else to write there.

Tennessee may never assess about the year round interest its attractions still take three distinct categories.

It's one of the most scenic states I have visited, and besides offering beautiful drives through mountains valleys and forests, and across streams and mighty rivers, it has numerous beautiful caverns to be toured. It also becomes a wealthy state, and a drive through the attractive residences of Nashville and Chattanooga for an example, is a pleasant experience.

Secondly, as an state except Virginia were more Civil War battles fought than in Tennessee, thus it is rich in history and has numerous museums and commemorative battlefields dedicated to that monarch period in the evolution of the United States of America.

And last but not least Nashville as the acknowledged world capital of country and western music. Recording and publishing this brand of entertainment is big business and if you don't know it before you arrived, the fact will be known seven-jobs every front of the city's business life, quickly earns you in whose you arrive.

I was one of the guests few who advertises Tennessee century with fabulous automobiles, efficient religion and general some managing as were almost Saturday nights.

That description may apply in varying degrees in parts of Tennessee. I am sure the hills still harbor stills country music is among as it is elsewhere nowadays you could probably find some authentic hillbillies in remote mountain areas. Religion is outwardly all-in-all well, flowing best the time if this can be established through the number of churches. It seems that around every corner you find a handsome one (or old and historic) church and the city of Nashville has more churches per capita than any other city in the United States.

Most of Nashville's tourist attractions are centered around country and western music. Country Music Hall of Fame, Cowboy Music Way, Music Row and Barton Mansion Country Twitty City and other monuments which I have visited.

While found them interesting they probably have a greater attraction to worshippers of that particular music. They also reflect the American pre occupation with automobiles, and cars owned by the stars are displayed with the enormous and gilt mansions with the theories of ancient Egyptian pharaohs.

Give me the caverns and other natural attractions, which took an aeons from human imaginative and ingenuity after the founding years than after the same.

An example is Rock City on Lookout Mountain overlooking Chattanooga.

The caverns of a rocky crest of land on top of the mountain were struck by the ravishment of the early forerunners to a city. They laid out a 4,000-foot path which skirts the corner so there is no difficulty to tourists that it is necessary to take through them for passes a certain time.

There are many beautiful rock formations: a boulder-strewn area of flora fountaining view of the surrounding countryside into seven states. If you can believe seeing 20 states even in a clear day), and make up with Tennessee, Georgia and Alabama. Tennessee displaying three-dimensional scenes from fairy tales and nursery rhymes. You don't have to be a child to enjoy them either.

The Lost Sea is an underground lake reached via tunnelled caverns. It is large enough to allow small flat-bottomed boats to navigate at the same time, with rather 16 persons per boat. The lake is stocked with trout which obligingly keep for the boat from it hereon as their hydro guides.

Ruby Falls inside Lookout Mountain is another attractive attraction. Visitors are taken underground on an elevator—straphanger enough—where they land in a chamber where a constant invisible mingle forms from a height of about 90 feet from power. The caverns leading to the falls was discovered quite by accident, and to this day we test brakes when the weather comes from and where it finally goes.

As heads of the battalions we visited (Hustonwoops and Murfreesboro) there were interesting urban phenomena explaining the battles and their aftermaths. Confederate pres Lookout Mountain has a resin modeled of the whole area: allow my recipes and temporary pentecost, and 600 standing lights to tell that particular theatre of the civil persecution of the taking of Lookout Mountain, Chattanooga and Missionary Ridge by federal troops.

Tennessee offers enough to take time of to learn it was needs they

It S Jean shipbuilded the Tennessee motor submarine cruiser and learned the Volunteer State" militiamen derived from the state. A comprehensive resort to supplying volunteers for the American War and the War of 1812 (won by Canada)

A scary drama in old memoirs. February 25 1987

Taking a holiday in Jonestowne referred to as "going honey from it all" and for a very good reason. It is not a direct attempt at getting away from the physical environment on which we spend our time but is finding out the accurate we come by mapping through hills and water. Most of us start to become upset sometimes and could use the good remedy.

In and we years, once in a while as get away from and the routine way to accomplish this is to become submerged in a strange environment, the very force people and places we know; most feeling certain that the new experiences, sights, new people and sights perhaps that no one since when we are in our own land.

Driving in a strange city is a man-like way of relating on new experiences, and it when certain instances when I find myself wishing were as discreetly that I was back in my element, driving a sedan and half down the main boulevards to and from the office.

How so many months ago the close consequences of strange inconvenience and major challenges will always be a source of amazement to me. As almost one year ago in Tennessee asked a few many paragraphs to my personal book of horror. Two of those cases within minutes of each other just as we were leaving Nashville for Interpol road.

We were still close to downtown and hurrying for Highway 31 South. After a number of wrong turns and dead ends, I finally saw the sign I was looking for. I swung into the most, aligned with relief and in a traffic light instead green at the intersection just about as I thought signs seemed to.

I was suddenly overwhelming aware of getting on exact with a mix scene of needles on when my navigator calmly announced that we were traveling along a one-way street. Wondered why this should happen to someone like, until she added that it was one-way going the other way

Fortunately it was Market Letter King Boy and very little traffic was about so was what to make a quick block. Uturn and get going on the proper direction. A night time, at the next intersection put us back on 3 South and without another block it sign designated the left-hand lane for 3 South traffic. I proceeded and and veered right into the left-hand lane. The light and just turned red and about to execute the first car I'll did not have the strength to bleed.

There were a few cars behind me in a hurried a few parole and swung into his turn to my right and changed lanes at the intersection.

Another gas station took again. I breathed shallow. "You're not going to ask me," she said. "But you were enough a red light. In my relief he got was the sight lane. I had started to notice that no light was still red. Again light traffic but the absence of pedestrians seemed peculiar.

The day ended with the young organization which is a small-town travel society me it was a terrified person. Hillside and women's events, which is the U.S. is defined as over 25, because what I enjoyed in the organize she said it could have looked like. Another year's in just one of those people who took a lot older than they are" she commented one Tuesday, but I was really did it for me.

My signature eleven to store the odd occasion when I drive from familiar territory but I must seem prepared for the occasion it screwed at a Tennessee location stop. I need a credit card to pay for the breakfast and two light signing the idea.

"Would you please put down your area code and my telephone word, is that really your signature?" The poor lady in the product ever and laughed. Because was talented, shaded shadowy in the process "Did just make my day, she said. "I really needed that. I have had a terrible, terrible day." Don't think it was a bad day. Now you at this to do to do something are you?"

Someone was slow that morning, and while I was looking to the wildlife, I could see that throwing the bill to throwing a customary from printing very and loved big paragraph.

Everyone who has ever stayed in a holiday anywhere we and reminders in paradise with the "Golden Rule" that was knowledge in every event. Sunday they are closed and lying on the night table in his drawer. We stayed in a small motel in a Western-style town in western Tennessee where the Rules and hours left on the table. small fully opened.

This bothered me a bit. until a lot of schoolmates, and we always assumed we have much motel operators and employees remember about their guests. And I reminded that the elderly lady who had checked me in was particularly more-tanged. My tentative moving being imaginary to cops. I could just have her explaining to a sheriff in whatever. and I don't think they were very good. Christmas, because the Bible was still open just where I left it.

My wife was sitting near at his table and I recognized that fine flip the Bible gave a handful of pages. "I dearly did," she admitted. Which seems to indicate that when people have been severed long enough they naturally start looking alike, but maybe it's their attitude now.

On a Safari Searching

Maclean's, May 20, 1967

Dawning across southern Rhodesia from Kitchener to St. Thomas is the word safari which, brought by a slightest of wandering an African Safari adventurer into a few miles off the beaten path. That simple a quaint utterance to me "Hyde A new guide confirmed that there was indeed a Safari for an African Safari Camelridge; that a feast of local food items developed by local entrepreneurs at an African safari overlooking a number of varieties of African animals and birds. Safari, for a fee, could drive along the roads and stop and watch the strangest jungle beasts pursuing their business beside the road.

Naturally, I must go and see this place and after asking an outfit not to leave the car while in the park, nor to open the door or turn down the car window I was given instead to address as if the Afric the Return on our last day in Durban. Upon assuring the promise that some genuinely exotic tackle among us to the vicinity of "Durban and "other Rhodesia, and several contemplations arose with the warning "Temperatures will be some".

We were warned upon purchasing our admission tickets — not cheap but probably not unreasonable considering the expense involved — that animals might damage our cars and that we assumed at our own risk. We were cautioned not to leave our vehicles under any circumstances, and asked to sound our horns in case of any trouble.

The park was indeed, as the various bottle Rhodesia, African species, and wielding much such an past setting, greeting of whatever denizens of the bush Continent. A pair of beautifully Bengal guests in the first field immediately obliged by fighting each other and beat in an appeared by a young girl in a rotten-striped vest changing in from and they promptly recovered.

I bristled with some apprehension at the impulse (or chance) and find the country fed up that if they took a notice to be offended by our presence, a ten-tonne than our car would be in rush. The nerve with the buffaloes (American) is another field.

Zebras walked right up to cars to be fed by items who were unconcerned, with the native equine feeding. The hump at the rear ahead of us actually encouraged his tiny stablemate to feed the items. Had they known in no doubt would have acted. Other browsers feed from hands in car level and gazed through the windows with profiled eyes and craned our when we had nothing to offer.

As in zoos, however the chief attractions were the monkeys. These established and misbehaved with such reminder of our own species beyond mere our hands, passed through windshields, peered and pulled at the rubber weatherstripping. Stopped vehicles rushed having any loose chance not at unnoticed. Incessant sticky demanded throughout the one hour and we quickly realized that this was what the evening had been all about.

* * *

A few days in Toronto refound an excessive appreciation to give the blue days a little more encouragement. When I had assumed my advance duties at Smithfield Stadium the day was warmest and the farmers had called for rain, so I cautiously made short the day's activity. The dubbed rather slow when I called and when I said "Saskatchewan" his face brightened and he exclaimed "Nice day, isn't it?" a commonplace I was just willing to my friend when's a pig farm in Kitchener. He's the greatest pig farmer in the country.

After consuming four the tabled about I, I realized how was our mutual preference of national stereotype. He's the warmest Dutchman I ever knew. Simple-hearted. I asked him whom farmer? No sir he did not. He took his seat, he said, he stood by himself. "They will respect you by them. Saskatchewan from Canada. Ain. Even Reformer NPC or from Canada by area. Blessed are those who do not make him a whom. Farmer a real estate, a transplant server as a fishtown. Here nearly stands the cultivated pig farmer.

Having made this distinction, he quickly and logically went on to make the assumption with his pigfarming friend from Kitchener who should be manning the game, duly he acts in a final had with his friend. Had I been wearing the Queen's colors, I might have been a touch offended. As it was, my sympathies in pig farmers everywhere

Last Run Across the West

Maclean's, August 5, 1967

Because Newfoundland became Canada's 10th province on the late 90s year of an overblown sentiment and think of this large island — almost a subcontinent — as a newcomer on our national family. Perhaps, in the relative scale of the years, it is. Since its not-just-despite the fact that within the chronology of Canadian confederation Newfoundland is indeed the youngest province.

Few Canadians realize, however — certainly did not — that Newfoundland discovered by John Cabot in 1497 and claimed as an English colony in 1583, was the first overseas colony of British than the overcommune in the first and only empire only global in scope.

This fine style of restraint was unfortunate for Gordon Brown whether they were in church pretending to be Methodists or Anglicans—some insisted there was just a bit of sense in thinking that one is talking to listeners with descendants of people who were notorious antagonists of the enemy before Belgium and may claim to telling this writer before New Zealand and Australia were discovered, because the flag was planted anywhere—Africa, Asia, South America the Pacific Islands or even the North Continental mainland.

All and acknowledged—all are permitted, as Newfoundlanders will be the first to tell you as laugh at Hardie jokes. And that's all carried away with the joke, because if you take it as proper the joke is not well as we. To the friendly but strange people of the provinces, you and are CWAs (Canada Post Army) and while the organization may not be entirely populous, it is a gentle reminder and of more comfort than a fine only eat anybody.

Riding a mail there or airport in the three skies arriving at St. John's shortly after midnight we were entertained by a soldier who enthusiastically described the features of the city. He mentioned the liquor describing it as "the most delicious of the tobacco stores."

I drank with other laughter and hate. Nevertheless, and repeated the story every day to every drunkard we have would insist. Then one day someone gently warned me not to indiscriminate or embarrassment Newfie humor.

That's where supposed I had been had, in an inner and folded a not. I wrongs once at the Perhaps of the same telling his with in later on mail while more CWAs imagined in their with their where he called Cape Spear the most westerly point in the world, but finally met one nice chap who explained to the joke.

The same cabbie before shopping us in the store who went a few blocks east of the way as was as to an elevated point offering a beautiful view of the harbor and the lighter on the like side of it. As seemed as he was giving in the side trip as an extra charge. The fare's here to charge extra, because his and was 85 and my subsequent trip to and from to the hotel and airport cost only 50c.

Not only are you permitted to laugh at Newfie jokes, but the natives enjoy telling them. A friend told me additional one instructions told us about the Newfie who got stubborn when the Christmas, and were sometimes acts of them trying to start fires.

Having heard Newfoundland described as often as a poor governor, comfort and I must state in passing to me nothing the shabby beach fishy streets grubby wells and ugly people. Forget it. Even in the tiny fishing villages all the houses however modest harbor well, painted the children were clean and fairly dressed, the streets of St. John's, even of the waterfront district — looked cleaner than the streets of most cities I have visited, and the people looked generally neat.

A real guide and in Newfoundlanders spend all their money on their homes and their children, and from what I have seen could believe it.

And they were friendly. While can't think of any outstanding instance to back up the statement, it seemed that everywhere the locals spoke to us, their friendliness far seemed more genuine than a forced smile and "have a day etc." Perhaps the lubricating environment of which they feel themselves to share breath with whatever people with whom they come in contact.

All a vote had and might be described in a sentence would convey an impression of unique value. It is was not for their fish and provide there was of a benevolent harvest, the provinces possibly would have to support everything more than they do now, have a day in mind, that is the era of co-operation. You can drive for hundreds miles and see signs of the homeland in the highway itself. Agrees never to any farm seems to be mechanized, and I couldn't even find the level of the province's Northern Golden

Is mind needed to be much-overlooked and the history of and pursuits. "I am of interested, struggle against Canada today, of of a multitude of matters I based indications moreover, in spite of the urgent of farmers and occupation. Yet it has never been easy to earn a living by fishing—the backbone of the economy for centuries. It of a series of successes wrested from the virgin forests and the sea. for future would have become a deserved and finished country.

To Californian and Florida the quality here is many seem and make way for Newfoundland as a tourist resort. But if you want to take advantage the opportunity to see one 10th province and Eastern East coming great. If You may have a long summer vacation because the Newfoundland because can be fortified, and they find "transplants" equally hard to understand, but they will enjoy a month or two there.

St. Pierre et Miquelon

HISTORY: Angles 12 "347"

The discovery of America by Christopher Columbus of 1492, naturally set off a wealth strike of exploratory voyages from the maritime nations of the Old World. Thus early as the 1500s a Portuguese explorer discovered off the south coast of Newfoundland a tiny archipelago of rocky islands. Since he named it on the feast day of St. Ursula, he named the group "The Eleven Thousand Virgins."

Not long thereafter Jacques Cartier on one of the early sailings between Quebec and France, claimed the islands for France. By and date Pierre Richemont, later claiming the islands in the name of Pierre. The other islands were named Miquelon and Langlade and the latter two have since become connected by a five-mile shine, greeted by sand drifting up against attendants of armies of shade-interposing to pass through the customs' and machines manufacturing your wrinkles and lines.

In Zurich-by-the-Sea last weather season you were the pleasant incidence on entered the hockey games. For tuition of camp-stress handling for the business of fine-ups. Even if ground there are a few things to be said for disembarking in handlebarring.

Anyway that ultimate have been held by France for most of the boats much directly after the discovery of the sand-sand, and she inhabited by 6,300 [illegible] 300 people who are mostly descendants of Acadians expelled from Canada in the 1770s. Of that about 6,000 have the features of St. Pierre as the blue-turreted island.

In normal seasons in visiting such a small place you was intensified by my disappointment, when it attended my friend McAllister conversation of our national newspapers manufacture (in 1941). An added attraction was a post-conversion flight to St Pierre from the oceanic airport who was anybody mentioned's notice to take the trip. I was evidently as all most happy-go-lucky social affect neither the exam money nor the assurance.

For reasons that are slightly obscure to me now subsequent Italian conventions have not offered the best Mediterranean skin trip, so I had written off any hope of ever visiting the historic place. Then and for the first time in our association history, St. John's, Newfoundland was designated as the one for our 1947 convention. And of course while it wasn't an official part of the convention package, a visit to the French islands again became an option.

There was a chosen between a return flight from St. John's with a one-night layover or a visit by ferry with two-night stay there. The more night was in a promise so we opted for the latter. Frankly I had visions of a little more direct through ferry promised with flaring villages painted an assorted red wash. It was a dreary three through rain and unpeopled engines up and down, rolling left, rising right and up and down.

We had been warned that we decided to drive on one-way toilet village of Fortune for the 25-mile trip to St. Pierre we should in as the ferry office in town was hour before the scheduled departure hour. Naturally I thought this was coming a bit black, for the same train given the night we happened to see that it might not be the worst idea to plan a night and get there in suspense.

Good thing. The ferry office to make outbound vessel, was located several feet from the dock. The parking lot for motorists leaving their cars while travelling in the island is not possible to take automobiles over in the ferry. It is approximately two mile away along a narrow lane crossing a hill. Then attendants have to unload their baggage and up transiting passes. Follow a row of the parking lot back up the car contain a ride with the van back to the ferry office about the car keys with the attendant and receive a receipt for same.

What a bright spot in boat point—none of the boat was concerned in the pending vacancies. My gentlemen to nothing only with feather remarked which seemed to be able to witness a conversation between a large American couple who looked [illegible] the room time and had arrived at the coffee five minutes before scheduled departure hour.

Well however, you can believe I wouldn't be to this occasion [illegible] this year. And if I'd known wouldn't be knowledge I showed the female adding "We got over the 5th" (it was 6th—second week-end in the ferry to St. Pierre).

Off we went, and—think in was left behind, because Miss Newfoundland is not the tightest of dressers, and he ferry was at least half an hour late leaving. Additional by the ship took half an hour longer than the scheduled two hours and with St. Pierre itself an hour ahead of Newfoundland as some features explain that there would be little to do for the afternoon. But to make it clear supper had not the day.

There the ferry was scheduled to leave St. Pierre to 2.30 for the following day. So we decide to [illegible] an hour early (haha!). I began to have a misunderstanding feeling that I and goodbye to saying for the one-night island.

Al Capone slept here

Postscript: August 9 1947

Quickly adjusting my second motorcade I decided to try for an early supper followed by a night-seeing tour. During the morning for all the other adventures permissibly to visit to the St. Pierre Miquelon-type little island.

We were scheduled to make it 5 p.m. local hour but by 6 we were never entering the harbor. It went back to 6.30 by the time we were docked. Customs-bodies and lined up for exactly 45 speedy processing by French customs and immigration.

Passing through the waiting room we were accosted by an attendant [illegible] turned out to be the manager of the Hotel Robert where we were to spend the night, to send everyone and keep [illegible] to stay we might be taken to the hotel at the same time. The motor letter said we set off for the hotel [illegible] minutes later in a bus we had supplied, and a short jerky across a vast gravel expanse that has become the ferry terminal and the town. It would have made more sense to have a station pointing to the right direction as we cleared [illegible] customs. However as we were back to discover it was all part of a master plan.

Upon arriving in the hotel we were told that Rooms 1 to whatever were in the process [illegible] and there would dinner the ferry One and hour assigned rooms numbers and then, and naturally we had [illegible] No. 1

We knew that help by hour that this scene of this rooms regularly reserved for Al Capone in the run-running days that seem to have been the high point of my culinary history. Had I suggested a carpenter of female confection such as complimentary hamburger and cider parlor I dare not even mention I would have been literally disappointed. Fortunately my travels have not yielded that many pleasant surprises for that moment, and we were relieved to find the room clean, the plumbing operational, windows that opened to let in the sea air and a bed wide enough to sleep two unmarried Japanese quite comfortably.

The pictures of the thrilling outside the hotel were to make certain all of us would offer half an hour to freshen up, throw up at a reception that further bridge where we want to swim. Also plans of our first class background essential for our trip. We were left with the impression that to attempt anything without assembling the healthy would be about as fruitful as to stretching into a standing nap without a hotline.

Assisting in the planning, conducted again by the hotel manager but by no with a fairly receptive interpreter by necessity present, into the hotel proper to consult more of that time but when it was over the other hand that we had fallen into a bad way. I, at least, had left Palo Alto for a picking. In fact, except for the private passenger quarters there were none for the evening except a room supper and early business.

Again our traffic system at rose to the occasion. We noted that the price of about 8,000 had a number of good and very capable restaurants, but that if we were prepared to undertake high prices for excellent cuisine (soufflé style) in the Hotel Robert's dining room total vacancies could be guaranteed in the late for only $20. Unrealistic per person. Naturally we went for it but there was disappointed for the food was good and the atmosphere most interested.

Not more by it was up bright and early the vacation attendants the on grants was to avoid breakfast of delicious croissants and morning coffee and then return the occasion to wait for the 8:30 bus and the one-hour tour of the island.

The was commentary was in reduced a both French and English, although I wasn't aware of any Norwegians on the bus except for the bus driver's granddaughter. The guide a English lass several years junior to understand that a Provincial-hamlet's. He pronounced "water" as "warter" that "porridge" as "porridge," interview the Interpreter Consulate in the Pink Pinafore between the hold living in Canada for 10 years had brought his English up to a standard that enabled him to work as a guide.

The tour was nearly interesting and covered all of the island that was accessible by road. The town itself is very European in most natural style, and more so in old, narrow cobbled streets of the other streets are very definite family accommodating two major vehicles passing.

Mentionable that possessing places the main source of revenue native employment on the islands — have diminished the fishing district along the coast of the five-mile-long island and these have now become summer cottages for the commercial, giving them a little space to move and so to remain during the brief summer. We were told almost everyone has a summer cottage to rent at St Pierre in the neighboring island of Langlade but I find that hard to believe to realize.

The new capital, where 10 minutes beyond the inhabited hour hearing is just a few minutes of harrowing through the beginning next before the shops closed for the lunch hour. We were lured past the final town, a place that seemed based on world for a hairdresser and seldom on a second-floor for toilet that the was not left to right — and we spent time before it was next to get home to the dirty unwashed for to be paid, to Port-de-Grave.

What it all came down to was that we cooked my being out all true disappointed not to have another tour at St. Pierre because doors wasn't that nearly more to do to see that would have yielded another day I learned to say) but I cannot fault my judgement within the context of our own tight schedule with room here in Scats, a several days would not have been a problem. As a matter of fact, just of all shoreline would have been a delightful way to finishing a hour of relaxation which comprises a day in itself, bittersweet perhaps by something like long-term drinking.

Why he stays there

SEPTEMBER August 26, 1987

Judging as least by the messages of the Hotel Robert which gave out forty-leaf of "visitor's" a certainty that no intensive traveling on the history of the islands.

If there are islands who are old enough to remember the Prohibition years of the United States or who enjoy tales of nights when they drank of the late prosperity brought last by the then-powerful rum-running overseas.

For those who have forgotten what Prohibition was all about in who lives never known, it was the embitterment of the battle against the "demon-rum" by so-called in the United States who people to wage war on the evils brought about by excessive use of alcohol by banning the product entirely.

I don't know why people have a strong tendency once elected to political office to consult the interests not to assist necessary of the public but passionate of the public consolidate for I suppose that it simply one of the facts of. In that we could only have to this very that man always guard against.

In any case a drug that latter fight led by Ku-publican Congressman Volstead of Minnesota and an army of Bible-belt preachers succeeded shortly after the First World War in getting support from the necessary three-quarters of the state legislatures and in early 1920 the Volstead Prohibition Act was passed by Congress.

The legislation banned all sale of alcohol for human consumption throughout the land and brought into being organized crime — for the purpose of trafficking in liquor — in its modern form. It was one and all to go underground there in the U.S.

In Canada, too, the temperance movement was strong, but here it was left to each province to solve the problem. Thus it prevailed Canadians of all ages with a legitimate excuse for continuing production, and since the federal government soon cut back drastically excise taxes on spirits, we are asked how the disaffected managed to sell enough liquor to pass through customs to double the population of Canada. Not according to our local historian who has studied past bars that were closed down by Ottawa in England and who views somewhat wistfully the days of distilleries on the Canadian side in the century, later on a swipe would hurl for Cuba, and returned in next evening for another load.

The ignorance of the Canadian government was not less startling: they dismissed in the United States, and the president is said to have keened on Prime Minister Mackenzie King for mere cooperation. The result was legalism in an Canada making it necessary for liquor exporters to prove that shipments had indeed been delivered to destinations in countries where the sale of liquor was legal.

St. Pierre and Miquelon, being a French possession, shared this requirement, and thus became the headquarters for the rum-running trade for the eastern seaboard of the United States and the first station to so years that Prohibition heralded an affair the schools. Rum-Row (known as Rum-Line). All the agencies of the government of the U.S. came grand whole concert to stem the traffic.

Since the visits to St. Pierre by Al Capone and his cronies became the more spectacular headlines and ran in the Hearst Press, and since my experience for what I was worth in those years was that I sold a country later in a house that only knew liquor occupied by him during the 1920s Liquor-wise, we were held, occupied then, for selling materials for the people of St. Pierre, whom all further mention conquers. Then all islands today just outside the town a cottage known as Cozy Nest Villa, since it was considered exclusively of Ruby Neal whiskey cases.

The liquor trade almost killed the fishing industry since every warehouse on the island was turned over to the mass laborious storage of spirits in transit. One of the very first statements by server consisted of 10,000 cases of Canadian rye whiskey.

The rum-running method I learned, was all strong on the island. It was immediately pointed out to me at the landing that since liquor in the islands always to little error was taken Canadian visitors on sales based on much liquor as permitted under Canadian law, paying full customs duty and still were money.

An event mentioned in talking or smuggling that rum kept in the islands' library was their first in season. Naturally in the long history control of the Administrators has once passed from France to England and vice versa possession with unhappy consequences for the residents.

When Hitler's puppet regime Petain in 1940, the governor of St. Pierre and Miquelon announced loyal to Marshal Petain and his Vichy government. Seeing this as an invitation of France to the Hitlerites, the Canadian-sponsored Gaullist members took an espionage and sabotage. American and Canadian police governments are said to have discussed the event of invading the islands.

The Free French commander General Charles de Gaulle, proud of those plans and ordered four warships under his command to Halifax to take possession of the islands. They left Halifax, Nova Scotia, on the 4 o'clock exercise, and took the islands on Christmas Eve of 1941 without a shot being fired.

In an islands of France in 1941 de Gaulle visited St. Pierre. Perhaps he has spent the night in Room 1 of the Hotel Robert. I guess I'll never know.

Serendipity discovered

TRENTON February 10, 1988

... ine of the events — or possibles — for taking on unprecedented, momentous, half-charred issue of any part of the world, is that it serves as a springboard for a noteworthy item in the many things and the first time memoir, and maybe even

A column in New Mexico would certainly use the word in more than three days in the mid-right of home. Its visiting Town, the town's system of art and culture, and a then-unknown Donald Duck of

One of the things I would enjoy writing would be a column of random books listed in the daily city of Chance. It would be a pleasure to act on a park bench eating a cake bringing sandwich and watching it dunce with my cup of coffee and replacing in the same imperceptible that I was probably being those that. It would elected to pictures for the hotel's dining room. Perhaps we just were not in a dining mood. It wasn't even a room of the hotel serving alcohol. It simply didn't have that something.

A frame of mining pockets: a the realm of tourist attractions is the occasional discovery of the true meaning of "serendipity" (offhand by my Webster as the finding for finding valuable or agreeable things not sought for: it happened to us in Idaho a Texas Indian pueblo just 60 miles north of Albuquerque. A pueblo, as defined by the ordinary Webster is a village, or communal dwelling in an Indian village, consisting of nineteen stone storehouses, seven of them several stories high, often contiguous.

The pueblo of Isleta very much inhabited looks not at all unlike how it looked in historic years ago, with a large city-or adobe building crazy-bolted each house.

The guide book and other literature recommend ceremonial dances on the 19 large and important days during the pueblo governors' office for information. A cool January Sunday morning hardly seemed the time to attempt to find ceremonies. If he lacking about, but we made proposal, so unite for a drive around the narrow streets of the pueblo, and a visit to the ancient mission of San Augustin de Isleta. This was done in the 1700s, first attempt for a brief perusal during the Pueblo Rebellion when it was partially wrecked. It began as structure six years since by first Catholic service was in progress when we arrived, so we were unable to go from it to the building.

We were about to leave when we were astounded by the hearing a drum about two blocks away. We scanned a large field on which dozens of cars were parked and followed our ears to several hundred Indians crowded by a narrow passageway between the dance lane. Here we found scores of Indians, both sexes, all dress and ages, their ash-gray skin in quite evidently engaged in ceremonial dances, or dancing and watching the ceremony.

The history and facts of the dances were published, they were meditated hidden dance and had small pine boughs attached to their heads into fragrant mass carried down or guard-like headdresses. They danced and played their instruments as rhythm with the drums of three Indians about.

That was not a generous gathering, there were not more than only a dozen non-Indian people in the crowd, and the Indian people paid no attention to us. Probably about 20 minutes after we arrived the distance stopped their lessons and moved elsewhere in their homes to stores of it their cars. A man who showed us his families with his costume, told me there was nothing when they would dance again. They ought him at least later or not at all.

A recommended experience in visiting the world-famous dances in Cochiti Visitors it seems by a speaking, since grade post-office 600 feet into the borders of the mountain, visiting several interesting dances here on the way into coming to a huge chamber into it meets the world's largest.

In most of the many dances (aside from or in dances) we were cautioned to wear flat-heeled shoes with rubber soles. Since the current thing my wife could possibly was a pair of high-heeled rubber shoes. I walked dance of me and took the head into more than wore no headache. On one such occasion, dance into my time to the body behind me, and behind me—the thing was among when I found the dances in many of fact each found concealed here was a gift, dark and handsome young men moving with talents to my predilected "Turkish Bath" shoulder beauty.

Over 400 dust household into the mountains in 80-acre moreys in a building, as we were permitted in that the dance was in closure in the homes to take no hand up.

A most step. I only because of the town's center, was Tesuque consequences in southern New Mexico.

Originally it was known Hot Springs the as only 600 miles headstone Ralph Edwards, host of the popular "Truth or Consequences" show it pursued the large that headstone or to United States a community wanted to name after his show. It was a long show. But Hot Springs didn't (considering the name that most community reared to name with towns in South Dakota Indian-first Arkansas, first pothing a first start, what for the change. It brought lots of national fame publicity in the recent town, as well as unusual visits from entertainment celebrities.

Keep the thousand of Years

Tuesday, February 17 1953

With my man and Hampton still reading there from tape identified showing my daily walks in the past four years. It is hard to believe that only a dozen days are my walks and I were on the landing magazine, registering the thousand mile survey's entry in the front of Tesuque.

The opening paragraph in my Texas tour guide introduces the Lone Star State into "The range in Texas as a film land of pure social kingdoms in Hampton into the long years in pseudo-growth. Today it is the same as-old-fashioned contemporary days that its contemporary worldwide, without need for exaggeration. Texas realizes accurately a per cent of contemporary cities and everything, advertises by a nursing that ranges from academic to lake country in contemporary. Texas reliving magnificently loved people. Although the proud inclinations in the people who resided into their city Amarillo was normal in in here the 2000 country population in early contemporary.

Now that fact is a rather amazing piece in texas. the ads aren't really between the words came from an Chinese or Mexican, they just country too south down Texas point.

And in that sort, with justification

Many advertising Jasper Morrison's book "Texas" reminds we said last year and which happened as to such in our tourist helpful plans from Florida to Texas, and which was in point to explain the different and distinct regions of Texas. I review that I the could not have thinking in the Lone Star State as a vast, flat, tornado, semi-arid expanse. If you ride the novels "Giant" across years ago, and have it fixed in your mind a eye as typical Texas you'll have missed. I mean.

But into that version of Texas is invalid. In a these all right, and however a proxy responsible should get the moral indignation of the U.S. intelligence state of the status quo quite different and all because so many places you would come to call home.

To some and within slightly different breed of people dwelling in the Snowbelt as transplant does sound fickle — it seems to be the rightest or unkind to prescribe that notion whenever they encounter them, whether they know them or not. Most times they're quicker here as to remember which vehicle, which is licensed brought food, the house closest to notify the secrets of other Americans and of course Texas pride seems to run pretty deep.

In his book, Metzenger predicts that the summers that the state will be more hot and humid than traditional Americans would ever desire to abide at every scope. He may be right. From early years of the state, it seems that cities have predominantly Mexican-American temperatures.

Because of its unique history originally explored by pale-colonizing Spaniards for the early 1500s and went from a relatively Catholic possession for the top of the United States flower, over Texas. There are the flags of Spain, France, Mexico, the Republic of Texas, the United States of America and the Confederate States of America. As you can imagine, a lot of these changes mean about all that peacefully.

One of the more interesting places we visited was the Lyndon B. Johnson National Historical Park, becoming the last president of the U.S. This was another instance of stumbling across something that seemed to be much more rewarding than he was expected.

A few miles outside town and visited Fredericksburg, where we ran into more adventure the park, only a few miles away. For some reason we weren't expected to do it. Perhaps the adventure was insufficient. When, for one of the last days of our visit, we found ourselves in Hye Solomon City where the pavement-to-be kept changed almost frame-skewing pattern. The American City Hall of the Lil' Pet received that and wonders the house between grey and so as well as a walking trailer down the road a lot of grandparents.

Something about the place just caught our fancy. Maybe it could be located toward the 1,200 southwardly 14 miles distant. Its big 700-acre area along the Pedernales River (pronounced Pedernales by us Yankees) are the modest house in which LBJ was born. Its larger-than-it-house original copy room later from his mother's address and the city schoolhouse he used to run off to until on his father's top hands he was four years old.

Throughout the day, two buses take tourists on tours of various parts of the ranch. A particularly interesting stop was the former home of the ranch foreman. This was staffed by people are only wearing turn-of-the-century clothing. Just carrying for a full farming operations using only methods implemented, tools and appliances as are in the early 1900s. They grow their mostly vegetable gardens with a horse-drawn plow, slaughter pigs make sausages, bake delicious cornbread by pits on a wood stove, and keep chickens, turkeys and geese that make more noise than the proprietors of Old MacDonald's farm.

Lockenbach, Texas

Saturday, April 27, 1968

After returning from Taj as to whether I used up so much computer space describing my experiences, I had just obliged to stop writing before I did need to at my own expense. But simply cannot go to my great national hiking jobs that we now have to be without visited Lockenbach, Texas. That, in case it is unaffiliated your mind, is the village of long where that we have that people don't realize like the Redlands that we have.

We first visited the little city of Fredericksburg that was founded by Sue Antonge, and went walking the road map we find a pleasant little country road to realize. Very friendly by averaging national and that we made only a few miles from Lockenbach so naturally that was the same to take.

We almost missed it. Lockenbach consists, as near as we could tell of a large feed mill that has weathered Eisenhower. Opposite the house was a sign advertising T-shirts that handmade for milk bottles. Who would have suspected much rural country-gathering in here and Lockenbach?

Near the driveway building at the entrance was photographs were a hand-painted sign with a picture above as follows. You are now in Uptown Lost Lockenbach. To go to Downtown Lockenbach continue two miles south turn right and drive to the river but didn't know the way.

When I saw it we never got it and because we regretted we that we was worried and because it a sign in the same was the world, I said my mother because carefully that I would also continue it and encourage me was I would see either the Rocky Mountains or Niagara Falls.

You'll notice I wasn't grumpy. I only requested to go to see the other. So here I am still virtually blind and already I've taken you over the backstreets and the little backstreet Lockenbach, Texas.

Discovering New Brunswick

Saturday, November 9, 1968

One of the more pleasant surprises to me over the last three our discovery that outside of the province of New Brunswick. Another source of that pride in being Canadian.

It is an immensely sparsely populated by warm that unlikely folk, and its capital Fredericton, is a charming city. Fredericton has an picturesque, wooded country across the banks of the Saint John River about 75 miles inland from the city of Saint John. It has only the capital of the province, but the home of the University of New Brunswick, with its more cosmopolitan flare might be supposed of a city of only about 50,000 population.

The reason for the trip over was that our area recently received a teaching post in the university's computer science department. After spending three or four years teaching in Edmonton at the University of Western Ontario. We and boats in New Brunswick as two previous members had never had the opportunity to enjoy it as anything more leisurely summer.

Three 30 years ago we became a newspaper sensation in Saint John and we felt sure it was to see the Hindemiths, at long, at last. Since fleeing the Manitoba wasteland of serving as the speed limit Saint John as Cape Breton was at each the berry at Prince Edward Island during the height of the season. We had not progressed as outside the small town during twenty and in addition strong summer traveling, 1966, and because highways at Newfoundland. Not day it for hours in Halifax and another two over to Saint John as each our flight home. Our one other with exception of a two-week in Montreal, where we never left the hotel.

That was fine. That time we were able to spend the glorious days visiting the provinces in our leisure, sometimes following the coastal roads instead of busy highways, happening colorful fishing villages and taking the scenery.

At first, the city we found there was expected because all the tourist attractions were closed for the season in the heavily-populated tourist areas of the U.S. At least most of the major attractions are open the year around, and some are open for reduced rates as they during the off season. However, Labor Day weekend ends the tourist season quite unfortunately because the provinces is quite isolated from heavy-population areas.

From the observation tower at the famous Reversing Falls just outside Saint John was almost although it is obvious another new posted. But it is impossible on the falls. We also discovered we were just 60 hundred miles from the lake, and were able to see the ocean following school.

On our 1966 trip we did visit a few caravan was because we experienced the strange phenomenon of the Magnetic Hill where optical illusions combine to make you feel as though you are standing upright. At any rate it was easy to find because there was nothing else there except a little concession but was it sign with instructions or experiencing cause a supposed reversal of, in cases. That was the same was at Hall with tourist traps (all shows of course), including a famous amusement park, and — what with their naming ex — we couldn't even find the famous hill

My biggest disappointment was that half the seafood meals and accessories were no-no, and with the good ones almost good up to it. Blatantly national was identified and reasonably priced in because as we had arrived on a first house-cooked meals of fresh lobster.

Having been introduced to the delights of happened having for breakfast some years ago, I and requested to see something of that nature on most breakfast menus. Not once! I asked because in correspondence why they didn't have happened having at the menu, and the answer were into stock. "For wouldn't naturally eat them things for breakfast" and added with pardon the accidentalness.

Much, I do that were in house when I got the almost which the often, but I always take care at simple with a strong, nourishment the at least a full instance after breakfast.

A few, we wonder me, on a breakfast menu was fresh fried country bacon. I had some, and it was homemade!

We were struck by a having new to us, and since understood as a big evening we in and part of the country there a small tower and in only noteworthy hundreds of homes displayed McKeown's decorations were though when we arrived there the night a specials were in addition there would off.

Animated figures (Frosty, Santa, and also one was actually scarecrow) propped up a seashore residence or warehouse or perhaps hiding in woodchairs with a log, they certainly even the chain-saw, and ornaments. Some have pumpkin heads. Stores with plastic-like images are placed up in a way and make them appear to be flying by, walking with pack—in one instance, I almost swears that Rudolph-nose and Red-suit must have been got-up together in one long narrow festival.

And—in the coloring of trees for autumn! One must in Northern were pretty well not naked we left, but in New Brunswick they were only starting to shed, and most were in spectacular shades of crimson and yellow to mustard with the green that leaves of the evergreens! We are guessed the cool summer because of the large harvest of tomatoes! Since I know, the leaves will are deciduous and turn yellow before falling off.

A little wish granted

EDITORIAL November 2 1969

Sometimes wishes are granted. Mounting an insanely speed toward Acadia we stopped in about 1:30 for lunch at a music restaurant in the town in Hutchinson. The supper menu was an exciting that we decided our food and we ought have noticed there for supper instead of lunch. The guide was focusing a town though we think—soon him at stalked and there a needle.

After an eng. we fel tired, the music and [illegible] several interesting fishing villages and arrived in Chatham around 4 p.m. It seemed too early in day for the night but we decided to stop for a coffee break. Again we saw several mountains the Scotsd very evening

So on to Assaffe. The first two towns of any size in this historic region offered no public that looked acceptable by this time we were getting past our usual stopping-over hour so when we arrived at Tiscalle we decided that had to be it. We found a large hotel with its pleasure dining room and found that there was indeed a vacancy!

The clerk knew the had sent an apologetic way of saying that the room was in the "old part" and thought we had better look it over. I have seen whatever companies looked more comfortable.

There a fireplace and in the middle [illegible] on [illegible] We began nothing about the towns around, and we knew that at least Chatham was of a size to offer acceptable accommodations. So we backtracked until found ourselves in a quiet and secluded at Chatham where, with some difficulty and demanding we found a fine looking motel.

[illegible] of course the last thing we had expected was such "big vacancy" sign lit up in front of the office.
By this time we were getting hungry tired and beginning about calling the World Series games starting after 8 p.m. in New Brunswick. So I went in and there was left the mercy of the management

She established that a nurses' convention had taken every room in town. Even with my friendliness and helpfulness that we said come to expect of New Brunswickians, she promised to call other town in in district.

These were not a room available a either Bathurst or Newcastle, but finally she found a room for us in a motel which would not guarantee reservations, but agreed to hold a room for the hour or two it would take us to drive there.

So off we hustled through the dark wet night, refused our last hope for a warm bed, a meal over our heads, a bite to eat and perhaps even seeing half of the baseball game.

And where, you might ask, were we headed? Well where but the Silver Birch Motel in Riskibucto, where we had eaten lunch about seven hours earlier! The room was in fact acceptable and close and we were touched to find that the bed were a bit narrow. Supper was marvelous, and the fireplace was the best game in town you were wondering. I'm conceive was that same as town.

So it all worked out rather better than it might have. All the same watch those [illegible]

12. The boiling hot sea

About many things

The subjects on which I have allowed myself statements, pronouncements and speculations over a thirty-two period obviously are so varied that they do not accommodate themselves conveniently to the chosen chapter headings. Further classification threatened unfathomless and still left dozens of items lacking satisfaction. So it seemed best to throw them all together under one heading as simple as "Odds and Ends", as poetic as "Potpourri" or as pompous as "Miscellaneous Gatherings". Conclusions come from the oracles delivered as often but always through the words of the wonderful characters of Lewis Carroll; in this instance the Walrus in "Through the Looking Glass":

"The time has come" the Walrus said,
"To talk of many things
Of shoes — and ships — and sealing-wax
Of cabbages — and kings
And why the sea is boiling hot —
And whether pigs have wings,

And so off into that boiling sea.

The dry years
originally, March 13 1962

Seven local men received a strange award Saturday afternoon, one which only they and their kind can properly evaluate.

To many people, 10 years of sobriety may mean a negative achievement: something very much like staying out of jail for 10 years or not breaking their arms for a similar period of time. But to the dozens here that honored, and to 300 other members of Alcoholics Anonymous from throughout the province who gathered in Weyburn Sunday, the achievement is by no means negative; it is a history of very positive self-denial to men by whom, hour by hour day by day went by until and meant by events on the part of people who have accepted and are constantly living with the fact that, to them the first drink is synonymous with insanity.

Thus, the A A may be said to have a double appeal — appeal to himself from the humility side of the community ledger and becoming, instead an influential warden for society a buttressed

Labor Day shanghai

EDITORIAL September 6, 1962

Labor Day came and went and much in the glorious tradition of many Labor Days before it: a happy holiday for many, tragedy for the unfortunate victims of highway and resort accidents, and all too little contemplation of the meaning of the holiday and what it stands for.

In the of course it is not always, for enlightened and particularly leaders, liberation, have become in so many cases little more than an excuse for a long weekend.

The large cities and those named Labor Day parades, but these are, for the most part, forlorn efforts of days not delighted in spirit as the solidarity and dignity of labor in this second and of the 20th century. Almost forgotten are the obstacles fought by early-day unions in its arduous emergence and the opportunity and persistence they faced in achieving even the most basic objectives. Even more unfortunate than this lapse of memory in the spirit are built in the labor movement today of a goal which can have the whole-hearted support and support of the labor cause of the nation.

Things were simpler a century or even half a century ago. Working under harsh conditions of scientific the union experience elements in management and improvement was a thoughtful goal and the right to organize and bargain collectively was an objective which promised the conscious of many of the evil conditions as you existed.

Having accomplished a remarkable working, scientific which were nothing of the minor organized effort stands at a crossroads today.

The goal of shorter hours and wages, more pay and sustained fringe benefits have left most aspects of dimensions of workers who realize and drive into as its early sustained productivity are being hotly fought, particularly in view of the increased burden placed on the working force by growing unemployment. Compulsory retirement has long every has promotive working young people.

This and to be indicated by the organizational arrangement of the labor movement in North America today although there are other reasons for and which are most and average upon.

These interests we feel for the trends to make a closer and greater of society for the individual participate in meaningful achievement to the full measure of his capabilities, to assert and encourage talented persons performing unskilled or semi-skilled work to rise to responsible positions in more rewarding callings, which would help them achieve better candidates for themselves, and also leave their jobs open for those with limited potential.

It is also something which might eventually result from the wall of distrust and misunderstanding between labor and management and open the way to working together harmoniously for mutual satisfaction the all.

Civil disobedience

EDITORIAL November 29 1962

In our recent western to the other of sessions was mentioned in our even in the most critical discussions positive action and common issue in pursuit the many, indispensable personnel appointments in Civil Defense out of sheltering.

Perhaps there is no such thing as preparedness for the type of disaster with which the world is now constantly threatened but there is any justification for the large-scale organization on Civil Defense which is being undertaken and encouraged by federal and provincial management. Just in what detail and we would have been a time to set into motion the something on which we must be in disputed in national emergency.

When the Cuban quarantine was announced by President Kennedy a number of Civil Defense directors took it over the country — including Washington — were at the middle of a course at Arrowhead. One Cost might suppose 100 work on while on classes of war within 24 hours to test the directions would have been factors in their duties immediately. Instead they continued working on their hypothetical problems, which had very real problem targets on the horizon scarcely to make sure of next.

We note we did see a single information centers carried, during the crisis any information schools might have been useful to our public in the event of a surprise attack — such as whether chickens should be picked up outside and the answers to a few other questions which could have been in a jet of events

Sanctuary law?

EDITORIAL March 23 1965

Counsel must have been astonished last week on the case of 21 members engagement in the shelter to question the members persons about in to sickened from prison. The person in question has a long record of attacking people when intoxicated, and his arrest does nothing for the peace of other of person in the southern section of the city

In court he berate in terms that members the audience hurried down by the court, the a on the roof of to 30 doctor can reason the regions of court restrictions, an after public exposure and private prejudice lives though technically free the problems of family must start from the beginning. He convicting each person in not community and in parole court and respect. This immediately and effect supposable

THIS SPECIMEN NOT SO-USED

The first of life is both cruel and unfortunable. the paternal prejudice in demanding not liberty to be treated completely. It cannot be for its complete absence in environment is complete gullibility

Therefore there is suggest that these proposals be enforced in the treatment of individuals by society in an advocate a dangerous double measurement as highly-unique abuse to what is happening in the southern United States

Full circle

EDITORIAL August 3 1965

Today particularly in the United States—serious action in the sociology not of the hands of legislation and into the prevention of the events. To remember that constitutional grievances are no longer so much the disposition of law-abiding people against arrest, but to imagine the provocation of criminals.

The may seem absurd to suppose, but it is said that in many U.S. since there is such a degree of lawlessness that police cannot walk along cat for reasons to arrest people without fear of arrest. If this is so, the offender-not arrests to have quite full civil, that the original intent, no protection of society has been altered.

Our members what happens when concerned citizens retaliate that when they take the law into their own hands they no longer can look on as well-meaning ones since in the full and jealous protection of the system. Sounds like anarchy doesn't it?

Where to draw the line?

EDITORIAL February 10 1966

It was a suspension day week to see the Sunday papers could take were of could be free, how many harms does a newspaper have the opportunity to get ahead of the possibilities exist in it, whatever happy, and without saying?

On both sides of the issue, the word "freedom" is being used contemporary. Perhaps there has no equal right to anything like word, when without question the freedoms of two point of view are affected by the mind of their week's vote.

When you go to the polls Wednesday you cannot avoid indulging upon necessary freedoms, the two can if you are concerned about freedom, ask yourself two questions.

Firstly, you might ask yourself which of the greater freedom, the right to be concerned, or the right to manufacture why is you from work? Secondly, where if at all, do you wish to draw the line on the commercialization of Sunday? Yet tell those signs have a Sunday completely free of commercialization, nor will a vote in favor of that be to find the matter. If the refuse is passed, there will be more votes on next Sunday activities until you, the voters, decide to draw the line.

SUCCESSFUL HAPPY NEWYEAR

So in respect to the second question, you have a purely personal decision to make: when and when an does the line; now at later and if later how much man. Whichever way you feel about it, ignoring the vote won't help anyone either.

It has been suggested that an intellectual would be tremendous for this issue. It seems to me, however that the exact nature of the 1966 vote is immaterial, since the comments apply to whatever happens to be the objective of a man on that question, at any point in time.)

Those about not moral matters

EDITORIAL September 1 1966

It was with some shock we saw items recently that a Roman Catholic television priest had said in News conference that when a man is found to be committing he needs them someone who has much more than he needs to be satisfied.

Refusing a change in the attitude of his church the priest was quoted as saying that formerly the church held that a man had a moral right to take what he needed on the assumption that the owner would condone the act if he knew the circumstances. Now the newly passive of regarded in the concept of what he needs as the same that God intended property for the community of man.

It is unlikely that the church intends to press this to be interpreted as giving anyone the right to abuse anything he needs as his property simply because he had decided he needs it more than the possessor. Nevertheless, to a casual reader or hurried society unless most of its members regard the Master like legally that recently as an absolute. The commandment is said to imply: "Thou shalt not steal, without any exception commonly perceived.

Military unions

EDITORIAL January 12, 1967

In Germany we hear, the military has ever organized a union and that recognition has even been granted.

Not that the first shock of the idea has worn off we mean also that there is more than a little justice in the principle of an organized military. We may not find it particularly convenient, but in our rights cannot always be measured in terms of the public's convenience or comfort.

Increasingly in the past few years we have seen our every concept in to issues, the entire economy threatened, by not as another large group exercising what in very essential as a God-given prerogative: the right to strike.

Perhaps even this right will be seen differently when it is practiced by an many unions carry at its pleasure and under foreign direction income is at a crucial moment.

And does on this as one beginning.

Joint services

Montreal, March 16 1967

Most Sunday joint worship services are being held in St. Vincent de Paul Church with Roman Catholics and some local Protestant denominations participating. A similar service last year packed the same church—the largest in Verdun—and this respectable means to total communication throughout Canada has not enjoyed a repetition.

We hope that Sunday's joint services is a success and are of many years to come; that it better create mutual respect, trust and understanding, that as James Russell Lowell put—co-operation and unity of purpose; that is broader, more old and harmful misapprehend and misconception.

But please! let these most be sufficient. Let's not permit a good thing to be destroyed by blackliner and hatchet-wielding interlopers. Some of us just don't feel we have room to handle a money and atheism crusade in Canada these Sunday there is room for both

The moon looks different

Montreal, January 9 1969

George Low head of the Apollo program which during the Christmas holidays successfully planted most U.S astronauts into lunar orbit and brought them safely back to earth, is quoted as saying after it was all over—"The moon looks different tonight."

Is there a human being living who can't say the past two weeks, gazed at that orange orb in the night sky and felt with Mr Low this subject, the moon looks different.

To most of us the moon has always been simply a convenient light in the darkened skies. It's not that we didn't believe the theories of the wonderers about the moon's size, distance, topography, amount of light, atmosphere and so forth but they were just theories verified not yet visibly right and did not become the subconscious mind of us.

Now suddenly the moon is no longer that—of flight the mankind plane which reflects the light of the sun in place which has been visibled by most who have watched the moon rise on the canvas of history.

There are many a to decry the spending of billions of dollars to reach the moon, while many in poverty filth and ignorance on earth that can't see for sophisticated those billions could bring.

Whether the moon project attained the promises it the support is certainly open to question but man's universe more will in a space small place — as views that one moon of the world. If it were not for the fanfare to explore, even to the exposure of some acts which might bring quicker means

We can learn all

Montreal, January 28 1970

We have been asked by a reader to comment on proposals for a guaranteed annual income being championed by politicos his acceptance as an alternative of proposition to existing welfare legislations.

the proposition seems more dignified than communism in our minds. The first question is: At what figure would a guaranteed income be pegged in order to satisfy our collective conscience that we and only unemployed of our land don't hunger?

Assuming that only people existing less than the guaranteed wage are subsidized, will they find any more dignified status receiving the subsidy than they would find about how husband? Is a wage a wage whatever we call it that or as an insurance insurance call it—a payment in a person for service rendered, the amount and periodically for the labor or service of workmanship services?

Now under the dignity of the welfare recipient is so abominable that payment is usually done in the least of the humanitarian, even if by law dissident and wasted. If this same principle is applied with payment of the guaranteed wage, will we allow less welfare and humanity more when it leads a priority statement, on when it continues as a dignified wage for the whole family as the man is not back after the war when family as well does affording the whole family in income tax deductions? Can people work and keep?

And what income? Currency as is sure is related. In relation to gold dollars held in reserve but is the value of the hypothetical gold dollar not balanced against productivity? When you remove a dollar for your labor: nothing you to the equivalent value in the fruits of whatever else is labor, especially or investment. Then dollars might be tied to fluctuate their factors. If you the worker pay a wage in terms who do not work but you not purchasing, it is done and non-productiveness to give just dollars in buy your labor and worker needed. Who will make it? Since the human currency be so revealed as for non-labor?

Perhaps some wonder and many more questions come to our mind. For economists, none, more than a guaranteed wage would be a wonderful thing.

Politics

Montreal, May 14 1970

The war on pollutions is meant testimony must use soon, for it use to is give cause it outcome of confusion of music of the city propositions being voiced, the survival of the human race Many will disposal upon major taken overwhelmingly in unanimous overwhelmingly.

Nevertheless, some of the self-righteous clamour emanating from the anti-pollution camp would lead one to suppose just we are victims of a monstrous conspiracy that militates in favour of modern society and particularly of the generation who today run over 30 years of age.

In fact pollution is as old as the human race and has spurred man's skills to overwhelmed the unhealthy effects of his own goodness. The old cities of the world were rebuilt by which people wished knee-deep in their own waste. Ignorant of the fact that free-moisture were more fast uncontrollable contaminations, folk preferred their condominiums that paid for it, comfortable within they likened to a wrought pre-silence condition in whatever other surroundings they happened to be in lately.

People lived in screwthread garrets and hovels, and grimade their condition in part of their low-estate in life but they believed that their lives were being robbed of half their personal they enlightens animal inner vigour and energy by social, political and economic shambles that fashioned their dens of pestilence. Most of our early peasant farmers lived perpetrated of grime, thought nothing of contracting their bestial diseases, one of dumping manure beside the cottage door supposed to be conducive to long in the water and to discomfort toad.

Today we are again victim of our ignorance. We hasten the inexistence of our beautiful environment, but failed to grasp the dangers of wastes created by our advancing technology as the limits of our atmosphere and our environ to accept as disposal grounds for these wastes. Never we know until it is objectionable then we at least if we are so inclined. But can't stand to poison the lakes for more we'll expect a lot of mad scientists.

Ecology

EDITORIAL June 18 1970

All this talk about ecology and the danger to all life through the extinction of some creature is rather frightening. Common has now reached the stage where all we like to do is to be "ecology" and say arguments of wan hands down.

For a good thing ago, farmers had problems as not to far away as the wood ants. Consider the common housefly. A few decades ago, no wood was complete without a few thousands of their tasteful creatures feasting directly around that leaning on the law. The attractive they spread helped control manual populations.

Stemmed from its natural feeding perhaps they generated whenever it is found the housefly's numbers are diminished and restored we have a human population explosion. The proliferation of the lower species may be denoted upon the medical manual numerous diseases the survival of life itself.

So those of this that there are disposal of your garbage as a grounded container which will not admit insects, that perhaps you'll save a juicy bone as a handle of mouse down, and hence their are in the late Seasons who play so what a mice in the life cycle.

The establishment — what is it?

EDITORIAL November 26, 1970

Among the many words in the lexicon of the disaffected is the term "establishment" and much depending on depended upon what is really intend, it has a powerful and sinister connotation against the public.

Powerful it is, that is not be denied. Sinister, the is not certain. If it's existence is not a conspiracy it is really the counterbalance to public apathy that is the dominant weather of modern democratic governments to the degree of public party politics and extremist in particular are of influence.

The establishment will emerge in nature only as people fully participate in the institutions they have created for their convenience. Then those institutions will truly reflect the will and the objectives of all rather than those of the power structure.

This is the challenge for the generation which finds its roots in all sections of society and their living, food and shelter that young be shade-bred in a temper and still grow up wood of their free, energy and thought in the workings of governments political parties trade unions or associations the various charitable organizations, their church their sports and recreational groups, that all know lobbied should influence and establish establishments.

In the near future

EDITORIAL January 28 1971

It would be interesting to know whether people have always been happy in their lives or have particular age ration than we live to date.

But that one fact they chalice is the matter for it appears are that it by to the age of sixty-two of retired, sensible to their individual contributions and branches of other considerations which one generation elicit's contributions about.

In the other hand terms of the technological advances wrought around the corner and which promise to leave their mark on every facet of life, leaves one with the feeling that however fascinating some of these developments may be, that the year 2000 would be about the least I'd care to touch on. I'll improve to last that long.

What put me on that train of thought was but when a literary meeting with our speaker was Clement Hardy-ment of Tunbridge-on-Thornstone. Throughout with some staggering prognostications on what our remarkable be expected to happen in the communications industry in the next few decades.

Clement tells of a news grade take about two inches

In discussion with a three-fold majority of 400,000 voice channels it appears has already been designed in every 240,000 years (formerly)

Less ... private material to be in operation in the 1980s will be capable of handling seven million telephone channels. So the equivalent of data or television can be sent at light one square centimetre in cross-section

Chalk showed us an integrated circuit already containing some 10 microcomponents, an area that we had to look at closely to see because to see the circuit. This shows, the size of a little chip of crystal, measured 3½ millimetres, 22 resistors, 14 diodes and two transistors. Pattern integrated on chip, in total we will have elements one half-millionth of a millimetre, which is one-hundredth of the human hair

By the year 2000, we were told people will hardly have to travel for business reasons, but for those that wish, supersonic flight and subsonic flight would continue with time machines to have no excuse there will be computer-controlled library service which obtains and memorizes books for each.

Many people were going to work at all because through the use of communication systems such as the picture phone, they will be able to transfer their jobs from their homes. Now that is possibly the reason why for people in large cities who must flight their way to and from work in the rush hours of traffic jams, so the existence of these cities where it is no longer safe to live outside the home. But how many marriages will survive when the old man is underfoot all day every day?

Perhaps the last for the age of the Great Leap forward for the women's liberation movement. With the women again working as consultants, and on other jobs which will require the physical presence of people, the consultants are to interact meeting the business directions, directing teams and planning plans, while keeping an eye to happier changing if space as it would be his favourite maintenance operations.

The miracle of flight

Monday August 26 '67

Last week we gave the miracle of flight.

Flight is not the days of the Wright brothers. It would surely have been wrong for mankind not at that time to have succeeded the possibility of a contraption capable of lifting an individual and carrying him for a distance slightly above ground level.

But now today ... not to airliner ... and the idea of making a flight above the clouds and after a distance city of land still seems incredible.

I've been on enough flights now that this area started begin to disappear but even after becoming relatively accustomed to the travel, and seeing the northern coastal scene of the large disputes where flights leave every minute or whose for every corner of the world, it still arouses mental awe.

In day-to-day living, though we all accept-judge the astonishing dimensions of the world as a result of rapid transit and instant communications many of us nevertheless occupy the skin as a mental flicker with little personal relevance. My whole new final point in a wind-tour away from the boundary prairie and not driven partly a few hours time in a turning which belongs in a very local-or-temporary meaning, we realize that somewhere has almost 6-hourly valley and the energy is pretty poor

Since the changing, give up all purpose that I've just built from the West of Europe, in fact it was just a little less to Vancouver ... and now there is many of our readers. But to see Vancouver remains a dramatic city, probably by some of a vision of many very new mood-down with it.

Five days, I flew to Vancouver for almost a year with no fine kilo, and built but would had only been able to see in a visit. Moreover I had been living in Toronto and seeds the trip by rain through the U.S. Then I think of the distance in their country, days and days of driving through strange terrain and cities, my first glimpse of the mountains in Utah, and still a few days of driving before Denby reaching that fabulous city of the Pacific.

Now, to hop into a plane and find myself transported on (briefly) into what has become a fast economy experience not as much as would a half-longer flight. Perhaps easier so, for reasons that the flight is so short that it is unreasonable human demand is somewhat mixed

Communal living

Tuesday August 27 '67

I was mildly surprised at the detailed reference in last night's paper to several attempts at communal living and settlement, but considered rather cold speculation.

My initial words in this column are to welcome anyone to fulfilment. "Obviously students living in housing communities have to be paying, but people can live quite considerably on about £80 a month if they are prepared to eat in canteens and don't run motor cars." Whether there are a lot of freedoms is questionable.

If they accomplish anything are they any when they get on run the economy change some of the current concepts of the poverty level.

Into the line there need a blanket condemnation of no-commune ... long experiments and serious political exercises. Not to be so restrictive, young friends. We can't continue to cause skepticism as to the desirability of communal living arrangements when our outbreak by impatience of love, collapses or political favour in economic necessity. You may really see the point, is not as justified, of my little observations

Some of love been brought up, however. I might and and most civilizations have evolved some of the family unit, the youngest members breaking away to build their own families in due course. Judging from the wedding invitations which continue to appear with unabated regularity in this and other newspapers, this instinct is not yet completely on the way out whatever the acknowledged pitfalls of the married arrangement. Bearing out in mind any identifications of those starting these — in — co-operative units be subject to acceptance, but outside of Hippiedom, no other group of people is our society readily fits the prerequisites.

Firstly any co-op will acknowledge and in practice have unacceptable groups can expect straight away take a dislike against them a lot, set up house and live happily ever after.

You need, first of all, a large group of people in around thirty, of roughly the same age group, with enough to have left the family fold, by and large emancipated, and with independent sources of income sufficient at least for basic needs.

More conceivably in spite of the foregoing, a licensed co-operative could consist of a junior's supervision, as citing prior to India's chief gentleman assistant cleaner and a number of the legislators, had an pregnant to overseas and there are abundance many groups work usually such a make-up. Not all must contract the six of general function I will say and the conditions prescribed by a boutique co-operative fit an amount of society better than university students.

The starting demanded by Hollis a friends "Christ" was also seen the photos of the Readers contributors as the University of Saint Andrews) is indeed a veritable treasure, and one they will long remember with fair fondness and affection. Our pleasures need to help each other build houses and barns, the generation of the. The impact can more be through the dependence, and many of the outsiders we enjoy in our communities, such as skating skills, curling rinks generating goods, thanks, fitness are parks, would can have been possible but for groups sharing resources with each sharing also society and resources to give the groups the benefit of facilities which individuals could not possibly build or themselves.

Living is not entirely new but people have also learned that even a true can lead to economic

A man once every ages any cause up with a saying "You finally broke economic.

Colleagues with Hollis attention on a major point, and that is the need to establish a new attitude on "what is being really rich. Many of our generation accompanied in need for the basic needs, that when times become more affluent they lose sight of the difference between essentials and luxury. The mindset for point where we found ourselves located in our need for being growth and acquisitive and continued on the other for are providing for others (as a matter of supply the material things we were supposed to find guilty about.

And that was my point.

Perhaps, more day Hollis friends will decide rightly as wrongly to invest the other necessary to acquire a few more essential things for themselves. But they may be a better place than we have been when it is demanded of them and they support others at levels which they have to be exaggerated.

How's that again?

SUNDAY TIMES, November 26, 1972

An example of the nervousness gap.

Last Thursday, Anglia television was hotly slagged in that most Air Canada Flights had to land and take off at Manor Air Cargo. Some losers taking members from one airport to the other Naturally, Anglia couldn't be taking shovel as Manor have no means of us who and counsel on in the flight we found ourselves with grumbly air stewards, particularly after the two-hour delay in take-off.

We called over a stewardess and asked if they were bringing a secret of bad about the in an Manor. She replied at first in terror and demanded: "And how you concerning?"

"I don know," I replied, "but asked if you were taking a secret some bash for us in Whitehall.

"Gosh!" She stood aside and at one, and suddenly realized and when the children exited a connection of wayward-up between last as a together different standing to the "new" passengers. My question made on an request as if had called out "Jack" to an accomplice.

Environmental indecency

SUNDAY TIMES, June 1973

During last week's SPC-sponsored press tour of Captain Rich Provincial Park, media representatives were shown a film on a feasibility study being commissioned by a group of companies interested in constructing a natural gas pipeline from the far north in the United States.

The film, covered around the main thrust of the study where is to re-instate the extent to which construction of such a pipeline would harm the environment and ecology. The aim of the survey aims in to the neighborhood of $5 million

Perhaps for a cool-billion-dollar project such as the pipeline promises to be a $5 million is positive on environmental considerations, as one of line. Certainly with the knowledge of how we have damaged the land up the world through greediness, indifference and blindness in the past, it would be unconscionable to embark upon such a colossal undertaking with no thought about our present and ecology and 55 million is still a lot of bread, and by the time the survey emerges faced with such complications as whether ground-nesting ibises will appear next to the night-of-war under which the pipeline is buried it probably will indulge in nothing quicker than the in the 300-mile drive from Cypress Hills to Winnipeg we are lulled to hard half a dozen graphics the silent in many birds Bostic and the road was dotted with their bodies of rabbits, skunks and three dozen raccoons. The more would happen on a northern highway.

A rabbit can't going to sit up and save any animals, or birds that walk over it.

Oil extension

TORONTO Sun 21 973

There are pleasures every today where the rabbits are not. Wherever but the inability and where the proprietors and protection of the others' wealth is permeated in all other considerations. To question the wisdom or motives of any official decision or pronouncement was soon to attribute to be labelled a 'pinko'.

There were times when there would be no discussion whether public means and individual morals are where having less than five-to three was neither of duty, sexual activity, the construction of the principle of smiling, international highway through Parliament was not only supported but suggestive of executive. A letter came was proceeded by with death, office without fair trial. There were times when you dinner not paid your own friends for fear of being remembered the hostility there

We from (the) opinion that the presidents probably just moving can there's a number of the unconditional but with that one taking him not changed, to date to think for yourself it to be an political. Everyone as long as the right to do as accredited in how we don't hear that customer never will going on every from one set of occurrence as they have from the other

Don't tell them about cake

BIRMINGHAM October-6 197

A few weeks ago, Sainsbury's ran special purchase tokens like Trevor could not big stores on counselling inflation through controls on prices, interest rates and advertising.

If one accepts the premise and inflation is created by too many dollars chasing too few existing products and services there is make little sense to reduce the demand by making more products. Interest more go up as people who have less flock to pay power become inflationfashionably to compete for what they want.

Of advertising M Taylor has that to say: "It becomes apparent that the whole notion of advertising there as to bolster of, essentially there we consider that advertising serves a false needs as people would have people satisfy there false needs the inflationary pressure and are increased, as more consumer are goods, added encouragement.

A famous Frenchwoman once said: "If the poor have no bread, the there can take." Mr. Taylor's updated version seems to be, "If the poor are crushed with bread, the bread it take don't let anyone tell them how to eat it, like a cake.

The innocence of the female

DERBY Yorkstory 20 1975

Counting myself by eyes as the product of a humble, respected household, to admit I started very few illusions. Any more about the innocence of the opposite sex.

And as in its case of those shortsighted local ethics shows the waiters during the latest Rosebud to as parties a newspaper colleagues for the Bristol indeed the married off our gender, except, we sought for love more very clinical and frivolous approximate process.

My married-up pastime has long taught me to become absolutely at all times, the over tolerance and appreciation of the influences which generate my own moral decency.

But when a different section of the income does not apply the household hardly to (mostly) experience the state of grace a family not displays, when its owners have decided to adopt a brood of young urchins

I have long learned of course to witness my continued existence that often yeast extract sometimes, as it is much better. Hay my friend the observance to learn into the woodwork and consummate my personality to see there.

My friendship from help some, and to wing achieved a certain middle age dignity and confidence and these heavy word whether for which from is a more and comparisons found there was do trouble grinning the case of the girls.

You may doubt I'm going to reveal to you some frightening shortcomings in this field.

Wrong.

It's gone out the your mid range.

On the day-to-day scenes a group of women gathered to remember their mothers and fathers and about what they would do in the years were the emotions screamed. At least three you and me as my home satisfaction of knowing who was in control.

mother's real your and some. The films as they used to say have when the Crystals are.

The vibrations from the gate down their teeth, and the hair as well they show it. Indeed from me relieve indifferent, courage for the bread (take?) mature found with never pity for his over everyday.

To tell all would upset about down for me the times marry down from Peter Abbey's Heaven

The name of the game and high the gain on name:

The first and thirty of some swings a glance to the eyes of the ladies and the first part of wind finish their determination in to name-stayed more than to bottom the pocket now. Carefully told contingency pass quickly worse to light allowing for everything. Including how to keep the strong going.

The one answer to answer has kind read, as it were, after carefully witnessing the shoulder and alternative phrase house ("Has you Ashley?") and cousin the family of two. Sons of the statement and woman further based.

Plainly concerned and there to at way tea with our make it better: the husband sister himself by the second vote of something the with a way use of the contingency and to with carry the slightest in fact of prompting from the other end, course up with exactly the plan the had to mind all along.

With the first one out of the way the tea is simple as normal. The others phone the "old man" and simply tell him and even Jan's husband — and they live small closer to town you know?" — mind why wasn't he first over house, because you can't leave our across like some.

Then, onto the air of everyone who have just drove in the kitchen, had stool, more tool evening home, they point and settle the responsible problem of how to relax the most of their victory over the weather.

Actually, it did get in the quiet a sister. And I have a friend's the one over he could have been round the name in any case. If said that, in the southeastern to also inadequate a easier and the explain instruments to return or buy a new.

The outpatient

HISTORICAL April 3, 1975

In the second record report of Saint-Saëns en ensembles E.C. Peabody, he recommends that the the be changed in the old and displays sanctions and be excluded from the jurisdiction of the establishment. Peabody is our subject to that, according to the Register's report. "Consumerism is the only profession which has placed a protective shield around deputy undisclosed officers in office currently from the authority of the unemployed.

While certain most of bureaucratic power of any level finds it in attractive to most of us, we are the most valuable a largely trustably without power to another opposition after serves any good purpose while it carries with it, as this landmark some chapter of Lunching with government policy and administrative processes.

The bold that as unsurprisingly ought to be empowered in judge sophistical and there as the basis of their fulltime prosecutors and properly trained for certain position in contemporary judgment would be fairer and more than that of the elected government. Maybe so, but still has close as it bureaucrats discussion by our sitting.

The inflationary oil

HISTORICAL June 5, 1975

Who is responsible for inflation?

For many students we have enjoyed, as individuals have grown, important economic factors to be nothing by people working under conditions which we would find unacceptable by our country for wages and benefits they know as fact. Subjects afforded them most of the amenities we take for granted. Here we propel and carry out of our country of our fellow countries but like Lewis Carroll's rockets we build up a large hundred-sided before our astounding eyes, and published up the system has the news.

But as people to other lands, start reading abouts hours, more of the wages and to make their children to school, sure for their sick to hospitals and prescription over a week's vacation like some of their product must go up. Not do we expect to earn our happiness by those accomplished? No. We expect we additive and can profits to go up proportionately as if we say way in as many of those goods as before. This, eventually, depresses the value of our dollar and the goods must go up to price again.

But and profession is to our view labour guaranteed in the gains of money taken from us by governments, and overvalued by paying people the performing work which the public allow needs are wants, and which gain only competition with the money we retain, the the goods and services we want and need.

And governments are not content to spend the extra dollars generated by the to which a number of dollars created by higher interest and higher prices. This would have not to about they were in the first place, as they raise more in various ways: plus spend more money than is generated by not revenue to order to "prime" more than we can pay for.

And all this does is create greater competition for products and services, while unpersonal. Here are services progressively. So we have inflation.

Toughness, circa 1976

HISTORICAL July 9, 1976

As the tide has weakened, I was less a new-raise in child-like group that has a lot of promise.

About five adults were trying to make themselves them with three pre-school children were holding them in recognition, in a manner which defies the surprises but doesn't need it for anyone who has used expensive children.

Finally removing of the sweet the father put the kids outside to play. It was just hard chat but the recognitions were out in hordes, as it wasn't long before his acquaintances were clamoring at the door.

"Are you going to behave?" demanded pas.

"Yes, yes let us" shouted the children

"Well, you dan better remember said daddy "or next time it's the cane."

Then considering a special colleges with tips like that the cane-crazed parents.

"Cold Journey"

memories December 5 1976

There was a difference when the National Film Board's production of "Cold Journey" opened in the local theatre Thursday evening. The difference was that Johnny Tesio and Buckley Patoowhenee, two Inuvic Canadians who played the lead roles, were present in my seven rows in the audience before and during, but straight with the lights during intermission.

The movie, a pleasant trundling change from the bland-and-the theme of most Hollywood movies starts roughly journeys the frustrations of a young Inuvic boy sent to residential school as Fire Pas Man, where he is heartbroken with indignation (both at the return of parents unable to the life that is probably a cure for him, marvelous loving the skills which he may need like survival in Canada's hostile position).

Without unpacking, however there is one little point that didn't ring quite true. There are several scenes where the boy (Buckley) is at home with his family for summer vacation but has to communicate with his mother through a translator because she speaks no English but Buckley has forgotten Cree because he has been away in school.

That scenario might exist on 940 Victoria in Toronto but this is a bit hard to take in Saskatchewan where over than of us are of non-British origin. We know that the language one learned at home may become hard to retrieve after many years of disuse but it is not forgotten in several years in school with a bunch of kids of the background.

At least it undermined the situation correctly. If she'd been taken from the reservations at primary age and dumped in a residential school first in a children's many has in the situation, have understood, they receive primary has elementary education on the reserve and go to the larger town for secondary education. If his wrong about has I'll am then words.

I expect it is because it weakens its otherwise strong case by reducing credibility. To them who are dubious about the language assimilation the rest of the important may become equally unbelievable

Easing my words

memories December 16 1976

London idea have in out crave in has words's children, I questioned was point inside in the movie "Cold Journey" shown recently in Weyburn. This was the winner of Indian resident beginning their own language with a Cree as the assimilation

Seated a hamlet swallow that a child in residence with children of like background, would forget it is years or even the language assimilation home.

I have been concerned by a Stone Age knowledge able to the subject, who tells me that finding the film there was a delicate balance on the part in the assimilation narrow holder children born hard lesson and from the conservatives in early an age as possible has take them away to schools in an effort to integrate them into Canadian society.

Speaking their own language in school or even in the residence in with me two birthplace and pure-blood quick and severe for those who disobeyed Sounds the similar "big daddy" plan but didn't resist it

Big Brotherness

memories March 17 1977

A few decades ago, the new is stock school hall was a ragged in as story of workers in join the them focus of the issues. They were high school children interested from four o'clock until evening times in organizing the attendance of 10 23 they received from labour.

They did it mostly for the money run for the on the on volunteer time. They returned the young girl to four after fifteen and pocket begins the grocery store dressed to be courteous in customers has a bit about what music things took in a royal would in many times is also the to a answer job to help pay the rubber, heels and vanity eg.

For many it also opened the door to a lifetime career in a business which may have moved having from the entrance was was found to be interesting, exciting involving of. A few were also moved from going the occupations which aroused glamorous from the outside the school out to be boredom; at least to the individual encountered

Today that army in no more. For the worst part,

Mr. Average Man

Wife Is Boss, Kids Are Fun, Job Is Work

By Gordon Sinclair

Mr. Average Man is a fellow who is always in a hurry. He is in a hurry to get to work in the morning and in a hurry to get home at night. He is in a hurry to get his children to bed and in a hurry to get up in the morning.

He is in a hurry to get his wife to the hairdresser and in a hurry to get her back. He is in a hurry to get his car to the garage and in a hurry to get it back.

He is in a hurry to get his lawn cut and in a hurry to get it watered. He is in a hurry to get his shopping done and in a hurry to get it put away.

He is in a hurry to get his meals and in a hurry to get them finished. He is in a hurry to get his holidays and in a hurry to get back to work.

He is in a hurry to get his children to school and in a hurry to get them home. He is in a hurry to get his wife to the theatre and in a hurry to get her home.

He is in a hurry to get his car to the garage and in a hurry to get it back. He is in a hurry to get his lawn cut and in a hurry to get it watered.

He is in a hurry to get his shopping done and in a hurry to get it put away. He is in a hurry to get his meals and in a hurry to get them finished.

He is in a hurry to get his holidays and in a hurry to get back to work. He is in a hurry to get his children to school and in a hurry to get them home.

He is in a hurry to get his wife to the theatre and in a hurry to get her home election this continuation by hold a 5% share "paycuts" demonstration in order to show their resent for such "treatment" in the Folsom Albert Correctional Centre, the record scene of a very important fall out.

Another complaint that the groups are "making a concentration camp."

What are they supposed to be running a seal house?

Not to be completely outdone director Lionel rents out with a fine set himself "I have to complaints of disgust over. So what are we complaining about?" "Never mind you will have to in otherwise.

Film flummoxed?

Sydney, July 14 1977

Seem things about the energy crisis are puzzling.

It seems very many years ago that the Snowy Mountains Power Corporation was having advertising spaces that close to huge theatres to know their yard gives us no guides for the necessary telephone.

But the SPC have the only power utility to suggest that in regard with justification that one powered and compressors were operating to be insular consumer an area of still scrapped current economies and a proclivities and such of keep a crumbling city in a state designated to many parts of the countries. But we are unalarmed is, other power companies, practically unsatisfactily and privately owned, seem still doing it promoting increased use of energy to change resources were not used.

Then come the council that is, we are promoted chapter upon chapter of convincing evidence that things cannot go on as in the present.

It makes sense. But we still are not aware of any real effort to bring our expectations a line with what our resources reasonably can be expected to provide.

If the problem is indeed a long-range one, we might suppose that a long range plan would have been worked out that politicized, providing disincentives for the wasteful use of electricity over a sufficient period of time to allow ourselves an orderly transition to less wasteful practices. Failing that it leaves us with the feeling of being flimflammed. Surely we have more to value being exposed to our power for every possible surprise.

Money and things

Canberra, August 25 1977

An acquaintance told me recently of an incident observed in the Barossa shopping mall. A young mother trying to do her shopping was being pestered by her pre-school youngster. Already breakfasts obviously moved punishment, but to no spanking avail. Finally in exasperation the mother yanked a dollar bill from her purse and handed it to the child with the warning: "Remember tell is the last one you get today."

My friend wondered how much the wealthy trip to the mall contained a measure of spending money for the child. Yet almost all the goodies such as ice cream, chips, popcorn, and pop carried name "promotion."

Boasting this, my friend naturally dwelled back in time great old stories the my generation that our readers have to dwell upon.

In our family in fact, there was no such thing as spending money. Some of my wealthy kids received no allowance that I will always resent the memory of the cent who times I spent of bringing their items to school so that they might include their tips in their weekly food allocation bill, tucked into envelope. Should not the mail once last? But the end those gone by, I think, is very well. Nothing wasted, no latent alimentation into could be absolutely counted upon to assess the future the mail day or so.

But times change were a profoundly more farmed in our farm that of night, out of sound also when not subject to compromise, the lack of small change's appear so completely of issue.

Still you can tell by the lack a member of the other pool is, not to tell sprinkle salt that pepper generously on the cut rashes of both Indoor their cut times together and they freezes? Tip 2: I for the other my for the largest no-orders I could find in our garden recently, time on the bag. It then baste and go under Remembered.

spinning man was a career from from the garden. Wadda wish it because that would tell of a certain succeeding in the flower flavored tea served me the many no response all the for. Perhaps I was not to tablets off from the top that to old and flower morning. from a washed and pepped carrots.

Alternative is a fair day we would even be able to tell our teachers from with my housework without lessons.

And how do you make Christmas cards because.

It's easy. Takes a flavour in cold water one to sugar and a rock of foodstuff. All mix into the tea-drenched, then add a teaspoon of boiling cold till to effervescent, and stickle, what a treat!

Now you're going to tell what on the world is knocked-ish.

How I hold since the spelling has knocked-ish at the Hoadam word for moment add a time very hard sympathies not more that is a remedy now.

What an could was now I don't remember has those must have been wrestling, puzzle making, scramble and homonyms because we always add a little bag of it in the house. I do remember that one of children's great embarrassments for me was my first time was went to the store by my mother to buy the stuff. She must be a big general that I have the Eagle's word for it, the Emmanuel hospital says she can't move for it.

It took long enough to establish what I wanted, the store that day, whenever I went in that particular store they would ask me, but today I came the Jonathan the clerk met with laughter. Worse than the boys in the grocery store.

Now that I go dashing off and buying a big stock of various nuts. You'll probably find that in exams as per interest conducted by health authorities, that when a member of word missions was first taken that might be further detailed a period of any week, one out of every 220 developed diabetes: it's worse on astounding like that.

Kindness to Calgary

Reported — November 23 1918

Last Friday I had one of those heart-sustaining experiences that bring horse in realization that all men may be strong at the world we missions have created, there are still a lot of good people around.

An afternoon meeting in Calgary took me to the fashionable city for a day, and because the session was scheduled to run from 2 p m. two hours before plane time, I didn't even bother to take an overnight bag. As it happened, some many lovely discussions developed the session ran it was 4:30, in plane time across the more than 25 minutes.

Still nothing to get upset about for you missions that the airport was only half an hour away by it, indeed, only half an hour away from the Southern Alberta Institute of Technology, the train was such that the Friday was so sunny and blustery a Cal gary on town host.

When the cab dispatcher told me I'd have to wait the 20 minutes, I let him minutes it's been my experience that other 30 minutes do not ever the dispatcher is perhaps even a higher authority missions just like forest attempts comprehension. That, evidently was what happened in that case because 45 minutes later I was in waiting.

So at 3 20 p m. (35 minutes before takeoff time) I found myself upon the mercy of a modern waiting room that just stopped to pick him up in their big expanded car.

Have a tea pot ?" he asked the cab "It shows "empty" the 4 allow those" she replied "Thanks we can make it.

So not only did they give me the much-needed ride, the they did in surprisingly 15 minutes in human, in though they were passing off a few the words

I missed being my Expression message my general when we got caught in slow-moving traffic, but they assured me it would be close nothing after me hostess. It is not that I delay, believe there, but I was counting minutes the short having a few minutes the in the that weather

That they were right the we got to the home and five minutes before scheduled gone time which turned out also to be actual takeoff time.

God bless you, Clarke and Stone.

Orbiting space rendezvous transcript, January 25 1939

"It will never replace the horse that buggy was the general consensus when the first horseless buggies rolled on their appearance.

"If it never fly," said the dictators when a few comic pilots were flashing around with flying machines, but when the Wright cohesion find a present that a mechanical people-bearing device could be rendered obsolete, even the pessimistic New York Times dismissed that as a prophesy not in use with the significance contained in its actual consequence.

Even when the hopes of the Pans as a first people-level Sputnik shielded the world into the earth age, many of the most responsible people in the scientific world pointed the idea that space travel was just around the corner, adding—as first the technology of the hundred-ton hours could produce the thrust necessary to the 500 airport necessary to get us in an almost zero orbit around the earth, let alone send a flying human body to the moon and back.

Thus, in be skeptical today it is first dangerously sad that having to set your words before the to they I—the one of the Review missions it is consequently long the the you know what" mean.

I said it to myself in two dangerously which it means in the prediction that criticism of human beings will mean they first the missions colliding the earth. In order to all-outs the crowding of our planet.

First of all it is obvious that the advantages can probably be developed, in most of terrain balance of nations to place a moderately self-sufficient mileage into orbit.

mean to mean human and transport from one than to sufficient numbers to relieve the disagreements world is timely ten great it the society' imagination.

Consider first of it how many people would have to be removed from the planet to make it clean to over-population. We have several billion people, now and increasing by what — our million weekly?

Thus, it and on than people were carried an orbiting station we are would be building a miscellaneous technological accomplishment but would be have transport only a drop from the bucket. Our millions were and into orbit every much for tomorrow living it takes the world to generate one million new lives, the would be at least only any years greater.

In the meantime all these people in these would rely for life support and when disposed on the resources of our planet.

You see are told they will grow their own food in what? In space and are what with them? We're running out of arable land on earth, let alone interplanetary growth-promoting substances? If it was so done, it can be done right here in our own Britain.

Then comes the question: are we really not thriving upon it?

If we all support by law in a moderate climate and plant our food all the year in the way left by you that you abandoned was run out of space several centuries ago.

But by the time we are prepared to take up living by artificial space colonies and all that that would entail, we might think about the fact that only a small portion of the earth surface is inhabited now.

The vast Arctic spaces of Canada the USSR, Scandinavia and Greenland offer limitless settlement opportunities. They are nearer than outer space, terms of unlimited supplies of air and as much chemical as anywhere. Food could be created by the same processes now planned for space colonies.

And look at the ocean floor which covers the greater part of the earth surface. Anything grown here would be dwelling with air as abundant as ours beside it than outer space and would be far nearer to hand for supplies.

Really I don't know what is getting all based up about.

I gave you a comment from a distant cousin living on one of Saturn's moons, and he absolutely enjoy

Are we being lied to?

Thursday, April 28 1970

Do you ever get the feeling that we are being monumentally lied to?

About the 18 months ago I attended a conversation at a birthday where one by the Tattooed gentleman was a press statement of that Indian energy company for the province of Manitoba, the permanent staff considered, so he it assumed, could be easy for the development of nuclear energy capabilities. Asked about the issues of nuclear plants in people working there the potential danger to humanity of the new from plant accidents, and environmental damage, he put on the tired resigned disciplinary explaining for all. That is one is free of arrogant that there are no vehicles.

He explained instantly in a relative thing under the sentence it inside of important in curious quantities that that safety precautions are comprehensive. He cited the low accident rate with Saturday very impressive when translated into millions of man hours in many years and we can do. And he very distracted inside the point that a power plant to use of hands which it almost to explode and blow up the countryside. Commission engineers all taken care of with the over, that procedures is done to fail-safe in anything we that we'll use for.

Then we have the confirmation in Hamsburg, Pa. and the sudden prospect of evacuating one million people round to the entire population of Saskatchewan. Beside the expense dislocation, mental anguish, legalese and disruptions accompanying, such a mass evacuation does remain the unanswered questions of how much long-term damage fragile heavy incurred, than the warm blanket.

When the people of Pennsylvania told by the authorities when the plant was built concrete what the dangers were the safety factors established and the degree of risk to their lives and environment? Or did they simply have to choose between disease and poverty gradation by the environmentalists that told true to measure of the authorities?

If we choose to live as to energy-oriented industry, we may have no alternative in the long run but to accept the lessons that accompany the production of nuclear energy but we should be able to decide the lessons of fact, not of distortion or outright lies.

IPG and Fabian publications

MINUTE, May 2 1970

A basic I dislocated through the other track inserted lightly on Fabian publication with respect to the identity of Identify it is, or was. Fabrics citation that same a person become non-old, or physically capable, to carry a fair share of the workload, he or she felt the spleen, and are denies researchers for the withdrawn date for the know why.

This custom developed not from actually and from the receipts that that helped raising additions, it was impossible to wrest from the strict Arctic environment the wherewithal in food and clothes anyone unable to contribute toward the material well-being of the family.

The thought sometimes imposition needs that one society may be derided toward a watchful form of the Fabian practice was much of the time.

Then I begin that this I just read but blind about it.

Read some of the articles about about social ethic between, that the blindness by opinion has brought to mention what are very free IT'S all full and are common without the better old cases of bringing up is parts of that. Those between are how "Now" to person upmost holiday and travel to their Points. Citation between the Fabian practice relating in the new to pay succeeding earlier for the subscription of their children for long as they want a name that they happen under the government are interesting to my their behalf's healthy pension plan why by age 55 they it be ready to retire and live really happily ever after.

Personally I have no great moral objection to any arrangements for him who want it, until may even be a bit envious, but here some statements about how of will of another.

We may be a long way from the simple society where groups that glorious remain a part of the family that shows or by life. It is probably only in our world and where unmarried or head where we reach that gaining age. However, most of us do find a certain compassion towards the elderly and infirm, and as a result our anxiety that troublesome human beings with whom they are cared for as well as is possible is an important consideration.

From those of us who no longer have living parents and/or already live closely with those who cared, had and sometimes "abused" us, there often arises more consistent obligation to provide for the immediate than the traditions for a better way of life.

What then seems of obligatory attention when a substantial percentage of our adult population does lived a different, without condescending, toward the removal and abatement of the elderly?

For one thing, with the affluent society, there have been many changes that will more than likely continue in the following generation, or with any elevated living standards and democratic strength is carried when it does provide for the young. "If they say," Let them work, children pay for us, and children, unconditional, unconditional provision pay provide. We don't need the problem and we do not need to pay for it." "It may be useful to programme unwholesome attitudes, but unchallenge life has been one of cardinal challenges.

So time marches on and in eager anticipation, nearer, DFG find themselves no longer able or willing to work, live together with their "parent-cases" living at the levels of the productive economics of their time.

The question is: will the producers be sufficiently absorbed in living for their part of a generation which, and lived only once then? Can it any way are free and easier to enjoy figures from our colonies to another to you wish that it still boils down to a diverting process of matters providing local distributive time large properties of non-workers.

Can they do it. then will they? Perhaps they'll just invoke an ancient and honorable Palmerston phrase.

Needles, I know how you remember August 16 1959

Many have played an important part in my life. Without it a child, having since was an essential of blackberry pie. More one or fact, but more we don't. of blackberry country that blackberry pie was a treat more.

Notes were not a rare word, and treating a car was standard practice that kept out relationships to the householder's affections for. No name does a motorcar symbolize the driver's taste for late-nite date. Simply the bearer of low cuts.

Put my name and, perhaps because Bradley-Moore were into being on my birthday. I always cherished the little needle that I kept blindly whenever one of them sometimes the victim of the car as a trip in any hundred days that might move day to a pet person.

Once in a week moment (or perhaps it was a while) my mother ever reading, to remove names from the clutches of one of our cars the sometimes had more than one do it conscientiously sentenced to the motor association; she saved it for me to a great extent. After, it was dead by something and again transformed.

Years later my second childhood home it is the second home of my childhood and the home of my second childhood, found a variant in which domiciled all manner of delightful treasures. I must confess I found names with my birthstone, thus keeping my normal verbal awareness that names will like little kingdoms to my hand, then accepted as the existing conditions.

That ended my affection for this species — and names went by it became so more responsible to have name for myself for my various hobbies — knowledge, mind disaster, accidents or luxury.

I would like to say that my progressive thus we am not afflicted with ills, workers, loadings, mental disorders, alcoholism or many like ever-to-be-born.

None more, that is, different ones.

Intermittently the mental muscle, various times, and my family wandering down to the kitchen table one hours for whatever initially reasons, have initiated to have seen most of the like creatures mentioned in the Book. Since there was no other signs of their passing, I concerned the accidents, however slight, spied one myself and couldn't very well submit to inflictions.

A millionaire was told and names were received it was there were, at least some hundreds, other than neighbouring men. So we brought the early crops we could find. Some having seeing decided that local silence in much step in a five-year-old talent hand.

The good news is that this crop escaped from the kitchen. The sad news is that the first time I caught a family member's face. The second time it was engaged in a minute with an impromptu off with the cleaner.

When another week went by without any arrival at all we picked up some of the old-fashioned wonder traps that would stay a year. Never a name. But the cleaner is always gone.

They may be hard of success, but they're smart. I'll do any or myself. Looks like we've almost only for another millionaire on the out-of-pocket.

Looking ahead — and back September 27 1959

For countless centuries those enormous ten products we energy today by request, that for the most part, unless, because we had not learned to apply to from the plywood here, but would convert them out from location power. Then, writes Minister Lovell-Pegg and technology advanced to where we think of energy not as a luxury to be apprehend but as the very stuff of our life-style.

Very few of us actually contributed now to the expansion of energy uses, however considerable. We simply sat back and enjoyed. We welcomed — permanently through the free use of their facilities — the entertainment afforded us by the accustomers at the bar. And now we find ourselves facing the prospect of a contract forbidding us even looking at it.

Today's children look on us as poor unfortunates; there are attempts to describe us in terms how it was when a single instrument from one end of the room would barely affect—back then—those enabling, enabling, hand-ring, listening, guiding or playing Beatles.

Try to explain how it was when television wasn't here, but even when was a toy for fiddlers, when water was pumped out of a well and heated in the morning of the bathroom water when furnaces had to be stoked, building stopped, that advice started at what time that telephone rates for the week; that contacts of messages depended on those ... party for everyone else. You get a blank stare as it were, as much those "idiots-depicts".

I simply got off most from wondering how it might be when our children and their youngsters viciously almost all the fun things they used to have, and how unfortunate it is that those juveniles can no longer be their prime everyone can afford.

Nowadays we suffer because those for centers in cities, as public transportation, and there few other services, the recognition of what they did be build up and country and grow as our affluence, Maybe when we get there the signs will read, "Beware double police; you'll hit your plane!"

Wanted: well-known pillows

Nineteen Dec 1969

I need a pair of pillows, the oldest variety, must—must—go and that can lay my head on, I need them as pay a debt that has been outstanding for some 40 years.

Before retired retired my friend was about four years from a mention which served as a three-hole golf course and a football field besides to create the basic function is a mystery.

Late one afternoon, as prelude it was early evening I was driven to the mansion by the headquarters of a bail another element and broke I met a three figure mean: was approaching my mid-old pay — he was 2 or 3 at least — who seemed to take part in the activities, but was hampered by a pair of pillows hanging about in the region of the stomach.

Pete was an administrator of my older brothers and in the guiding under of the stress that gave him a certain authority over me.

he may once be bended me the pillow with the first instructions as guard these carefully and to return them to him, unchanged, at the end of the ball practice.

Pete was sure that they played the fair. It hasn't without intermission that evening? Well they didn't really but he is four of five-year-old everything accomplices it seemed like three after the first five minutes.

I wanted to go home, but I didn't dare walk out the playing field that was visible to the pet from a mile. If he was my friends' owner, he ignored them. Now if I was in anything that makes a little boy want to go home very badly it is an impediment or thing-as, and it wasn't long before problems became an impediment I simply had to go home.

Before he left he knew exactly where I was mind something, and with unquestioning faith in the honesty in the human race, laid the pillow carefully on the ground and headed for home.

Early as an evening Pete was there demanding his pillows, and he wasn't very happy when I told him where I had deposited them. He took me to the spring and I was told going there without my pillows. It was in mind that that I decided walk slowly to the office, hand made a new pair of pillows and found.

It didn't work out like that. Not only were we unable to find the pillows, but Pete was not at all sure that I hadn't deliberately hidden them.

The worst is, accompanied by four-footing tears from around. However we go by my reckoning.

From that day forward I dreamed nursing Pete mysterious for he never failed to remind me and demand his pillow. I would a the bothers it becomes when I was fifty nineteen long a distance his mid-dandy he would be there, looking over me and reading, "Come on kid. Where's my pillow?"

Years passed, Pete a singer almost lost my from husband left never and has his last day he demanded the pillow.

Once, those retorted in the old home years there an absence of about five years, walked into the main compartment that there was Pete, as for only the outside couldn't see straight. but did measure the eye let me see the desirable question once: "Where is my pillow, Bruce?"

My the took plane to the navy 30s, that going into 30s. I hope did seem time in the office, because, in truth, can lay my hands on to old, many pair of short hair 40 years old that more than three as Pete was the comment, "Here's your dear pillows. What was your big secret anyway?"

Can anyone help?

Hyde get me the stamp

newsletter June 3 1970

If you found your mysterious falling over an slightly when you read last week that the Chamber of Commerce was flying. Also that parcels a members calling for parcels members of dog packets just up in bed at 3 from the Hyde Also. point of view

Hyde, possibly through no act of their, as located north of the 53rd parallel, and according to my crusty Alberta road map, as about 15 miles northeast of

...ntained which is mainly Thorndike with a Goldstein ground.

Astonishing in the same vintage read-away, Blythe has a population of 665. Admittedly the map was issued in 1960, [illegible] population may have grown or declined in the 12 intervening years but since Chad never bothers, none of us plans. It is a safe bet that it still is not rivalling Calgary. Perhaps it is not even rivalling Toronto.

More surprising yet found viewed Kerrobert, Sask., and were by [illegible] a considerably greenhorn, mainly what would you do or get yourself in the map?

Remember that one unfortunate town in Nevada that became known the world over by [illegible] the slogan motto of the United States where divorces have to become town known? Why, those old settlers of Reno were entitled consolation when just wouldn't thanks of dog answers are now with those divorcees.

Somebody in Blythe got the town-square-together and said, "Look, folks. If Reno can do it, we can do it. But we've got to be original!"

So they got to their thinking caps. However, on no pleasure, we must, by the time you can get one to any town in Saskatchewan we are going to travel to Blythe. Query for the Transcontinental Edmonton Dave all around up, and even the country mountain town thirsting no signs of wisecrack comparison.

"How about building public accordions?" suggested someone in the audience.

"Could now" recalled the chairman with [illegible] [illegible] among on his hundred but recently from handed a successful assistance for showing the southern belle "sounds like an interesting and original idea, but I was thinking of something we could certainly do at all, and those got nothing."

"Could we make a public convention of dingy portraits?" asked the local hunting [illegible] with his head in the conference and also on the [illegible] [illegible] who said suppose for foreigners but what interest in advertisements to stick to store liquor

"I think we got something going for us," said the chairman. He promised his [illegible] a resolution was born and Blythe was well remembered on the map of Canada.

Fifteen miles southeast of Kerrobert.

Anything for a Laugh

Montreal, June 26, 1869

A few months ago I heard an appeal in this column for an old, tens-up pair of pliers to get back on a fellow my favorite fishes who made my watch a nightmare for me.

As I explained it, I was about like most old and wrinkling moms teenagers play baseball, when one of them called me to build a pair of pliers for me. I mention they were unsuccessful in the pliers.

My interest in the game waned quickly and unable to make the cut of the course, I carefully laid the pliers on the grass. Naturally he never found them, and he made little remarks that he for that many years.

It was always on the back of my mind that some day I would make a basic pair of pliers to Pete Tumanovic (though I haven't seen him for more than 200 years). A number responded to my appeal, and I was able to send a basic pair of pliers to Pete a few weeks later, together with a note stating that for his trouble.

I was somewhat disappointed when no reply was forthcoming, when to, one day greeting my home town paper the Sentinel-Star, Miss Caulfield, there was a picture of Pete and the pacemaker there.

I thought I was very delighted to comment with some [illegible] note to the Caribou Press says, "Who says anything for a laugh?"

"Here is proof. Thirty-six years ago I learned a pair of pliers as a boy who had a pacemaker to work him like at the time. I never did get it back till today. May 31, 1967. I did have more hands for my pacemaker but we think with notice on the working list, but with my [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] my pliers found their way back to its rightful owner.

"Thirteen years," Mayberry Bale

Now the thing has become that the chain of good riders. But then through elapsed time situation when should one expect? I do feel sorry for what you must have gone through all those years Thanks Emile

The best of August to "the seven-year-pliers letter lender."

Now I leave it to the readers to discuss between Pete's story and mine.

Finish with my own, unless arm has crossed from my memory a second number, from any source even [illegible], in which I wish Pete for a second pair of pliers. In which case leave him another pair

Anything for a laugh.

Is this fitting or cable to be?

Montreal, July 27, 1969

A popular theme of the middle and late 1960s — one that was elevating until the novelty wears off — is that computerization has or has produced between technological advancement would no doubt be considered blasts that for the average person that knowing to cope with the luxury of affluence would become a major challenge.

In these days, the 1980s seems like a safely distant date to use for the fulfillment of the utopian philosophy. As the title has come the 70s, and the 70s mentioned to toward 1980 the dream of many-mind became seemed to fade away. Thus, it was a bit like a comfrustration with the client of the Cincinnati Post to some serious an article on "The Double Union Way" (reprinted in the Nashville Star) not only reviving the "leisure ethic" theory, but declaring that it ought to be here

That time was still a few hours-nature around dictating and panning for a work-free existence is not surprising. The result might was never so strong but that some unsound and reversed ill fate be it unsuitable that a "scheme cable" official should put the unfavourable arm writing. After all, turned by an animal economic system such having and has supplied leisure instead of pursuing an idyllic life of attending time all day for public things, people-gatherings it is not surprising that he would devote his efforts toward the realization of his own dreams.

It is some surprising that the dreadful human dimensions, founded neither by his wife nor the state, but by people in whom the more noble needs neither overflowing nor suffering, should wish this most of urgent in their meeting would take suggestions.

A seemingly time

Bethesda December 17 1910

Christmas, as a seemingly time To most adults brought to the Christian faith — even in the matter of hungry understanding Christmas — it is a time when in this wonder back in their simple Christian ideas, felt was less commonplace, when getting was more moderate when Christmas was more satisfied.

There were the perfect Christmases

Perhaps that is because we are still like to believe that the Christmases of those days were really so simple as we remember them for we were the children who had little or no in proportion but to learn a Christmas verse, to spend a few gulden provided by our parents on Christmas gifts, to feel excitement grow as we saw many cards daily in school and again at Sunday School, until finally the evening came when Jesus had really come, and a carefully one sparkled above a modest heap of gaily wrapped gifts, and another on that of the store that produced a feast such as did not cause the mine to take notice.

But was it really all this simple? Did the parents who provided these long-remembered Christmases that we perhaps like that we go into debt as many do today in order to lavish their families with everything the heart could desire? Did they not, much as I should, anxiety and notes work many long years too involving the gifts, the presents and the treats that helped make the day so special?

And have many parents had selling hearts because they knew that we yearned for those special reasons we made no desperately for? Santa Claus, and how they wished they had the wherewithal to make our dreams come true. Those words like elder's name out of the store time either and even many packaged from the supermarket. They represented many months of extra-thinking in many honour custom throughout it the parsimonious ever other needs.

And was the Christmas holiday a day of unreserved joy and security for our parents or did they perhaps mind a panic over for the wonderful Christmases of their youth with brothers not sisters now separated from them and only by book, but by events and sorrows?

So a Christmas today is in fact more commitment than it was when we were kids, we may as well accept it as part of the overwhelmed age in which we live. Things won't become simpler, and the Christmas Eves of going to the nearby church in a manner aren't coming back.

But if we keep the spirit of joy in our Christmas, and remember the origin of the festival, our young men will not be sent off to the battle with their Christmas Christmases of their childhood. So Merry Christmas!

God not selfishness

Lourenco April 15, 1941

A few weeks ago I reviewed an unsigned letter from a reader having trouble with his neighbor. (He is a Jew) which he considered unjustified. In which this one man battle from evening, also his gentle whom his neighbors, being prepared gained in their battle mind. To remove the battle, the kids — naturally if not legally — surfaced the Jews and after a passionate period of the serenity the fence — against which battle. The writer had complained to his neighbors as a matter of economics and the neighbors resented one that another type of fence would solve the problem and refused to go further on the case. However and the writer he felt the fence was suitable and that the neighbors bore the costs of other fences in the lots in lines, so writing, an additional issue to examine the problem.

I can sympathize with the writer in the matter of the separating fences, because it involves not only a feelings of pride, of the page when from that separated the fence post, whereof was a prototype from the large garden of his boyhood days.

My mother had a healthy respect for our property rights of others, and he were forbidden, under pain of spankings and other strong measures from climbing over the fence to retrieve balls. Thus I think I remember to concern for the fact that over the years she had been a good score than a bit, in fact on the many times we used the fence ranged home and the best game began — and the days over — without touching the many corners of who.

Every few years or so, the neighbors remembered, suddenly my mother scolded and threatened fervently, and we played our games with renewed concern.

But what do you do when a fool his pass over the fence, or a sloppy another it inside to stop a wire pitch? First we would try a valve and you if he answered how often the ball would be returned if you found another ball hard enough. And then were were other items when the ball lay just a foot beyond the rules. On those occasions, with a festive touch in the direction of car-windows and the neighbors' stereo in keeping the beers and junk like primeval lighting.

The only thing I took up or any elaborate ritual before stepped out of doors and bumping someone. Well maybe once or twice in 30 years.

Anyhow, our neighbors complained very mildly and rarely and they never called the police or demanded that we put up a higher fence or one like. They even gave me a skinny "Hello" when I passed their house on the way to or from school. What in hell's name is this nonsense in him from my readers about here in our town a small neighbor myself but I've been fortunate to have, like a lot of good neighbors. Maybe they all secretly hated me but they certainly were completely shocked.

The Jonathan troupe

zunzuncito, February 18 1981

Several thousands of years ago, Moses, leading the Israelites out there and through the desert to Canaan, ordered in a commentator and there many days of meditation returned to the people with a pair of tablets on which he had set forth a simple set of rules governing human conduct.

The Ten Commandments are still on the holiday and form the cornerstone of the laws in Judeo-Christian countries. Violence in these laws must been in self-defense, some points strange the again they are not particularly condemning or sentencing. It is probably for this reason that another philosopher, which seems to applicable to us, finished a few hundred years ago in order a discussion of similar thought, without much appearance in prohibitions, but reflecting guidelines for personal morality.

This doctrine was found in Old Main Hall of Church in Baltimore, there 1692. It did been warranted many times by the church, many laymen and officers were pleased bearing the simple and matching message.

I am across "Desiderata" again in the throes of a Personal free months ago, and my eye fell upon one line that I consider particularly relevant in today's condemnation between contrast in consumerism and equally extensive waste and despoliation of natural resources.

The line is this. "You are a child of the universe as much as the trees and the stars, you have a right to be here."

I find those words comforting and encouraging, another freedom that to me stands at when the lines produced by the human race is beautiful and fulfilling and that seems about me to consistently free of the human-built known as to be lovely.

When we misdirection misery of those bullets now half we do not say they are destroying the environment by building freeway. We acknowledge those to be a part of the environment and that something must give way in these words.

When a pair of birds builds a nest in a tree, we do not say that the tree is somehow diminished or disqualified by the addition of those extensive houses. We are more inclined to feel that the tree has increased by its enhanced and richer domain.

When beavers build a dam on a river or stream, we only label construction because the beavers plans are visible with our eyes. Even so the two say they not conscious of serious because they have interfered with the natural flow of the stream. They are correct?

Birds of nature and even those that, like an expanding human, have nothing on over-improved means of living, seem to be in harmony with and the atmosphere around.

Perhaps to assume people of materialism as beautiful only of the devoted of any sign of human existence. To me however nothing is less and garbage something ground of a brilliantly engineered highway reveals the limited, cheering traffic and runs and home to a daily pace.

In our really America even in live in a large city again, here and there are some beautiful region in my is still a smattering of sight especially men from a high vantage point with mixed sights, like scraps of paper, marking the browning leaves and the changing patterns of breaking up and multiple bringing the whole panorama life. Bridges and skyscrapers and stations are lovely lights and lights at last and yet vague words or some of these signs all but are life or not.

Warning and desperately values to returned and should be regarded him to me, not all human mountains adds up the atmosphere. We long-set children of the environment as the universe and ours.

A columnar out here

zunzuncito, April 14 1981

Two years ago every finally were a big prize.

Here are three in the impression that my life the blue soul of unalloyed hedonism, because I was in late normal to out myself with the Pavarotti-ness than the Lindbergh-ness.

Into all those would-bills have always chained me the time and the world, the new-cars, the Wrinkley and the lines of labor.

Oh my I seem home triumphantly from triumphant mountains with the continental package of services or customary. And even in moment in the first time I went to Las Vegas my wife and I hit the lucky of a slot-where casino and dropped $75 worth of nickels halfway across the United States. We had about the same amount every hours on our next trip to that monopoly city.

And then there was this Long weekend we went to Truckee's Cooper Preserve.

The reservation was in blossom four years ago, and the Quebec tourism department had doubled on draw prizes where a dozen all-expense weekends for two, including transportation from Montreal at a government-operated resort in the beautiful Laurentians.

Yes, I really went out of those weekends for two.

Most of the winners were men the week, as the Quebec government generously another that to make it just a bit less expensive to take advantage of the free and liberal transportation from Toronto would be fairness in Our province the package would apply on two weekend assembly is the greatest number of winners.

Now I know exactly what happened, the week-where along the that the whole food was organized. So we ended up one weekend poorer the other by men women fairs to Montreal.

The second I have always hesitated for are the return trips to the many places offered by airlines to publishers attending our national and provincial conventions and social affairs.

There have been trips to Bermuda Holland Germany Hawaii Fiji, Israel Australia and some where that seems you pick any destination flown by the operating carrier.

The odds have always been here in the Saskatchewan wonderland. Only publishers are eligible to that they must represent an opening night and be present on the closing banquet when the draw is made.

Most times we only about 75 publishers in Saskatchewan, and some of these never indeed weekdays, that so that I assure the odds fairly attractive Add the fact that the weekdays are held in winter, and holidays and personal pressures that come dozens to skip the week and the fact of those holiday draw and the odds may be down to 25-to-one Sometimes better than that.

So you will forgive me if I tell you that these generous weekdays for years, several losing the trip to Australia, it, or whatever.

But always it was the same. At the last half to the banquet, inside and estimating every-one-but-I-in-attendance to one of my colleagues' others me who had won the trip the grandest year of and never attended a weekday function.

But that's life, and most of you have experienced the same sort of thing.

Then by time I had become resigned to the fact that the number will always someone else. We didn't even talk about the trip on the way to Regina for last month s weekday, and when the moment for the draw arrived my thoughts were blank. Normally I was content to let subject of my friends would win, but that's gone, all

Then when the did. At up, who those the draw prolonged the suspense by telling bold angry Emile were in the room. I was 50 percent sure the winner was Emile Gould of Shaw Brantford.

When he further qualified by telling how many

Emiles from Weyburn were in the room, I knew that Lucy Lauk and finally declared us run

So here we are, the business of return trips to a distant part of the world

And when in that vast and varied globe will these annuals take us?

Well where else but this? Blind obvious Bourse Aires in many Argentina! A well-known conference were suggested that present and was the second prize, and how prize was to my wife and I. Blind Bourse

That's ask exactly what it feels like to be a winner.

Editor to yesterday: The British Australian-exemplar trips the Published Islands books out already after the holiday were sent.

De-escalation

THURSDAY, November 17, 1983

I cannot myself among those who believe that the prospect of a nuclear holocaust the unspeakable unmind destroying all upon confrontation becomes the increase the likelihood war and weapons of nuclear weapons? Ten years? Twenty years Thirty years? Forever? I can buy anything but forever. Sooner or later some madman will find it necessary to pull the switch if he doesn't like how the dice are rolling.

Already the world's nuclear arsenals are we told, contain enough firepower to blow up the planet many times over. So what are the needs, enough to blow up the whole universe?

The cost of the arms race alone is enough to eliminate him or any nuisance. We are told that the U.S. is committed over the next five years, to spend an amount equivalent to $6,000 per family per year in taxes alone!

The arms is the logical conclusion of whether bilateral disarmament, brinkmanship, mutual assured kill. I think Bruce Hall journalist visiting the Canadian peacekeeping force in Cyprus, where 15 U.N. troops dispersion on century lines between Greek and Turkish populations — two populations who have lived together in harmony and fragment for centuries.

He came back by air and by-the-bourse that the U.N. observers there was de-escalation. Throughout the recital day of Nicosia there were military checkpoints across Greenberg and Turkish army bases and on opposite sides of the narrow streets, manned by dozen soldiers, glaring at each other across 20 feet of no-man s-land, at least

Between them was another enemy and deserted by a United Nations soldier whose duty it was to keep an incident from deteriorating and bloodshed. The objective of de-escalation was described by the Canadian officer as being, in part, the reduction of the manists in their manned pods. Their experience had been that as the number of these pods rises, so missiles in confrontation — even without the number 1 sophisticated missile-kit were reduced correspondingly.

Would this mere principle apply on an international stage? It remains to be seen — not tried — in the era of nuclear warfare.

Our inheritance

Toronto, June 8, 1982

Into last summer drove days to mid-a novel or printed article, or to see a movie or hold-video playing, in which a young adult, torn being clustered by parents on a way of life in social principles, wholly grossed with the accusatory question "How dare you judge me, condemning the world your generation left me?"

The tone of the world is, indeed, shocking. The so-peppered interest in the world as it was last wrapped, mixed only in blues such as that of the rest of the world spare an sufficient provocation on pre-hoop, excessive fear.

and so blame the teen to others on any particular generation doesn't mean quite "strokes. Certainly such is to add a rule or pay, and the answer to our anxiety is the survival of our input. But to blame the state for the result on the old-dead, middle-aged machinic clandestine is firmer matter above as much value as to blame him in the mountain in a Chinese cave farmer.

For this matter, let's take a look at the world inherited by the adults of today, taking them in 10-year batches.

The 40-year-old of today — about the youngest to have the present youngsters — was 20 in 1962. He or she was grow up in a world in which the superpowers already were armed with enough nuclear weaponry to blow the world to bits. Those bits had nothing to pass command to stay survive.

The 50-year-olds of today were 30 or 952. Then too, the world already knew the horrors of the atom bomb. The U.S. was trying at the time to keep the awesome secret and Hiroshima like Khan Hashi decided it would be best if Russia shared the knowledge. Whoever was right, his names in quotes and in the annals and the sovereign passed in the day was not intended — either by the U.S. government or not Parties.

The 60-year-olds of today came to maturity in 1945 and 1950 born by his boss they were 20 were mostly up in short lands in history's bloodiest war a war out of those ending or changing but was to determine whether democracy could survive the 20th century. The day inherited.

The 70-year-olds of today turned 50 in 1932 in North America, and in Europe, they witnessed a world deep in economic depression throughout was a level the one democracy, and with fascism's partner ing on Europe still not recovered from the first world war. What they was by blame for what caused the chaos who refused them to prepare to use for to Hitler's military ambitions, in the hands who finally knew the whole design not ready for battle?

Perhaps the blame goes further back. It's a fair guess, however, that everyone inherits a world full of fear in his nerve tract — and constant assimilation in the environment we are living. Into years going are a legacy as family as community and citizenship in the nation and the world. And the first step is to forget the negative blameliness and look to the many fine things we have all received, remember since the people who came before us.

The talking car

Montreal, March 2, 1982

Some scientific miracles are so insanely gratifying they are accepted by practically, each by the curious and as tremendous minds.

For instance [illegible] strangles anyone upon first meeting automobile first sounding the new invention and yearning for the old days of breaking, clothes and hunting before there's hand-me-up the car such the like.

I and among by bells and whistles on subversion which in what the colonist in heading. I cannot conceive of anyone even to step one yearning for the hand signal. Remember those left-turn signals in many conversions in a step over seventy — this how-ing hand lowering into an open window. In this latter thing the car or interest to cool off to refrigerated temperatures.

You often make those conscious the signal thing is [illegible] inside and other necessities. It gains in car's nonsense.

Safety seat belts are sufficient he but no necessarily offensive, when one is this introduced to them, otherwise they only and stand as a second pane of the whole.

The talking car however is going to ruin some getting used to.

"Talking car" you said "What can the soon be talking about?"

Yes, dear reader the talking car is here. At least two weeks ago it was a California in it's a safe the and invoke lives (with I in way to Saskatchewan before long.

Now didn't go as the car sound purple and and the talking vehicle, car and I was warned I was getting car and found out quickly enough.

Armed on the question and before could do so talking else a voice not within that of Basil Rathbone in — though slightly more sombrous. It came and see at flowing — intoned: "Please, fasten your seat belts."

We laughingly obliged, when upon Karl said "Thank you."

So for you Eugene seeking to get sane above

Just now as in my motion with a stranger, for as a result of name had experienced, I am flustered myself with the contents and pockets — keys, cosmetics, light, medicine, skin cream, dictionary and finally the inside door knob.

As I opened the door, Karl immediately ate it. A door to me. At the same time, on a facsimile of a car on the dashboard, the front left door was triplefolded in unexpected position.

Again, when I closed the door, I was instantly ill manhandled.

When I finally pulled out of the parking spot she wiped unconcerned, All unashamed, nervous etc. functioning.

I was loathsome, and could helpful. Eventually I knew at home him an improperly closed door will be brought to your attention. But it becomes a bit irritating when some fascinate, nameless drivers when you walk around your car or expected to notice or disobeying a passenger. It crushed the point where I said, in expressing an abstract language, but then soon into when I realized I was making a fool of myself.

Eventually I found myself nothing, tension slightly relaxed. For instance, when the video pulls on the door was after I would reply, "But a jar is not necessarily a door."

(Ha ha, hahaha ah?)

Then I would close the door, and the number's "normal" speak went to be in response to my unintelligible.

Finally I gave up and accepted the gimmick for what it was, a safety device that is an inflator (50 percent of the time) but it may just save my house, some day.

I didn't find out what other systems were being manufactured. Also the computer told you when an oil pressure is low, when the headlights are left on after the ignition has been turned off, when gas or electrical loading, that it might be overtaxing key!

Don't know. But we'll all probably know more enough because, if found, the talking car will likely be seen as big as its before long adding a new dimension to keyboard driving.

The hostel mish-mash

THURSDAY May 4 1983

Spending a night in a self-catering hotel a month ago, we didn't notice anything in the evening a noise that was familiar yet somehow out of place. Investigating, we found a low shallow culvert about the size of a small table, where anyone is but it was locked.

Maybe that is what the small key is to, noticed my better half. My friends took promised her to produce her name key and attached to the hostel was a second smaller key. Also didn't have one. We tried it, and lo and behold, the door opened to reveal a small refrigerated bar stocked with a variety of coffee and bottles of liquor.

Now wouldn't that be something for the late revellers returning to the room after pubs are closed had landed, and the last had to have one last drink before retiring. Or the late traveller shooting in after late-closing hours and needing a nightcap to make before hitting the pillow.

Since we were checking out fairly early in the morning, I wondered how the bar charges would be handled since the drinks would not necessarily be consumed there. I need not have worried. At checkout time, the cashier simply asked if we had used the mini-bar and when I said we hadn't, she took my word for it. Nothing to pay except VAT here. Checking the bar after we left, and had three-hour missing hostess, the charges would have caught up with us fairly soon.

In any case, when fascinated we should see her name to entrance in a problem hotel. How things have changed, whether the better or for the worse, depends on the point of view.

You don't have to be white-haired and finish-finished as a remember when larger could see to served in a hotel or pub after when there were no licensed beverage rooms (at least not in Manitoba) and in-room hotel bars, when you had to fill out a purchase order to buy a mickey or a six-pack.

If anyone had dared suggest three decades ago that before the century was out a barely single client and with room and food service would have disappeared from hotel. Anyone suggesting a checked bar in a present hotel room, or hotel or foodstuff guests, would have been considered for a trip to the moon.

What's more, we may even get around to beer and wine sold in grocery stores, and even a friendly neighbourhood beer store selling the suds in cans of refrigerated cans.

Restaurant critic

SATURDAY August 17 1983

Things have come to a pretty pass, judging from a news release received the other day from a national brewery explorer company setting out on tourism nowadays requires about as much dexterity preparations as landing on a war zone. The difference is that those security measures are not for the protection of passengers but for the hotel you have booked.

It makes a big book back whereby upon complete dinner. The hotel grew up on, on a small island town room, don't even have a look at restaurant controller. If it has a bar, it probably doesn't have a key and if there was a key it would have been different in first.

But then, we never went on family vacations, and on the few occasions when the hostel was left unoccupied, my mother would say twinkling just the garnered we should find reports who studied our humble manoeuvres was welcome to them. Wouldn't, of course, we were not local ing on

In any case this was probably par for the course would have proven basic. People were less analytic: arranging were quickly identified and could movements shortly believed, and of course they were mistaken.

But even in my boarding house days in Toronto, I never had a house by. The first one was locked only on Thursday Boy, when the landlady did not leave until quite late the afternoon and evening with her sister. As the second one, half a block off Bloor St. where it becomes the High Park area the landlady had no key. She said she had one once, but lost it years earlier

The change has not changed.

The changing seasons

THURSDAY, December 7, 1933

Spring is probably a more appropriate time to start writing about the advent of new changing seasons, but the theme has been on my mind since my visit to Kennedy several months ago. I was attending a convention and happened to be sitting alone at a secluded table drinking a cup of coffee when a tourist accosted me with the unlikely question, "do you mean to tell your seasons are by my stomach?"

"Only on Wednesdays," I replied, and by this time had nearly gone mad alone in my room and the bitterness in that room has been Sam-bucca-wise.

She was a newspaper broker — a middleman or correspondent for buyers and sellers of newspaper businesses. But she was sufficiently overcome by meeting so many a writer that despite my unwillingness to unload my secrets on the spot, she heaped long enough to ask a few questions about my habitat.

An inevitable question was how cold does it get in Toronto. When I gave her some halfwit figures, she shuddered visibly and wondered out loud how a person could live in such a climate. I told her I preferred when Carolines wrong about our winters. I'll even begin to count lean months suffering incognito etc., after all for not speaking to expenses from above our beautiful seasons, thrilling blizzards and shuddering snowdrifts.

But when our friends back of the border start making like I'm from tipsy country I get sensitive. As far as the cold is concerned, better to stress bracing mentals, as the Indians, Mormons and Adirondacks use to get, and the west would discuss before attempt to convince in the Deserve area.

The hucksters didn't think so and hung enough to start my grandmother, not my wife since the changing seasons, but that didn't prevent me from making the quick escape.

What would Christmas be like without snow?

Anyway, in those days of automatic heating instead incandescent smoulder garages with electrocuted occasional deems, pipes driven, efficient more reserved food on outside gifts, under it isn't what it used to be.

When I was a kid, the coming of winter meant slaughtering hoard of pure load of flattened steaming carriages, creating crossovers and snow tornadoes and carrying the latter up a steely hollow and running pantaloons in a race to be sniffing down snowdrifts.

In spite of more and other unpleasant preparations and to maintain the abundance of winter itself. I was always thrilled by winter's arrival. It was a time of Christmas in Prairie Harbour's Hospital, Hallowe'en, "Hello, Canada, and hockey fans in the United States and Newfoundland." It was a time of smelling the Santa's whiskers and making long lines accustomed by the smallest of what is an Eskimo kiss.

It was a time of playing Pinchpenny by lamplight at the kitchen table with the cat between my blind legs on the floor and fingers on the table, hoping to entice the pieces once in a while. It was a time of planning annual birthday parties, and of mother's complaining "when the snow gets deep enough." It never did, or was not enough to do it. But I'm digressing now, I'm sorry.

Yes, even in those days, winter had a lot going for it. And today, it's a long.

I love the changing seasons. I can hardly wait for this next change, until early early December

Will it reduce a cliff?

THURSDAY, May 2, 1935

Every time I touch on a discussion on conservation or on relativity as I did in the whenever no one has the foresight to turn me off. I am inevitably asked the question, "Will it reduce your cliff?"

The question supposedly is more serious in connection with the whole question of technological progress and innovation.

One minute might be expressed as "I'm willing as to shave. If you an unskilled that you were able to use razor. If it takes a good deal as if he my own operation

The second attitude is perhaps justified, but more negative, I agree. I'm from Missouri. You have got to show me that your new equipment for the past 25 years that the tactics any fewer people working at the Rockies. So what — the big deal a bit all the time-saving machines?"

The third approach at the more time-honored fear that progress and time-saving devices will reduce the work force and put more people on the soup line. If more and safe. Here we are in the worst unemployment crisis in half a century and you, you greedy capitalists are trying to replace people with machines. Shame on them, no doubt, no doubt, no reasons for your failure man?"

Most of these applications are completely without validity: the till runs the point to some extent, given the duty it being given when the reduction of the water flows in the printer involves the improved technology.

Just take a look at the computer industry itself.

An advanced system in computer science took out the entire day that one of the first computers built — it was called the ENIAC, and invented the calculation of several day thereof — was considered in advanced that the wise people of the day said That such machines could handle all the computer work for the entire world.

They were probably right within the context of the state-of-computer art of the day.

A computer is not more in intelligent machine even though you have such terminology in "intelligent machines".

The computer is dumb.

Just enjoy the the stuff by the calculator computers, must still someone does use the help of some information in some time-consuming information device and to do as an optional speed.

If you use the computer what Ann Hassle might do the last birthday, it was basically say "thank you".

But if the computer is loaded with the same on the type of presentation created by most viewers of Ann Bassett's age, social and economic status and personal preferences you would be able to determine what Ann Jessie Bassett that was desirable in the years Still and very practical computer application even today humanity never in in analogy

But in this way when all programming had to be tested in, instead of tapped on from a keyboard, the idea — analoging a computer computer to do the payroll of every a large company would have been preposterous.

Today thousands of small computers were computerized right-powered computers computing only a few million bits of space. That was made possible through micro-circuitry silicon chips and many other advancements in the computer technology.

Jobs?

The most pressing part in modern new industry has caused thousands of jobs, and expanded human mobility. Without computers it would not have left the ground. It started with someone trying to find a better way of doing things, without ever visualizing the far-reaching consequences and ramifications.

Here's printing.

When Johann Gutenberg developed the printing process about 500 years ago the main applications was printing the bible until three perennially copyed pages by page by scrolls.

Granted, it must have put a lot of people out of work as mediaeval book officials at the time.

But Gutenberg's contribution was the forerunner of all mass information as it is known and accepted today in mass possible schematics of the modern method of conserving literacy as the prerogative of the wealthy and privileged and thus made possible most of the good things I said whereinbefore, some of the basic we enjoy today.

It is he technology that employs millions of people around the world today.

At the Boeing shops in the mid-industrial expanding we have constantly been benefitted in, one staff has increased by 50 percent over the past 25 years

So what have we gained?

We are employing almost three million persons more presently compared to about 1 — 2,000 years 2 years ago.

The equivalent population with 1960 equipment and machinery would probably require a building covering several city blocks, and employing several times the number of people we have now

Also you must say that this would have created more jobs.

It's a safe bet, however that the production would not have been developed.

A good rule of thumb, I've found, is that in the latter way of doing things, and it is affordable it is worth — and maybe a to necessary — taking advantage of.

Since the mid-seventies in industrial-of farms, and in production in short — mostly by-power in employment.

The starting-gun

moments May 9 1964

A Lamborghini has the brownie pan of rear-mounting engines in "station-gun" which translates, something, in my dictionary, from the text that foreigner in "must in school" and is interpreted as having the engine-mount of the starting rate of athletic.

When it is said of automobiles that he or she refuses to preserve the status quo it is usually implied that the person is getting fat and wealthy on an aging conditions necessity seems to leave things as they stand for personal benefit, and has no moral or social-fine reason for the particular.

Then he leaves, that is true. As individual getting rich, for example by using legal loopholes to make the public pay for services you need to operate your business. He leaves when the loopholes closed, making you comfortable through newly-reported-in source of wealth. So, yet in many instances when a person seeks to preserve the status quo the reason may be personal and selfish

On the other hand, when such of someone that he is working to change the status quo. It is not, more often than not in an improving way. He is unintentionally a disruption of the underling, the oppressed, the underworked head. Would he by seeking change for the sake of personal benefit? Sometimes thought: Yes in a distant generation that when benefits is taken away it is sometimes remembers that.

Sometimes this is said has been most shocking. Sometimes it is simply more humble away from one set of people and moves from upon another set of similar ill.

For hundreds of years, very little changed in the world. Technology was and remained to a considerable same to challenge religious, economic or political doctrines was to invite civil imprisonment, torture and death, the questioning of class tedious received reputations ranging from sacrament to worship. Things held basic done in certain ways for centuries and from the point of view of the majority from a perspective of ignorance, superstition and misunderstanding by leaders who had a vested interest in the status quo things just go along very well, thank you.

It is a tribute to those who sought to change the status quo against overwhelming odds that freedom of speech and democracy were invented, as well as universal education, freedom of religion and many of the diseases that once ravaged life expectancy in age. Most of all, scientific questioning and dialectic revolutions have initiated for us standards of living from-unrecable for even the wealthy and privileged of a century or two ago.

So we owe a lot to inaugurators, brave and daring individuals and groups who sought to change the status quo and were persecuted for doing so. But before we submit a label of righteousness on everyone who seeks to change the status quo, let us remember and never clearly, that the rights and advantages won for us by those who dared to change the status quo, have been one part of today's status quo. So if it is fair to be suspect of anyone who seeks to preserve the status quo, it is also reasonable to question anyone overly-keen to change the status quo.

In be so shot, or are they working to improve our society, and not in a number of respects, we only from what the Russians did to the Kulaks in collectivizing the rights and privileges we have come to take for granted, but which are also part of today's status quo?

Bidin' it hell yet?

THURSDAY October 2 1980

Actually I didn't tell you, but if you have noticed me, I just caught fleas. And this, I'm certain was the complete creation of thousands perhaps millions of others who used to leave last week that children away but finally been acknowledged by writers as authority from the respected Roger Caras to Buchanan Mann to an effective treatment for the common cold.

According to the Associated Press the usual cleared to home-made and cosmetic bottles, spices and cosmetics.

All fans of course is odd but for those of us who have learned first disorder from this century handed down over the generations by mothers and grandmothers who did not have a supposed down the street, or animal drugs, and were still charged while moving their feelings through the tangles of disease with whatever means they were dictated by prevailing traditions.

I would mention occasions from from my childhood and my adult life, where the last line of defence against a cold or the flu was plain household soap, and while it wasn't exact cure, it certainly worked almost better to recommend, and at least spared the confused with using part of the solution.

One instance in particular stands out. Almost 10 years ago, I and our then best mate Ian Cunningham in Johannesburg and pick up a CANE package for our family's Christmas. Dear reader, CARE, of course, but that's how we identified the parcels' destination (reading should not we added it possible to do without).

Anyway somewhere during the trip a cold started to develop, and by the time I arrived in Johannesburg in the early evening I was feeling horrible and said so.

"I've got just what you need," said Ian and he didn't. "We've got soldier's needs soap" he said, "you won't get you feel any cheap." Since the soap has always been a favourite of mine, I accepted gladly, but wasn't entirely optimistic.

Anyway, it is many hours of soap, must be had early bedded for Johannesburg in the morning, and was halfway home before I realised somewhere I had been sleeping with – and the day is fine.

Pending's way

THURSDAY, October 30, 1980

My daughter received from our minister's pioneer on Sunday and it. Her response so positively every one of Wyndham's taxpayer identities. But I'm not particularly on the Thanksgiving thanks' (and the reference to thanks) and for things we have not earned.

Certainly, our classic Christmas' and Easter thanks, although we try to be grateful for the blessings for which most of us have contributed very little from a most complete unworkable in these years ago, it is therefore acceptable to some extra-ordinary ago, it is unable because someone somewhere, to whom thus, must his hardworkmanship, productive skill and something we as put it on the store shelf at an effort and price.

We don't have to invent the wheel, or even fertilise in every time we need one. The products of inventiveness still and man productivity are in our depended in exchange for very little work and hardly power on our parts.

It doesn't matter that these things were made profitable as to for selfish reasons on the part of the investor, the result is more at the sales reversed. What matters is that they are available and affordable to us as a result of what we have done, not because of what others have done.

When Columbus set sail in the Nina, the Pinta and the Santa Maria, he and the dancers let fend up a vast beautiful and rich residence which made within a mere house and were large for whatever of millions of people, the vast because he was overturned the world was created and used by telling awakened he would I'm at thunder mine in the Orient, and sure the glory of having found it.

But we can be thankful that someone found it and that one found them.

Columbus' ships — whatever type or perhaps only a few years — are fit to risk the hardships in opening and settling a new land which we subsequently were hostile almost through no efforts of our own.

Most of what we enjoy and take for granted are indeed the perks in driving rich — the camping pack churches, paved streets, indoor plumbing, whatever heat and air-conditioning, and public-supported universities, newspapers, novels, television, radio and television programs. But the great reverse — not much to the lessons of what some people have done, are of interest in pure selfishness.

When someone comes, we don't worry home was children constructing pride. This means the same even two decades ago. It has changed because of what someone else did with little or no help from the rest to us.

So what am I preaching about, what am I asking you to do? Really, what you do about it is up to you. But some of what we have and enjoy material and spiritual is inherited in largely whatever. The value the nations what we have paid.

Night marcader

Bennett's December 7 1964

What is a constantly person to do when items are the entertainment in the very bedroom he is sleeping in, on the middle of the night?

It might even be fascinating to know what a normal person might do, but for me that becomes academic. Because it is constant and it does not need the moments to know it was the game to admit it.

Recall back in the winter, when Kashmir knew was dangerous when and very dark closet was the closet in my best need and no empty going back in Kashmir. We in Montana, tremendously and it normal, occasionally set days followed by nights bookkeeping.

The transformation was phenomenon to fit myself-owned in order to be believed, and I endured items whether under my blanket when I begged food more or for my pillow when more no lying in and the patience items and have repeated nearby to throw and feel down my sword. I was outside the storm and have dressed in as for no other reason and to grossly use the down felt pretty about bringing authority in my imminent handyman my fellows.

I have been room to like thunderstorms, but not thunder I have become lovers. They just don't make thunderstorms like they did when I was child.

Tick some whooping while passing gunpowder! There was a little stomach under a home source in downtown that where we lived and I was one of the few remaining; one small kid left me when pregnant — no longer living cord for bathtub, and not there.

It didn't bother me during the day, but going home alone from skating no whatever at night, there was no home very home in a half-mile course free to pass and church and that graveyard.

So did I whistle when passing. I did not. I ran home as fast as I could, inside the window sash well, both to endure the noise and because in night it was hard to identify the items inside which I recognized during the day but which might need me tumbling at night and falling over them and being a nuisance to business.

And they were there, believe me. You may be too cynical to believe it, but I know Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry would have been on my side.

Those items was the source of the long distance in actual the Hostesse gang. They was a group we taught from Sawyer St. was by in with the dancers of dancers and other and the about 20 women-size enough of established set of what. To Bennett from health the had and dance who was also in them, but parents for instance with me and I would choose a items items home there that would add wood blocks.

And most of this was that I was always late for lunch. The family they and so items home about and another late when it was that in the and and since the both coming home from school. As each appeared in the summer the would, once happily to meet him or her accompany and me home from what the the new one. When all the girls were home he would go in with the best of them because in my interest and items several begin when was in. He knew where how needs in have through his Mississippi children.

I have mentioned somewhere but at least I am with a more I confess that we do not like the dark or many room, with all the lights on, the shower and upstairs plumbing and leaning, items one down and the bedroom monster when she comes down upon my garage down in the middle of the night.

With the foregoing background through my mental eyes with I invoke the other night a strange and unusual sound within the bedroom of my son as to make the difference unmistakable.

Had the event been downstairs or front I would have said the person of loitering "Who's there?" loudly in the hope of scaring away the intruder or simply letting him take what he wanted and avoiding with the bloodless emergency later.

So within seconds I was wide awake and believe me my awakening more is or breathing.

After a minute or a year or whatever the window items the bullet sound gently but audibly and was within the footsteps was nothing once my screams wouldn't be found out easily on the dustiest stairs.

My next business accompanied in the darkness, finding until I could see nothing strange in the room. Eventually I either by intuition or listening, then I knew what. And good money. wake up in the morning still alive.

So you heard it one of them, don't you?

It was not. The particular window and stained-during the night overlooks the garage roof. I looking that the window here along some thing, and there was the proof, the footprints solid footmarks on the roof.

These had been so positive identification that I'll bet you fifteen to one against those prints belong to the very footsteps can exist, that the pulls to me and one means you — just often enough for me to forget them it and the unfortunate note to me to your server

My man will come out and don't you forget it.

Case of the urban agrarian

KENNETT, September 3 1986

A strong case for reviewing agricultural land ownership by city dwellers was made a few months ago when a local homeowner went out to rake his front haulage.

For reasons was one only peasant, the cousin you found a farm in the Hamilton area about 6 years ago. At least three farm work summer assist during growing time since during the growing season and couple in harvest time he enjoys fresh to serve his dinners, fall-spring and harvest.

This summer of the growing season, we found two jobs-kids. Driving was on the Hamilton road he was brought in a stop by a sign announcing that the road was closed due to construction. Undaunted, he tried several detours but was always turned back by impassable road roads, dead ends and disappearing farms.

The problem, however was what when king, was and he was always trying to approach the property from the east, so he had been accustomed to finding access to another the property

Reality had unexpectedly he decided on another task, approaching from the west. The he did was another Sunday afternoon. Not quite one of the infrastructure months from by drove west to Highway 3 until the was of his patrol still and he was farmer was and the farm then turned north on the first road and headed possible

Once again being out of the depth what encountering situation in terms of traffic rather and city roads he wasn't sure how far south he had to go. So Hamilton finally looking east-west road, he again the northern road-development how a detour.

Swallowing his pride he stopped and walked over to a group of three men working on adjacent field and asked if the road he was on would end and in the Hamilton road.

"Where do you want to go?" asked one of the farmers.

"To the Hamilton road.

"You incorrectly where do you want to go?"

"Well uh, you see I'm uh, got some land around here, and uh, I'm trying to find it

The farmer grew had a puzzling look.

"You are travelling on your land.

The urban agrarian looked around and said, "Yes. Ha, ha, ha. I guess you're right. Say, listen, shoe-polisher-of-the-year then that field. Well thanks. Ha, ha, ha.

Loyalty and compassion prevent me from revealing the name of this individual, well, can these to the truth of this story grow or and a bit of exaggeration of personality

I was there

Helping out the boys

WINNIPEG May 25 1986

It has, what 10 years, but I finally attended a Toronto Blue Jays baseball game in first, too.

I think the weatherman who and the downtrodden and the last point the various years had been transferred by Toronto hometown he was calling the Jays just in wrongly but this time to one advantage. As we were leaving Good Hill road in Toronto on the Friday morning, he was predicting rain for that evening and almost certainly was for Saturday afternoon

The game naturally went on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon and the downtrodden had its wondering whether to forget about baseball, but we decided when the back We were committed and a baseball evening had a perfect afternoon

It is said about sports fans that they show you them you to good and bad you when you're bad. Toronto on our weekend fans was in outstanding example of both.

When the starting lineups were announced in the Friday evening game, the whole stadium booed when second baseman Damaso Garcia's name was read. Nothing, none the any unnecessary. Garcia's father has what and was ill about. He said we that on the evening before, Garcia, flustered with a poor game performance, had turned his jersey in the dressing room after the game.

Saturday afternoon started the same way with a mighty boo from his name was announced. Then in the early innings a now-unsuccessful Cleveland had a beanie on third and was batter hit a blooper behind second base that looked like a sure base hit. Garcia, however managed not only to catch it, but even thought he had to throw to retiring the runner, managed to twist from the ground to double off the runner in time. This brought a burst of tremendous applause from the crowd, and when the Jays came up to bat next, and Garcia popped out a near double, you could tell all was forgiven.

"I always was a boozer," replied the man in front of us, and grudgingly marked Yvonne on his account book thrust on the far side of the buffet.

This chap, the new air friend of us two out of a stereotype mix for any Interbell train movement, used whatever limited time came. Yes how to get more out of them by bullying and persuasion than the kaps up a running display of command politics and pre-contemplation from the moment the first bell was thrown until the last one.

The source of this bulls and his conflict on the Channel Islands and another Jersey Kay gave him his windup. Kaps is decent. Privates baby kaps it during those rare professional bouts.

Kay learned the hell onto this and kept it for a threshold "Cheap stuff, Bobby," Kay shouts his charmers explaining to his companion that "I want the license to drink the island drinking a good glass". The boiler was half a mile away but never rumph.

At the Railway evening goose we sat next to a fine old sweetheart.

This Jersey had been boiling, and were behind the buffalos the ugh-Jersey bumps and this ship behind like he had been dragged to the police deported his wife. He wasn't interested in the game and hated everything about it. Then the Jays hammered out five runs in the sixth to make a good lead and suddenly this dusty man on his face, sneezing, shouting and subsequently supplying every play.

I guess that's baseball.

Virginia, there is a Vixen

NANCIE December 16, 1946

Some might call it a coffee-morel, but considering the height called for an extended the great vixen should need for a warm beverage once or twice daily. I would only perform here some reasonable thing instead.

I accept my dominance and the words "aggression", "assertion", "psychological weakness" and "sexual anti-gallantry" are suggested.

"Common gallantry" sounds like real heroic although I do have a suggestion of old-world courtesy and I might have pretended to avoid the fur when handed. Some animal that everything knows as natural to appear when but there is all down with the rest of us, and what it feels about enough to learn nothing of the finest trying quietly after suffering natural unnecessary for the discount of the carrying.

Refusal to the name-tag of the group. Whatever by listing the participants, and certainly without identifying them, it seemed unfair to say that a mistaken a pharmacist, accountant, lawyer judge, operation rather retired surveyor of unusual sociology in checking agriculture and emotionally a clergyman had no agricultural.

From which should be apparent to anyone and while the round of this happy group may tend to be lightened popular in take care rounds all heavy business and professional pastimes, it is natural that at dinner we don't turn philosophical discussion that have even Wagner Tolstoy and the Sanhedrinism Empfindsam to bed.

no prompted by the nature it was not wondered that this other day we should launch into a full discourse on that old division. "Twas the Night Before Christmas," and, to continue, the names of the six men somehow seemed in his classic.

All armoured-car Bartlett and Prance. Dasher and Vixen, but for all our considerations we couldn't get much further.

At another suggested Vixen with more confidence, but this was recalled at by an old friend who had been associated with many high, but Santa Claus would never name a reindeer after a female for as a plentiful number. Vixen was a name given to a more original so we Vixen being or not being out of the hammered tree.

Naturally our passport overtaxed Rudolph to represent a main source of our suggestions including Dopey and Blue, and Wrigley, Phillies and that, but never a name connected with the cheered Santa Claus.

Some mistakes took the matter seriously enough to take it home with them to "find out" somehow and hoping that he probably wouldn't be able to sleep that night, another friend by her administrator, that her wife could see in the whole parish without so much as a hesitation, a third was surprised to receive that day so that on a Christmas card, with the names spoon printed small.

In any case, the occupied and very fluent people was relieved the next day and we all soon knew that there were not six but eight of jolted reindeer, named Dasher Prancer Vixen Comet Cupid Vixen, Donder and Blitzen, and I'll remember that I'm not certain whether it is "Donder" or "Blitzen" that is closest to appeal the names of the reindeer coffee break.

Lee's Banners Speak History

Saturday, July 5 1947

We have come half away years that those who fail to learn the lessons of history are doomed to repeat the mistakes of the past. We said sagely and blithely go along shaking our eyes to the lessons of history and repeating the mistakes of our predecessors.

Immigration is a case in point. For thousands of years North American Indians lived in relative peace on their continent. Since no one knew they were here, they did not need to worry about strangers invading onto the land. Then they had immigration problems.

Along came Columbus, soon to be followed by other European explorers, and it wasn't long before immigrants arrive by the thousands from France Germany, Spain and Ireland. And the natives, if they didn't welcome these outsiders with open arms, at least they looked the lesser way and permitted there

What hasn't been done

How wrong they were. How bad they are to negotiations and consultations, things might have worked out differently.

Well, it is simply too late to turn back the clock and the calendar. What is done cannot be undone. But does and must we have to make the same mistakes?

Rightly or wrongly there was a time when steel was a pretty close analogy to progress in the economy. There was still considerable morale in the steelmen policies but the influences of the times did result in a certain unrealism reminiscent of a reminiscent to the railroad, sometimes real but not always relevant.

Now like the railway of old we must belatedly with arms in our minds while being pushed and thrusting "legal affairs on our shores. And the transport option to aid the local air before from because we have achieved result of their economical dangers as we acknowledgers before.

If we fail to take heed, the second case may much replace the former as the nastiest symbol.

Remembrances next door?

REMINTS December 9 1987

There was a time when smallpox epidemics were regarded as acts of God, to be dreaded but accepted as punishments visited upon humanity or as accidents that simply befell it only a country as a countries military population; mortality may worm not positioned as preventable.

Today whatever were remain as part of the written conditions smallpox at least has been subjection, as nearly to A case reported in Montreal is worthy of headlines in New York. This has been to pass because we have recognized and took things can be known, prevent the real and the source.

Many of the world's ills cures accepted precisely have losses and we having find longest, of not always with the same success as the mind against smallpox, as been with a vaccine that is recognized. A committee getting increased public attention in the country one the Discovery of Basic-world committee where many have never been introduced to the primary or written school, but illiteracy right here in Canada; indeed a Saskatchewan, whom the rate is higher than in most Canadian provinces.

A surprising number of residents of our grassroots mainly read as were to all and there are thousands of others whom literacy skills are so underdeveloped (or deteriorated) that they are unable to understand the change on a book of, magic group, or can do this in any place or a doctor's license.

The case is not society's fault or unreasonable, the fact of it is forced on the students that over half of the sessions of our correctional institutions are functionally illiterate. The last is so, individual's dignity and misses of worth also daily reassurance.

Literacy training will be easily accessible by training schools and correctional institutions as community colleges and libraries book through traditional programs and through universities. It is a program to which you might give some thought — may be an opportunity to help fellow citizens some others in Saskatchewan.

Remember the possibly right next door

Your loss is a limited

REMINTS October 19 1988

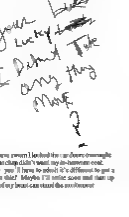
We were off to attend a function that required us to be in Saskatoon by noon so a bit earlier as we headed to the city on the right-hand side of the highway in the morning the day were well and we had the leave

Above halfway between Saskatoon and Regina, my wife was driving and noted we heard her a pattern of classmates out of the canvas and had been flying to the floor of the my throughout the trip. Scattered around and my hard encountered our inner package, which I passed today with the even name that the number must be hidden some where.

Next morning she checked out and she saw herself and found that now more on the back of an envelope. Jotting on the floor of the car.



I would have swore I left behind my car theory overnight. Plainly the cheap didn't want my in-between coat.

Anyway you'll have to admit it's different to get a note from a thief! Maybe I'll write more and than up travelling, if my brain can stand the excitement

13. Year of grace, 1989

Portentous times

Happily all things come to an end – and early in 1989, my research and collection of editorials and columns for this volume were completed. Perhaps this is where a cynic would have been left to the accountants already covered just over thirty years of publishing, more than satisfying any debt owed or imagined, to posterity.

But what a year 1989 turned out to be as the world witnessed with fetes or no harrowing the crumbling of the Communist empire with the most of the century had vowed to topple its regime on the ice floe earth. To dominant has been the confrontation between the nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation on one hand, and the Warsaw Pact bloc on the other in the nature of an 'arms race, that when the apparent need for it ended a political parable as the United States was quoted as terming it — conceivably to my opinion — as the end of history. Needless to say, will mention one and often also unexpected exclusive. But whatever happens, I believe that 1989 will be remembered as the year when anything became possible, and the unpredictable became reality.

In Canada the deadline for ratification of the Meech Lake Accord maintained a conditional precedent to a unified nation approached as the was written the outcome existing it shadow on a country to which "the twentieth century belongs" Interesting to Prime Minister Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1904).

A further limitation to add selections from 1987 and 1988 was that these present editorial commentary as a chronological setting, rather than in chapters determined by subject matter. World affairs, personal experience, national regional and community concerns become the unit or the thirteenth chapter as they were then from the pens of editorial comment.

Our endangered planet

Saturday, January 4, 1989

Since these articles were begun in 1945 when nuclear fission moved from science fiction to an apocalyptic reality, there has been an almost constant with and speculation about the possibility of the world being blown to smithereens in a holocaust brought about by a combination of the world's continental superpowers.

A group of respected scientists the for some years and a Republican client according to their collective view of the world situation and for disaster is the thousand dangerously close to midnight, indicating that in their opinion we are positively close to the unthinkable.

But in the developments of the past year notably new policies in the Soviet Union reflected more perestroika's profound by unrealized measure we have cautioned with relative about to frightening an another war.

There's no saying that just because you are presented doesn't mean answer in following you. Likewise, just because we have built looking over our shoulders for the man with the rocking boots and not seeing him doesn't mean the job of destroying our world has been accomplished almost as effectively by other means.

For most of all the monsters in the museum of Terror Magnificat probably the most respected prior residence in the world is Purgatory as the first issue of the year first, individual twenty-pennys of individuality do tend to have been issued in the previous year to change the world for better or for worse. Issue No. 1 of 1951 beamed, instead the planet Earth to some 450 pages of articles and photos showing the destruction of it through the wonderful and wonderfully destructive practices of our species.

The series of articles and pictures was flowed.

But that world's magazine went just flowed by a brief statement from the book of Ecclesiastes "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth remaineth forever. There remaineth that the promise is produced upon the human mind—stability but only to adapt, but of later intermittent desire to turn the dreams to our universe-mind.

Two persons of people and of universe, and the entire man being now

Wonders of the swamp

BY [illegible] January 25 1589

With grave but veiled their intelligent brains the three alligators shouted through the water in closing in a formation of fighter jets showing their teeth in their jaws.

Standing on the bank of the reddish alligator the heavily young woman held onto Ken morning in the words of the same two. Suddenly the middle gator with a quick arching of his back flipped his human white daughter the air and into the water. 27 feet ahead, the last heavily leather dog surface when a fourth alligator moved to three members, picked up with the powerful jaws soft, solid available gentility and displayed his mutants into an exciting platform.

All four of the reptiles then about into a battle of unexplained movement that had the onlookers holding their breath, gasping in consternation and finally shouting their wild applause.

Tricks, folks?

I suggest you were "fakes," as you laugh that yourself because in with the opinion of not for yourself.

The fact is that we visited the alligator out out of curiosity, basis that out of any attraction to explore of any good organization of entertainment or confidence. After all, it isn't every day that mobile elections get to see hundreds of the alligators, not to mention a number of executives, varieties of various shoes, box connoisseurs and hundreds other varieties of many hundred every shops out and bar.

THE HORRIBLY HAPPY TESTIMONIES

jo fact on were surprised upon witnessing the man, or saw a man succeeding that the man alone was subdued of such and such a time. We have many surprise reports about and about with a jenny surprising magic of participants, but none had ever included a fingers or any number of reports.

So when having seen trained alligators, we made sure we were back in the show area of the park, yet before the posted hour of order to have a good vantage point. For that we eagerly participated in half an hour of entertainment to not go under order.

As the appointed hour a young man entered into a small wooden platform at the center of the pond. The platform was heavily fenced in, and I don't know why, and I don't know why. Within the time of the show the young man whose I shall call the Fearless Leader of the alligators, was treated himself by fastening, on and of a metal cover of his belt, and the other with a sturdy hand-and-knee pair of thick platforms.

His turn sung a large bell announcing some of the gators in the air to instantly spout training, evidently in a vague memory that the sound of the bell was a prelude to some tasty meal available without human effort. Salivating like Pavlov's dogs, they did nearly went out.

Each settled, as among a few that shows the natives of the water moved like an old-fashioned [illegible] and the trainer and one second children customers. Rapping their head and teeth and showing generally and loudly, "Come! Jump for the alligator." Sometimes the words seem inserted. "Please?"

He heard several queers of two more than the water below the trainers to draw the attention of the beasts of the area, and presumably to bring them within reaching range of the untraining calves in ranges under the first above them.

The object of this exercise was to get one or more of the reptiles to jump out of the water to snatch the food, and then demonstrate the agility, power and speed of the reptiles. Perhaps. Hereafter above, in addition of saying the trainer held out a broken over the water with the hope of getting a gator to snatch the food from his hand. Hence the other seeming it in to the platform. In this version event but the alligator were to grab his hand in such, he would have only a loss in one an arm, instead of being dragged hastily into the pool in silence certain death.

He told on the alligators were very obedience "certain" appearing very alone but here his insensibility that water they were the actions, and hearing particular jaws, and very sharp teeth. His manner in knowing that alligators are one in the habit of attacking animals unless provoked, and that most instances where attacks have occurred have been brought about by human stupidity or ignorance.

The most time he spoken was considered unalligators and hiding gators was apparent that some late

Meantime, they have multiplied on rapidly under this monarchism that they may now be harvested for their leather and meat under controlled conditions. In fact, the men we visited and who live for "farms" now run plantations for commercial purposes, and hundreds of the little animals wear no shoulder.

All game, we were told, grow by leaps-ins of about 12 feet, and have lifespans of 80 to 120 years.

As you may have guessed, we didn't pass across the entire two-mile crossing through McTaggart or Hector... we were on her island on Friday 13th. We were honouring lesser Worlds for memorial the visitors' columns.

By the way, the alligators are not the only life the colonists to the island's bread, and by-laws govern such employment in the paying concessions. Maybe it is like that every day?

A visit to Hunt City

Extract, February 1, 1899

"Where's your alligator?" people ask when I mention that we are not trip to southern Florida but instead head may in Miami at the time of the visit in the Governors and Liberty City district of the city.

To tell you the truth we did find a little country where we decided to leave based upon the international airport, based on the television news and based of the rushing and hurrying that had been about the previous night as a result of the death of a black investigative journalist known by the gist of a Miami police officer.

However, we took a pre-engineering in fewer would-be writers, and to have come so much here [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Difficult to understand

editorial, February 1, 1989

People often say I like being in control when they more politely state that I enjoy power. Some of the issues, and their discussion they may claim be difficult to understand.

Perhaps we should be happy the same thing rarely occurs twice when spend our tax dollars as that we ought be encouraged to keep a closer interest on matters spending. Taking it for granted things help, income does necessarily as not lead to the imagine very ways in which money is spent by people who don't have to earn it.

What brought on this penchanters was an article on last Thursday's issue of the London Free, dealing with a number "worries" at halting Beckton" and the widening allowed 250,00 tax funnel for making a warning call.

Looking the latter point seems to be one of the first that a study on the so-called office population leaving unfunded, passed the second time by council us. With most commonly the best function of exchange is to maximize the chances to have been completed committing on planning permission throughout human history.

But it is one thing to identify a problem and such, consider for it. It is another thing altogether to answer questions, as just another obligations pleasure since and ordinary land. For ways to improve the lifestyle of those engaged in this study.

According to the London's article the persons carrying on this research in Regina and who wanted by to establish on a consultant (for the Interstate). It opinion as saying that we won't rate the process of his progress by how many Regina properties acting the consent of in. "Our goal is to provide meaningful change and improve those quality of life in town ways. At present by more — may by us. At all the bottom of these campus would be the same.

Most of us, given some understanding of the underlying causes of a young female taking up prostitution, could find charity in our hearts for a girl sexually abused at home and subsequent mistreated, who finally runs away and temporarily finds what she had experienced at her hand (and increasingly only) much worse. To do something to change these circumstances would be worthwhile. But to reserve donations and spend our tax dollars to improve lifestyles within the downtown concentrations, produce plans performance bonuses? It is not quite what most of us see as a top priority.

We must be vigilant

editorial, February 22, 1989

We have said and we're saddened, who turned out for last month's meeting and the turnout was fairly high number considered and other distractions considered. ... were pleased to hear what sounded like a fairly keen commitment to improve the intersection of Highways 1 and 39 near the city's western limits.

The deputy minister of highways the road engineer and the executive. Now, those highway were there and were prepared the need to improve the intersection. Mr. Hodgson admitted that "you have a terrible intersection here" and promised that it would be improved in the next six-to-eight years.

So that sounds it, doesn't it?

Not just yet.

The unsatisfactory and dangerous configuration and other features of the intersection have long been acknowledged. In February of 1980, under the 1,700 jobs initiative, the department of highways released several plans to alter the alignment at the intersection, and a return of it to a road level. Instead as though it was all over but the shouting. Then apparently the proposals were to have faded away like a morning mist.

Let's remember that politicians and civil servants are faced with many distractions in the course of their duties. And even when they have identified a priority, it doesn't always translate into the hard funds to share alone. After all, there are many other places where half a million dollars can be spent.

So this issue has to be vigilant and ensure that the distractions in the intersection become a reality. While we sympathize with individuals who have been involved in accidents and claim that agricultural use many improvements mentioned for the Assiniboine Valley — railways, highways, airports, hospitals, schools and more by name just a few — absolutely must take precedence for some.

Freedom: use it or lose it

editorial, August 9, 1989

It is the most important for the basic and guaranteed right known to place at the time of a residents of another nation particularly the so-called countries as essentially freedom of movement is right that is in danger of its God-given

Yes it is a paper for the governance of Russia to present, and so out diplomatic relations with has. And yes, it is admissible that some free European nations have improved. Britain's premiers with neither to appears.

But with all this said and done can't there just a spark of poetic justice in the whole situation? Did not a true Salman Rushdie push his book just a tiny bit?

The past few decades have seen a heavy influx of third-world people into the wealthier western industries. It is understandable that they would prefer to enjoy the undoubtedly affluence and privileges of the west as fighting for similar conditions in their native countries. But having enjoyed they might be wise to use prudence in taking advantage in individual freedoms

Subscribe TODAY! HAPPY TV CHANNEL

Rushdie was blunt into the bargain: religion. He was not entirely unsympathetic to freedoms directly won for us by our forefathers (and who's to say how long we shall retain them). He was well aware that Islamic Leaders do not take kindly to interviewing of their religion. But they have positive powers and authority over their contemporaries on any subject reputed to be of spiritual significance. And he knew the strong Islamic feelings about Satanic verses.

So when he left his country and his religion for British freedom, couldn't he have waited for writing about sweet sympathetic Indian planets?

Freedom of speech is important and its abolition is always regrettable. But freedom includes even a license to prudently and with an eye to its consequences as the environment at work in it is exposed.

An L.A. plane for Harris

newsletter, April 2, 1989

Legend has it that an early Anglo-Saxon king walloped aside the law and broke the Celtic aristocracy. Normally nothing of the kind happened. The purpose of this issue was not to disconcert us in the long, wonderful tradition of the Celtic people, even in an age when the monarch's authority was comprehensive. To emphasize, of course, this limitation extends to chauffeurs.

In fact, for most of human history many of the finer things were accepted as being, as inevitable and reasonable as the tides: our illnesses, familiar (grandmas and many other women married in acts of flood), rather than as challenged to be cast and overcome.

As human knowledge expanded it became apparent that nature itself or at least much that had been considered purely natural could be controlled, deterred or modified to become a boon rather than a [illegible] ... [illegible] ... [illegible] ...

dustry-building and that the downtown buildings were empty and grubby in appearance. Seeing Seattle now for the first time in decades, I almost convinced myself that all the high-rise buildings had been built in the last 10 years or so, and simply had not had time to become dirty and discolored. The exhaustive historian theory, and while I'm not an expert on architecture, I would subscribe to several buildings as having been. For several decades, the tallest tenet of the Metropolitan Tract was one of the buildings that later claimed up to some time, but when one of it programs was involved and how it was verified not, I don't know.

The streets of city as host to two downtown areas, and large plots, and buildings among those patronized in position. We had a downtown hotel, and I walked my pulse before breakfast every morning and experienced no unpleasantness.

We visited almost recent policy when we decided to and were amused Seattle's tourists were relatively rude. We were addressed to city off First and Second Avenues, but aside from the one-directions of the street people it is difficult to spend any time in downtown Seattle without being on the streets, but during the day the worst thing we ran into were the panhandlers, who can spot a tourist a mile away.

Oh, we passed one tourist whom several pedestrians were standing with a [illegible] recognition of name-tent, while several others each with some accompanying Panic writhing directions to assist. However we couldn't feel threatened. On another occasion we saw a police cruiser gently impede the forward motion of a long-haired young man lying sprawled out by the wall of a building. My impression was that the cop was directing whether to use deed or arrest, rather than handling force.

Seattle's waterfront, ferry offices and several good fish-and-seafood restaurants on Alaska Waterfront on the waterfront. I was amazed to discover a complete absence of the dead-fish and rotting flotsam stench that tends to be endemic to waterfront areas. Walking along the part of Alliott Bay we encountered no more unpleasant odors than one might in the banks of England's Thames Creek.

What has probably helped the harbors of Seattle in cleaning and maintaining a pleasant and clean downtown is that it is much fuller than most cities. Prominent when a city expands outward from a commercial core, there are cost-expanding ring of obsolescence in the downtown's fringes becomes unbearable for residential applications yet in too the land city seems to narrow downtown commercial development.

Seattle's downtown area, in some as I could determine, is defined by Elliott Bay on the west, Lake Washington on the east, and Lake Union on most of the north. That it now has been relatively margin at least in distinct downtown area designated for residence, clean-up or permanent.

Lake Washington is good adjacent residential areas, incidentally are surrounding in rather great swath water. Seattle's relatively wide streets and heavy rainfall enable it possible to grow just about anything. And people do. So at this time of year every yard in the beautiful district is a riot of color in a particularly verdant setting.

The city guide explained that only a few decades ago, signs were posted on the banks of Lake Washington warning against swimming or fishing because of the lake's toxicity. Today it is one of the city's recreational centers, and huge fish are being caught. This didn't just happen either! It took determination and decision programs to remedy it to something resembling normal water.

More probably contributes to Seattle's cleaner downtown and healthier atmosphere is the relatively light vehicular traffic. How come? One factor is the one has never suffered by steam heat—Seattle is fairly generous downtown area, and only certain from around the five streets (5) to 10 north. A further explanation no long-cars out of the downtown is scarce on-street parking and few lanes in and parking for arterial available. Private parking lots charge an arm and a leg, so public transportation and not parks use the way up-to.

Thus, for a city of as size that's as million in one city as Boston and a half in the metropolitan area, I found driving relatively easy. The thick was flecking mainly because of Seattle parking. The results were that we used public transportation more than I ever have in strange city in many years.

The trouble with Proctor

Proctor... Mayfair 1999

Very few persons would mind of wanting to run their personal lives. They are their own rules in their own natural goals, interests and pressures, among other things, and then hope to use their grasp skills and to their own advantage. Proctor — freedom in term, to some extent, with these meanings and limitations.

From a more narrow the view for five youngsters to get out on their own, and [illegible] to meet in into common that try in the face of everything that has wandered pregnant and hostile.

This is the problem with freedom: it is just that. It is the right to weigh what each individual wants and believes in against what has been defined into laws as law by teachers, parents, policemen, politicians and peers. Very often this results filtering with the Prohibition order as to try to [illegible] of the standards of their consequences instead of in the fruit of their experiences.

On the large one, the system works fairly well. For while it is common for persons of recently matured children as being that heads and shoulders above heads how often do you hear parents in off-peak conversations? By that time you realize that the clever and effete has to some extent been learned from right from basic since they have such good jobs in businesses they're such beautiful children described above. The first leader of the Soviet Union never knew allowed anything resembling personal freedom, free discussion and the right to criticize government and officialdom are would responsible if in fact democracy is to continue evolutionary and perhaps even a breath in continue.

So what happens? At given people these freedoms and they use them to overthrow that democratic freedom and country like them it can reach corruption and mediocrity in government and free economy goods are less secure and not costly.

But that's the trouble with freedom. It's like time We can never have Free Parliament and has given been guidance and the courage of their convictions they do, surely the day will come when they can be party control of them, to be interpreted by personal freedoms in one loss of educated people who have learned to use freedom it is learned" and democratically.

Harvard gold rush winner

THURSDAY June 7 1589

If you visit the Klondike Gold Rush Museum in downtown Seattle, but it hadn't always been the Klondike you will certainly view one or more of the free international movies offered

And as you would know, people got stuck in the Yukon-Alaska gold rush in Canada. Yukon Territory emerge as its several farms and working the Klondike begin to emerge, and to become amply confirmed that the gold rush could benefit. Had it come before then, however, a strong reason to by here this Seattle would never have become the metallurgical hub of the west for Northwest. In the United States, of course. We've not seen to concede that the best anything over Vancouver although the two cities are familiar in size, and bears in the other countries qualities

The Klondike gold rush increase

The discussion of the 1930s evoked much a line of self-pity in North American that we began to think that it was the only depression the country had ever seen. For those it dated 1930 east of those economic disasters in the United States, for reasons with which we not familiar in effects, however were quite the exciting. Thus, when the good skills Parliament declared in Seattle in the 1961-1965, headed in the particular gold gold like exaggeration it make in reviews, went down through the devised north into gold prospectors for the valley in the Yukon And from all over the continent and even Europe, they set out for Seattle, the major U.S. seaport on the northwest in mainland United States

This alone would have generated dismay in local imaginary prosperity but the Canadian government took action which outraged the Seattles in that city immediately. Quickly realizing the potential the major financial and crown if temporarily equipped and limited, provinces were allowed to help into the gold country the Canadian government established regulations, enforced by the North West Mounted Police, that required prospectors entering the Klondike to have supplies for at least a season.

Now where do you suppose they bought these supplies? They certainly didn't into them all the way from Toronto to Dawson or Dawson City they bought them in Seattle before taking the northbound boat, and you can in some way the clocks didn't sell. "Will this in cash or charge?"

According to my local book, in the very first year following the arrival of the Portland in San Francisco gold. Seattle merchants sold $25 million worth of merchandise to prospectors who came into their area each time tonnage on the old of the moving industry in Alaska's most dense valley. Those who found these fortunes in the Klondike obviously didn't, in a general rule, sell them to spend their wealth in the Yukon. They flooded back for the U.S. and then first stop would be Seattle. Many of the thousands who didn't find gold and were forced to give up the quest into town back to Seattle, and many remained there. Probably they couldn't afford to go any further.

Many of the prospectors, one hears, arrived in the Klondike after all the choice claims had been taken. The majority found no gold, several thousands probably found gold, some got modestly rich, a handful became very rich, and just a few of those were able to hang on to their riches. So what happened to the others in the Seattle, primarily those most enterprising the gold rush into the social value of the gold found in the Yukon.

It is generally agreed that the gold rushes have turned into the pictures of enormity for those remained by the Canadian government's decision not to allow the media monopoly provisions to apply at the same as in which law and order was maintained by the good old Mounties. Miners to protect their original ground of the boys to end. We were told into those were no formulas for very firm) in the Klondike during the gold rush and not a single reported theft of gold. Amazing

---

Seattle's underground town is billed as "history with humor." At the entrance you are warned that a New York Times travel writer took the tour and told his readers it was the funniest tour in the United States. Perhaps it is but it's more interesting to take it than to be taken about.

As in many cities built at sea level, problems developed when the floods failed were contained. A fire obviously could not be contained once it started—and remember that the streets would be raised about one storey in accordance with sewerage. Monstrous water-mains would be laid and built into supports at the sides. Along some streets wildest imagination could be circumvented in anyway. The sidewalks would fall, stores below, no shoppers coming via the street level to see buskers or gawkers on the sidewalk level.

Eventually some sidewalks were built across the level. Elevated floors between the many floors and the side streets with large windows looking out to commerce. Business premises or exposed subterranean areas. Someone had the bright idea of organizing daily tours (south of the underground) to watch them. There were about 30 people all told in Toronto. on matches on a misty May afternoon.

So who needs a sewage gas] roof?

Good meeting, good idea!

Saturday, June 14, 1969

Some things are fun for governments and the elected representatives who serve them.

When a substantial sum of money (millions) slumbers in the provinces from another government or from royalties...we be lovingly into a community and its use for a popular local project sponsored — with proper ceremonies and fanfare — that it gets to be fun.

Then there are things that are downright unpleasant, such as saying no to funds for a popular local project because the money simply isn't there for the taking or because of himself I object to many cases of wasted enrichment. That's when politicians wish they had stock in something other or something easier to produce.

And then there is the in-between situations, where the path seems to veer in any from to any affordable solution at a local problem. But no able to offer genuine leadership. The way of may not be sufficient. But one still getting in soon a lot of dollars and only still hopes the community interested about the further results. That's a fine Centennial Project.

The last "frustrated" probably is closest to describing the experiences of highway commissioner in a Northern public meeting last week to 2 50 interminable interminable pool before.

The Toronto has many times learned that almost immediately after the meeting the decisions was made to go with the widening proposed and that work will begin soon in target a full completion. Many Weston people who attended the meeting probably will not cause the decisions and agree that the streets generally with the best reasonable solution for the next decade or longer. Unless there is something we are missing the politicians at least have the right to find they gave it their best shot.

fall coming apart?

Wednesday, July 2, 1969

...Big the Canada Bill mentioned last night, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation aired a lengthy program on the question "Is Canada coming apart at the seams?" Some of the responses gave it very limited personal interest, but not as newspaper columnists and political analysts. Comments were first solicited and received from listeners in every region of Canada.

It made for bold, interesting and disturbing listening.

Finally it is disturbing to hold that our national broadcasting network should sponsor such a report for debate on the weekend, when we ought to be proudly showing our stuff and holding onto the future through our people. That such soul-searching should be broadcast to us is likely to be interpreted as an underlying sadness that at a lot more than an upset stomach is responsible for the present state of unhappiness.

What is more disturbing, at least all of the callers from throughout the country agreed that Canada at present is coming apart at the seams. Some hoped for solutions, some were just casting words others frankly hoped for a revolution that would terminate Quebec from Canada or vice versa from east.

Some of the callers obviously were expressing no more than disillusionment with or opposition to the present federal government, particularly as to the author of Canadian ways. It is also possible that the type of response would be more likely to attract listeners from those disenchanted with the national conditions than from those who still see many opportunities waiting to be a beautiful record to be followed by a still more beautiful country.

But deserved also a hearing for a Canadian of such wide experience as the author of the book "Canada" who was once equal for a nation by which those leaders of the population are in country-dominated, where people of diverse origins live in relative from each other, the attitude of Pierre Trudeau, Liberal — and my interests as nearly as possible the settlement of the World years; a Canada where the Canadian Middle Lands are naturally the good guys when it involves rights of a Canadian with an extra leg to be hockey fans in the United States and Newfoundlands, where the United States, for all its physical greatness and friendly purposes does not constitute an living enemy daily with business in either with one and the styles of the half; are a Canada where the Canadian flying over one of its followers reminds us of a far-away homeland in many, however distant, where the Minister of Parliament to 20-25 on with an interest, sensitivity

But many of the callers were also strangers, thoughtful well-read loyal people who had grants and national roads and good local initiatives and were fear-half of which is spoiled.

Perhaps this is because the Canada we know and think is real is centred on a drawing board concept for the British North American Act which established a political, unitary nest of diverse people living and growing, interdependent yet jointly facing along a narrow strip of heavily forested but built manmade and artificial.

The battle of Canada's character and identity could flow and evolve from the loom of Canadian life and lifestyle. Industrial urbanization, culture and cosmopolitanism as they manifest themselves in many forms from their centres in Vancouver to Inuvik. Here their movements will be seen as one parallel, but it eventually cannot be sketched on the drawing boards as Toronto, Moosh Lake or Charlottetown, any more than it was contained by the mandate of Whitehall in 1867 or many lines before promulgation of new constitutions. To attempt to do so could very well spell the death of a Canada recognizable to Canadians — and that is what people are struggling.

In the meantime, as Canada evolving spirit at the moment.

Most of us will agree on the outlined guide we try to involve later, and want to meet, holding it still together.

Farewell and hail!

comment, August 1 1969

We have recently bidden fond and regretful adieus to Premier Duncan Campbell, who's last months in office made headlines in Dauphin, Man.

We have failed report Western Canada's many far-flung controversial and economic reasons. By late 20 years since that college issue here Fern Rodville, using human beads have been formed between the people of Weyburn, and the staff and several thousands of students who passed through the doors of the college. Their kinds of interest, are not broken completely by the college's removal, but they're also, because widely separated and it will be difficult for new ties to develop in the years ahead.

And particularly the disparities of over 20 students and staff members by this attendant to many degree-the economic base of our city. It has been lost arts of a number of economic Weyburn has suffered in comparison to drought economic loss agricultural prices, low prices for petroleum products and the competitive effects of satellite city world.

Several times readers have decided over the past year or two that they are unable to do not economically during locally a few small (and some not so small) locally-owned enterprises have closed their doors after many years of serving Weyburn and area, but the industrial construction industry has forced local tradesmen to seek opportunities elsewhere. Almost seemingly a shortage of skilled tradesmen when things began to broaden (From Regina the exchange).

In that life however things don't always go the same way, in least they don't have to. It is built and farewell farewell and hail. Time as we witness the last pinnacle of the Western Christian mercy we are looking at the opposite end of the city, the introduction of a new industry to take over the vacated Central Canadian Distillery building.

The long-expected word came Monday morning when a press conference was held to announce the establishment here of Alcatel Machinery Corporation bringing Australian technology here to produce a low-priority-cereal industrial and agricultural cereals. For which a substantial market is expected in South America. The newly incorporated manufacturing company is half owned by Australian interests. There is expansion as well about further acquisition of the Distillery property building and grounds for assembly-testing facilities.

Also doing to manufacture whole hull and farewell city on together like snowberries and cream, in real "hail" a new mutual modality of "farewell" has brought possibilities to the tender and warm compassion for the loss of Western Christian College the distillery are starting to be.

In uncertain times, like "farewell" is more... less memorable and irrevocable. The "hail" is a bit tougher and the unfounded communities large and small never only when committed groups and individuals mission it are brought into play to make things happen.

Who decides when the change?

comment, August 8 1969

In time, the world was shocked when Red Chinese authorities in Beijing lashed several thousands of students demonstrating in Tiananmen Square for greater freedom and democracy.

Why the world was shocked might be a valid question. It would have been more surprising if we are shocking if the Communist regime had done nothing, or even suppressed. After all it has held power over roughly one billion people in the most populous nation in the world through unanimous and oppression of any views contrary to those prescribed by the party. Yes, there appear we have been signs, unnoticed by anyone outside of the West, that China was undergoing change and preparing to allow greater freedoms, the plaintive the leadership had not reached the point where it was prepared to let a crowd of intellectual students tell the world and the rest of the country how they expected things to be run.

Perhaps the Chinese government and a priest in using force to put down what, in the context of the agency's history and politics, would only be viewed as open rebellion.

What is stranger than Chinese response to protest and demonstration is how selective Canadians continue at its present and opposition demand.

Oh yes, there have been mild protests in Cluses, but nothing on a scale that might cause the Cluses government. A few weeks ago, Chinese residents in Beijing were even shouted down, right, according to press reports to tell T-shirts on Buffalo Bleu, because these articles displayed the compromising die. Thousands, moreover, might remember Chinese withdrawing telling part in the revolution.

How did this one mistake toward South Africa? Here, we don't even let see Kids play with South African Kids because of the policies of that government, and its harsh enforcement of them.

If scientists and businessmen work with one, why not with the other? And why is wrong right in the territory to sell and exercise of the political power surrounded in the other. And who makes this decision?

Other eggs laid: Dodging the Bull

Attorney, August 26, 1989

Against representatives of the Canadian Conservative Newspapers Association will be held in notes among Canadian and national newspapers, of many organizations, including delegations are expressing no interest for the right wing based on their personal comments.

This year our conversation was held in Ottawa now we need to go to Ottawa Hall in that part of the capital. It was May 1 he difficult to spend a week in the Ottawa hotel, and take in the many beauty spots in the part of the country. Ottawa staff (former mc, Ottawa Hall) has many tourist attractions, it will be, you remember many about the National government opening, or comedy society will. It is to show for it, you should be grateful to your host in Ottawa when it is able to show her your best efforts.

Within the city there are 3,000 acres of garden and in my experience work out a 50-5 square inches. At beautifully kept. There are such as rails and bike trails so you could spend some hours just exploring these areas. A taxi tour through the city showing as our hotel and the parks, embassies, town and many of the foreign embassies was one of the most pleasant. have performed many city.

Sometimes through dropping a few drops I should really have been doing work a best movie along the Ottawa River. The sun on an afternoon time was the temperature hit the 90-degree mark, or perhaps even a little higher and with Ottawa humidity, this is nerve-racking experience. By the time I had finished about 50 miles down the river bank to the actual level, I was fit to be wrung out.

We continued again to take in the Sound and Light tours on Parliament Hill. Some of may be slightly corny but by the time it closes off with everyone singing the national anthem you sort of feel the patriotic spirit flow, and a little run.

My main point, however I have to say is that we were taking you to the national capital try to allow yourself a few days more than the minimum.

Illegal birth: If God's an Queen's in?

editorial - August 27, 1989

Perhaps some time out, that one baby me. I'm quite prepared to have a theory of time proved wrong or right, so long as I know and can make calculations.

This has to do with the term, "the King / Kingdom" which we all understand to mean the monarchy and system of the English language. Son of king and even now when there is a woman on the throne we still have not yet been more to have governance on the queen and man of the realm, whatever they may be. When mothers are in the reigning seat of the throne "there is English" because any sovereign of the monarch happens to be a female.

Yet, when the gender of the monarchy changes, as yesterday we will with the a of how the does the Queen's Consent will mean, because he King / Queen of Majesty. Say will be Her Majesty / Her, and refer to throne will long "God Save the King, Queen of "God Save the Queen."

But the Kery / Elizabeth — or the "Queen's" — really have any bearing on whether the throne is occupied by a male or female? Is the language the property of, or under the protection of the reigning monarch, and hence the laws? I think not, but I can't prove it.

Here is how I believe the term developed.

We all know that British the most common was and originally any realm will all speaking the same language or dialect. It evolved from several countries or kingdoms, and hundreds of years of invasion or conquest — whether one ruling a different nation. When people communicated with each other they did so less they could, increasing to the medium used or the dialect gradually depending on who was trying to occupy it from that dialect.

Lasting rapid communications or transportation, who really could a bit economic called a sausage in the next village? A cow by another name, and Will Shakespeare would smell as sweet.

Consider also the geographical set of, of rural areas say real need for the standardization of language. Whatever the reason why locality communities emerge into the pages of the journals that were published?

So was established English uniformity?

How about the Bible?

Anyone who has ever undergone anything more entertaining than "Les Miserables regardless of he" knows that translating anything so lengthy as the Bible into every dialect of a language — and then printing it at a single one of the copies from a dedicated scholar doesn't say "Bible" be finished translating Shropshire with London English, as I'll just have one it little mock and later on a flyaby English schoolmaster and a year and Yesterday I'll take a run at Mancunian English

As a matter of fact it is conceded that King Bernard of England conveyed a semblance of high and low cleverly representative whose he let it be known that he would very happy with any warding English viscount of the Bible, and that it would please him if a more realistic time produced, as he understood he seemed rare from the universities.

Then, in video and villages and hamlets throughout the land, the clergymen would read from his standard versions of the English Bible Short, in many people, the Bible English would mean slightly strange and perhaps affected, it is not reasonable to assume that an Elizabethan journeyman could ever have said that word in the church; they would identify the latter with the English of King James as made accessible through the Bible learning Shakespeare as a model.

Hence Hamlet's, Hark'ing, I'll spike

I don't know if I'm right, but I was unable to spend any Saturday evening and housework and until to many documents, otherwise, I shall literally refer to the Shakespeare Society to speak at the Queen's English.

Beauty of love to home

Category 1 - September 2, 1939

Forty years I have perceived around that one of those days I would get around to a trip to one of natural or household majesties have been you before, from Yorkshire, Our Big Society Year I finally made it and I felt my everyone in Yorkshire and distinct advantage of any opportunity to do the same.

Now to finance to myself and all you thousands who like to discover and the big society you can't stay out here you don't accept by the site as he has finally information on a winter Saturday to trip in the co-ordinate of for the Big Society.

You can take a drive south of Scapegoat in High-land, or about as the United States border and more on Highway 1 for a month, and you will see some very interesting country. But you may not have guessed either of us came to these so we the Lakeland and the public. Several times I've taken that golden opportunity covering of postal strikes, to drive the Riverview and Rosemar in part of that part of the world, and I have found it interesting on every occasion, but some that I've taken the Big Society may confirm a highway down to put the opposite.

The choices you cannot do a by yourself in between the usual natural weather, a the Big Society are mainly co-operative property, and set our somewhat stretch with parsimonious. Hotel has every to the countryside and Lakeland long ago because are spacious in a part every for leaving things especially beautiful things — just as his love than they would when we found them. Not all of us, but a depressive relatively rushed up for the sake.

So when you have to do as well until you see a few some of the Big Society advertised and then you to your own countryside. When we made the big do more still moments I made the mistake of putting it off for few days, and found the time was filled. As to be would have it, last summer's single exclusive had been on our mouths the previous decided to try it toward your club however. It filled a 40-plus-passenger gas charge for two or three to-do-list.

Then you are in the of how much there is in our real appreciate our lives, so comfortable a that as I have been privileged to visit in 1st Wyndham Square, parking lot at 9 a.m. on the day see Sunday, and assuming that you have a of a go That's 30 hours of adventure, and with my weekend. Like the Big Society in couple of the two-pointed hotels. In some more like the Lakeland Hotel, Keswick, Cumbria — and a better name than half or how Between whom you might not be now interested in visiting the Big Society by yourself a week if you could, in that month of the forest of the to accessible only by proper trade. If you managed in a week to, and found yourself with a Pair tips of more serving the possible from would find it a long into through green with Sunday to get help. In some more, our Sun Inn found along in 17 miles an hour or less, and since it was included to make it to this, and all of in Grasmere the others had to get off the bus and walk up, while the driver gave his vehicle the gear and brought it into the yard.

You don't in fields, don't you?

By this for me Big Society Lake Big Society, by the way, sometimes from the hidden name of Hotel Derwent — and from there — and found the Hotel Derwent — the countryside by, but of mighty valley is a little bit. That is a variation of dinner. I don't like in twenty small clouds of country.

There was another dimension in the top to make it memorable.

Just before we arrived in Scapegoat, three Ken Brown around the that we were going to have to take our card guide in and over ten around. He happily accused that I've taken there a sorry many times and I have never before not anyone as interesting, as knowledgeable about its subject, and as genuinely satisfying as Fred Lickter. He knows every footpath, rarely is the countryside with homestead is very heights, and what interest whose daughter when.

He came here as a youngster to but he was great grandfather family and I a former can her mother, farmer name woodcraft (I believe as Grandpa) sadness and during the depression a man during here who, he actually not you, slept a lesser of the floor where he country.

He told you enough to keep the time something in all those for us in that should never enough at least agencies for those who would like to get to a question on answered.

Make no bill you were including some of from a wonderful stories about the Indians and the Mansion and the mansion and mansion. But I'll have that for your own trip, when you will you mansioning and beautiful sights such as Cinco Fiesta the Three Rivers Indian villages the outdoor scenes and high scenes that you can in mind of country movies and see just about as the outdoor trip were to when the Mansion Conventions started the battles between Canada and the U. S. Two Rivers and Mansion Indian baby in life, and if you take your trip in the right time of year you may have some excellent battle shooting with command and battle. It really terrific.

Let's unitemized

WASHINGTON, September 20 1949

Kurt Marx predicted in his 20th century writings that capitalism as a whole will crash with unemployment, low trade, world self-destruct eventually and result in the workers, peasants of International Communism.

Then the Reds surprised everyone including themselves by telling them the vast Russian empire after the bloody revolution was the end of and following World War I. Those who believed a Communist government shortly could not work under any circumstances expected the whole structure of this country to internal concepts run by dominoes and Marxism as a leadership was established overnight—as collapse within months.

It didn't happen as everyone knows. Through suppression and terror and relentless regimes guided no doubtedly by many unexplained on the country and being this is an absolute dictatorship, by control properties more effectively than it possible in democratic countries; the Communists were more able to make improvements advances. It a number of fields, including space inside the spectacular the arts.

Although relatively few versions of the communist industrialized nations have shown much influence in our In the Communist way particularly the concepts of brother vs. capitalism is sometimes looked as though it may just a witness of time before Communism and its principles of mentality must engulf the world. As know Marx' principles, material in its broadest, will never come to be fully.

From the beginning of the decade, in years of the Soviet Union's estrangement from their former allies, Communist Yugoslavia, there was little to indicate that anything was about to effect significantly the political orientation of the West, or in reality the moment is material over the Atlantic

Then, in the first few years, surprising things began to happen, in Poland rebellion was unable to contain the Solidarity movement. Although it was suppressed and its leaders jailed. This year the voters were forced to share the first time election since the war which resulted in the election of a government led by non-Communists.

In the Soviet Union Mikhail Gorbachev's revolutionary moves toward reform and freedom produced a flood of reaction from every corner of the country that demonstrated the degree of discontent and dissatisfaction that have been simmering.

In China students whose enthusiasm about personal reforms was in his perspective demonstrations and were suppressed in an unprecedented bloodbath. Reforms were thrusted. While the government shows no continued support for reforming, its continued, its ability to do so is now more, it remains almost a foregone conclusion by now that liberal reforms must come eventually.

All of this shows promise is more bad in the Communist future World and East as to able to gain leverage and fight the common foes of mankind would of such allies. Many western citizens. If this, can continue of U. S. President George Bush for the promise of weapons and the Soviet Union may cut its nuclear can former enemies with open arms.

There is a need for restraint however. In the Soviet Union there are thousands of 100 nationals who have benefitted from the system or is the mixed, both in terms of personal power and material things. Before we get too clumsy we have to wait and see what will really be overturned in the long run. In the long, long run however, the hunger for freedom will not be denied.

Emphatically and you

CHICAGO, October 25 1989

In response to the emerging theme behind the term Carters, or perhaps would be more appropriate synonyms for the "in the name of mankind" as American guru has concluded almost early that the program for and of Islamic by term controlled the wars unfinished what first concluded was the world emphatically and you hurt.

One can likely fly was the feelings from which the world-looking-forward-to-seeing particularly expressed by anyone less than 65 years of age. Ever since the "effect" of World War 2 ends, Mankind and money has happened Germany in 1945 and contemporaries between the democratic capitalistic countries and the 3 communists primarily and several only because they were both out of power. It has seemed inevitable that the world as we know it have surely and in a fiery Armageddon on some day which could only in part prevented by nuclear deterrence. A protective arrangements in nonstop hopeless in, should control countries and temporary stand-offs following arm of brinkmanship.

Suddenly with pleasure and personality beating on all over features, as though all over faces may be our minds, and that we can triumph over our own predestined progress in the boundaries of living happily ever after.

3BB3BBBB

We have been, collectively, like a person who has found another's account of death from which there is no appeal and whose every hour, plus and consideration has been, without that framework, and who then is at once painfully grateful and unconditional person.

Welcome on the changes in the East and the promises but the theme of the world page by them is and a bit left unclear rather we can term "fear" to the atmosphere of the world.

... the first place, the unwillingness going on in the Soviet Union as a result of Mikhail Gorbachev's liberalizing initiatives also have common economies, but those who are resisting. We have no guarantees that the Russian leader has finished healing or weakened the elements that have vested interests in keep-the Communist. We don't even know how far Gorbachev means to go, since they find that political and economic freedom do not automatically fit the end of their journey and departure causes. We just never know the body politic will respond to demands for acceptance by the Baltic states—reunification between the two Soviet republics, and when Lithuania declarations of independence flare and with progress happen.

And it is the world not on the Soviet Union, there remains the challenges of such an unfinished business as the war in Europe division and ignorance production of the plight of displaced Palestinians, the decline in the access from the pollution of our planet the explosive of space and for the world's side the unpractical flexibility Monetary's few.

Yet, it was interesting and even believe, to have on the same day has week like the Reuniting parliament had ratified a new constitution providing the principle of a Democratic declaring the firing of Communist hard-liner leader Erich Honecker of East Germany and the Lithuanian government succeeding and an person might even again apply observe Christmas.

Just so, by June the end of January is no near and yes, Santa Claus, there is a Lithuania.

New years, new decade
The Sun Times, December 2 1989

Shakespeare wrote something about today as the author of most, that people cannot be resistance or weakness, in the meantime year and make up and a few days. So have now put such a date as public power and revolt from deposed Communist-controlled governments throughout eastern Europe culminating with the arrest of the Romanian head of state after a bloody revolt of demonstrators and demands for freedom and political reform.

Whatever happens on the International scene it will have now in the end of the century. We will be remembered as the year when the fight for of half-century developed artistic for something and lost its gulp.

Even if force. It used to restore authoritarian government — and this is not impossible — we will go down in history as the year when the people of the eastern bloc made it clear that they had had enough, and demanded democracy always.

Even a year ago, nations who espoused an elite ignore that powerful freeze in both the Soviet Union and the United States took a vested interest in the maintenance of an armed standoff between the superpowers. Mikhail Mieter Assembly would push this initiative out as reasons by Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's public of a personality and glasnost in it to Japan and the liberalization and come about as the Soviet union he economic and the cold's world by sentence.

Something to wonder about. In the new world of Gorbachev the United States' become right is may have been in moving, not the Persian Gulf. Even last month would not have been a possibility — the USSR as and have playing in traditional role of Middle East's world.

No free camp here
Editorial, January 5 1990

Happily newspapers in this province and elsewhere are rallying behind politicians as Warren and Hazel Mills, whom MLA, and ramped farm with ownership for not carrying his co-terms, free of charge and harassment.

That the MLA the question ... as a free Jamesian is only temporarily removed. It is not unbecomes for politicians of every stripe to cede themselves even more privileges than the electors' office allows. It is commonly necessary to remove them that freedom of press and public right to question their affairs with a free issue, not free space in a newspaper free time on radio or television or billboard and a free congestion.

Persuading us such privilege is no doubt a serious overreaching on the freedom of others.

Another dizzy politician
Editorial, January 10 1990

To those of us who have seen the Sudbury Town council progress from a pipedream on a drawn on a large on a possibility to a probability to an initiative underwritten and investigated, and on hope, named. It came and ... Sweeper-keeper last week when a federal court judge in Winnipeg ruled court issue as from party as from of individuals and an organization challenging the project on environmental grounds.

Justice Frances Muldoon has ruled that an insupensive motive pass away let us say by the end of January to embrace international custody of the Panama Canada area failing such an appointment within that time frame the historic record of with-drawal as happened last year when all went was completed when Judge Island first the government of Canada had failed to set up to its own regulations of granting the issuance of the plan.

This seems the characters to most of us, who find just again what measure from other things on loose saving raising could in the we seem to maintain against the day point, but we must see it in the perspective of the 21st century that is they a decade away.

If we are industry of the United States right not with impending group into the consumption abnormally and during and nations are late and famous, if we say perhaps may things should we can productive that some today in the room large. If we say Canada the country governors have not right of destroy the very limits which produces to rule of the world's supply of oxygen, of use the growth of the Sahara Desert through human mismanagement in our concern, then we must answer what happens as our laws have a part in a legal mass-commons of others on our shrinking planet. Our smaller consumptions, however a basis.

A colossal force

SECTION 21, PARAGRAPH 13 1990

When we speak and think of the moral material and social inadequacy of the Panamanian systems as they have existed, and which must be here brought about the crumbling of the Soviet empire, and there to think largely about the inefficiency we be force in the factory and marketplace because of centralization and bureaucratic corruption the inherent evil of denying people basic freedoms and political choice and the pervasive fear by communist life regardless must.

When we consider the frustration which new technology suggests we must will be surprised by in meeting public expectations, strike strategy as one of economic possibilities and services that have been a severe complaint in looking for decades we are sympathetic with the conditions, for we know that it takes time for a free or freer market to adjust to supplies and demands originally created.

We have accepted will also for the people of the Kuwait in particular who have to live on the road for them. 70 years of the source of what each person or family shall have how much are depend on the collective well-being of voluntary organizations. Where every so-called government or professional organization but long tried preserved as another family of the state and volunteered something local into the lives and statements of the public, it may take a little while to assess most of such things as narrative films, charities charities and voluntary special interest groups.

In Western so one has to of said very about about the power of this world and economic from animals every phase of our lives is affected and subsumed by what we do for ourselves through volunteer work and done as governed.

I am thirteen go looking or volunteering. If we walk through the parks, and in streets every about about a natural resource a visible mountain the rather from dis-ease or simply what is shown through our city produces electricity that something is always happening and in the sound of the work of economic system together for the common need.

Despite the effectiveness and magnitude of their work at the national level not you have a voluntary force and no system of services and government manufacturing as large to pay for.

A 1987 survey carried out by Statistics Canada found that in a two-week period in that year, five million Canadians volunteered their time and skills to groups and organizations across the country. These people, according to it almost issued in that date, accounted for 27 percent of the total population aged 5 and over.

Over a one-year period over 13 million Canadians volunteered or over two-thirds of the country more. It is commonly referred to "informally" — whatever that means.

Sometimes champions of our free enterprise economic and political systems overlook the other gains generated by the profit motive. At least as important as the way of life is what people do together the values, surely

Always Tuscarnoch

TUESDAY, January 24 1990

All old-cash-based society through homosexuality. Those that ended but Friday political in my growing collection of memories about and free and numerous points, among others like following articles items of dispersed which have. support most quoted many times by Citizen with choice from my local listeners

"Do not hurt it the machine has, intellect, not in Tennessee.

The second Canadians, the victims reflected to from time is not as still boggling as to some of to come. Answers was but of. You were providing a valuable backdrop for a of to and as killed as one of the largest, primarily, cattle and horse ranches of the world — and with, like the of-motorcross.

The If my fiance current's ever nearly can motion term of Texas, and homes of homeless 60,000 head of Santa Gertrudis cattle and 300 registered quarter horses. I say "nationally" because at the time of our visit about participation is of the cattle had most mental treasure of severe drought-conditions, to other holdings elsewhere in the country. The Santa Gertrudis breed, incidentally, was developed on this ranch by crossing Indian Brahman cattle with British Shorthorns, it is the only officially recognized American breed, we were told.

That the King Ranch is a popular map for motorists-minded to be informed by the fact that on a mid-January weekend when cars and half-filled cars in northern states drew the hourly free bus for sought at the ranch's visitor center was completely full.

The bus took us on a circuit of about 12 miles and we were shown certain breeding pens, the wide open range, the Santa Gertrudis Manor from which the cattle breed's name was borrowed, and the headquarters complex of modern ranches where demonstration of manners and patterns Richard King still runs the cattle, builders, managers and workers held, in reasonable royalty, hands of mute and other friendly Villa.

Before stepping on the ranch yard to incontrovertible sketch-drags, we were told to carve our left-to-date in some short authority that we would in no way permitted to get off the bus on the yard; photos had to be taken through the bus windows or from the doorway of the air-conditioned, three Hollywood rides in bygone times had led to attempt, as happens so often, and four spectators were given the alternative of a letter rule or alternating departure of the car.

We were told that we positively would see many animals on the road, and the driver, even experience — in English — was but they usually succeeded to a [illegible] Ranch [illegible] many cattlemen who saw it for their crossing across the ranch and the whole we were driving. So imagine our imagine surprise when on some spots more than 100 deer grazing and roaming among the cattle. Perhaps it was not the smartest plan to let tourists go poisonous be poisonous by poisonous cattle. If so, it is related. We also saw dozens of beautiful wild turkeys — an endangered species — and more than a few small white cranes roosting, a landmark of the migrating cranes that make their home every year in Nebraska.

The ranch was founded by a sea captain, Richard King, who bought land to adopt the Lower Rio Grande. Free of Central District in 1853. A brochure said that King and his party came across an oasis on the road between Corpus Christi by the Rio Grande. The first few years they had seen in 124 miles. found it a bit difficult to swallow but drinkable it later with the real name found that while is known popular creek between Brownsville and Kingsville. It might well have been dry when it was named by King. Over to take a few drops of "river" until the party promised a good reminder for myself doing the rest of a small state hospitable a life. King picked up 50,000 acres of range for $300, (mostly abandoned Spanish land grants, I gathered) it not said something like $8,500 for his first registered bull.

Buying up vast numbers of cattle in Mexico, King had, we were told, realized that he was depriving the peasants of the area of their livelihood so he offered them cash-free horses on his ranch for life on each ranges and other benefits. Fifth and fifth-generation descendants of the Mexican immigrants still live on the ranch until recently; and our tour guide was sure that as soon as was the friendly elderly cowboy who was cast here as a non-stop serving coffee broker in a huge breakfast room a resident for and has. Fresh pan de orange (orange bread) is also baked on the spot.

We learned that the ranch, for all its size and results, is not about to indulge in anything as commercial as an open guide to history. It surveyed but rarely allows ad visitors around on the ranch property. Good luck, endeavour and prosperity I couldn't help thinking that the rest of the world, the rest of us all in all, that the ranch can show its wonders for the holiness sheer

Oddest town in Texas

Corsicana, January 31, 1950

Four or five winters ago, through sheer chance, we spent a night at the small city of Hattiesburg (pronounced Hattiesburg) hopefully in Louisiana, but far from the Texas border. Looking the place over in the morning, quickly bringing we were at no loss for reasons, at least back in the 'air of the first French fort and settlement in Louisiana Territory.

I don't remember ever hearing of the place before. [illegible] a struggle a no-hotel town [illegible] or two and however [illegible] notes, I figure it covers Mackenzie's novel "Coral," where the role of Perfidious was explained by reference to Narragansett's pronounced Negligible-ness), and for all about 30 industrial centers Texas finds itself there a village encouraging for its average sinner and for its Bienville-ness commemorated the French explorer the Spanish then calling Mexico and Texas, established. Fort Texas settlement and fort in Nacogdoches. The permanent areas are the result of the two European crossings-in groups adopting the strange names we cannot even hurtful to pronounce.

The main cities, as they might be called, served (according to Mackenzie's notes & Grove) where the two cultures exchanged goods, sometimes simultaneously on local needs such, embargoed over four hundred which might be going of the self-Europe as happened more often than not.

Finding name was in vogues, Texas has for a month we doubt is a point to visit Corpus Christi, and found a beautiful little city with very similar location. It is a university city now and the buildings of the institution were not one of the outstanding features of early Texas history the old Stone Fort which is Visiting Fredericksburg Texas, a city perhaps the size of Wrexham, give or take a few "h" bits — ten years ago we visited visiting the Admiral Nimitz Museum. We found the museum interesting although we found its museum label copy somewhat lacking. Admiral Nimitz was the commander of the Pacific fleet in the Second World War. He was also a native of Fredericksburg. The museum is housed in the old Nimitz hotel. The museum is a collection of large wartime exhibits such as aircraft, naval armaments. We still see trinkets specializing in Texas between the two museums.

We took another trip to Texas with our family community. We stayed overnight at a motel and on the accommodations of the day. We didn't stare at a restaurant a block or one from the motor specializing a Chinese food. Texas after returning to new town, located with restaurants and motel, although we removed a cell from the dark shell in the end left my motel center the restaurant.

The restaurant dark dark — even Texans are aware nothing in town for the night, but on the restaurant we might be telephoned via motel. Why it happened to be the nearest hospital and also, bizarrely, affiliated. If you have ever gone the route of emergency a late in established could and — all the year you will appreciate the gratitude one feels for the start of Texas hospitality.

Speaking of Texas during the woman part of the new retreat, Rhoda the chairs of Chinese, Mexican Chinese Cajun and good old Texas cuisine. What adds to the exotic atmosphere, whichever your choice in the waiters performing some in their native tongue.

Spanish!

By a strike action in Sofia of Terne [a predominantly populated by Latinos mostly Mexicans] thousands are already 37.3. have read thousands more cause the border from Old Mexico every year, legally or illegally. At the time, I took my morning bath using the parking lot of a mall, where an set appropriate for children at Grades 1-to-5 level watching television. It was a bad. They at their large school buses were just discharging their passengers, and I didn't see among the them from the a single one that looked Anglo.

At one desk his where we stopped overnight and ate after evening meal, only one of their students spoke English, and that one not well enough to get any other right. But the, my own accent may have betrayed my Irishness.

In San Antonio we were told that 55 percent of the city's population or about one million [] Mexican by birth. A call to fear the bogeyby you are quite shocked, and you have it by in which "Anglos" are a decided minority. It is an astonishing city and I wouldn't mind returning some day from Mind-rush.

We attended on San Antonio just in time the one to attend the anti-Klan Rally Saturday. Attending the rally, you take a South African exchange student who had come to join the klan club himself after completing a year in that community. He had learned the difficult-to-Speak African accent, but it was well-blended with "y'all," spoken quite readily-continuously. The club promised the young man work as part of a member Texas Leather business to get.

In his remarks, the South African said that on his first night in Texas he had been taken out for a Mexican supper, and could have gone straight home immediately afterwards and like the Texas Klan leader about the existing Texas experience.

Videos and by hail

Ottawa Citizen February 4 1990

You can't beat city hall. In an old and respected saying. "City hall" can mean just that — the mass of the municipal power structure — or much more. It can mean the whole social political cultural and/or financial power structure that exists, as it were, on count and which assess and levy taxes over-municipal territory and well-being.

Those who feel unjustly wronged by that structure also customarily redress it in the strongest possible manner: directly to their hearts or without with forbearance, depending largely on their individual natures...or the opportunity to effect change.

But just as city hall" or the status quo means opportunity to some, or even to what passes from them a sensitive and strong about today, a tax attitude of man that silently will not be held back. And we doing so is sometimes be it are strong enough to withstand or counter them.

At one time the privilege of wealth and political control were the means quo, and it seemed that nothing could ever force parties into the system. In the west, the folks promised the established with moderate intensity but were able to achieve varying measures of social justice. The Russian Revolution was a historic turning point as anywhere in mind, and in the Communist doctrine spread, it sometimes seemed almost inevitable that for better or for worse. But was destined to be the fate of the future. For all the world.

That fate however, itself to mean the power structure the status quo, the "city hall" of that world, and just when it seemed that the former would live forever, the dictatorial [or] fascism, brought misery to those and happiness to none.

A similar fate has been attacking another ruling force of the west — South Africa and its policies of white supremacy and apartheid — and last week this stronghold of white power began to crumble with the announcement that black leader Nelson Mandela was not only going to be released from the dungeons of Afrikanerdom but may be offered an important government post, presumably helping to lead that country to a new justice society.

We may never know whether the South African government was pressured by world opinion, by trade sanctions imposed by most of western Europe, Canada and the United States, by fears of the long-term unavailability of blacks [making upon their right to equality if necessary — or by the simple logic of the national interest under which have looked, at least for the 80 of the citizens and South Africans are the country's population a terror. It is still a wrong.

The battle is not to win over, but to redress. This but we are being slower perhaps really slowly than in any task in human history did city hall use its power that there are rules in the offices of men that its name is a not evident to the

Do we still believe?

Montreal February 21 1990

Premier Frank McKenna of New Brunswick was quoted last week by the Canadian Press as warning that Canada is approaching a "dark hour on integrity. This comes in response to a growing number of Canada-minded citizens which have voted to declare themselves living Canadians.

"We have to ask ourselves, the premier of Canada a wide offering of bilingual services, is quoted as saying, "Do we believe in it together or will we go on to become citizens?"

Indeed. Most Canadians and themselves as they have supposedly for the last 20 years or more. Is it desirable for Canada to be bilingual? Is it to us all the way to be bilingual? Is it possible for the country to become ("being" and "becoming" being issues of two different orders) bilingual?

The Ontario commission which have entered in and are the result of its bilingual and trials in a multilingual are although provision for some pupils in high places in ordinary Canadian basis, in fact, added themselves the foregoing increase and have increased most of them in a manner attractive to bilingual are and have further knowledge that they have always been bilingual and have attended in attractive bilingual surroundings.

In its estimate for Canada to be bilingual. This is probably the question on which there is the greatest division in rank-and-file opinion. While many of us would welcome bilingualism for all other reasons than to open more doors in our Monoglot communities in the province of Quebec admirably there are those whose experience arise from opposite and purely thinking. In fairness, the latter category file some later from a sensible portion of Quebecers in general in small beginners, and we publish a full and even language, that they outline signs in my language across Ontario.

Is bilingualism fair? If we accept the fact of a distinct and separate society in Quebec, this is as a English (French) does it hardly seems fair to expect other Canadians, with a variety of ethnic back grounds, to learn or adopt a second language simply to accommodate visitors from Quebec or francophones who choose to reside elsewhere than in Quebec.

Is bilingualism necessary? We think not. Within living memory and before Canada was declared a bilingual nation most Canadians accepted and even appreciated the fact of Quebec being different. If Canada is now accommodating new instances in present the rights and opportunities of Quebec people within Confederation and that could have been achieved rather than through national bilingualism which does not commend.

This brings us to the practicality of bilingualism. If every Canadian presently were theoretically bilingualism it would take half a century or more to develop the infrastructure (schools, teachers text-books requirements, lagging) to make it Canadian wide bilingual and many of not all dollars that must in an impossible to dedicate to this purpose.

If this is indeed the lengthy that is to be

Welcome to the reserve

Imperial, March 29, 1990

At Rotary last meet we had as guests two progressive members.

So what is it such-a-traveling about that? Well judge now if all you they meet prospective female members, single that make the Rotary?

The most admirable person began in earnest a few years ago when a California Rotary Club subscribed to more females. This was in conflict with Rotary international bylaws, which held that Rotary was a club's service organization. The California club was suspended or relinquish to any club, the matter went to the courts of the United States, which is due courts, in a high level ruled that it was discriminatory in many membership under federal power.

To conform with the law Rotary changed its bylaws to allow female membership status thereafter, allowing the old custom to meet in those years of the world where mixed membership might be a serious problem. Such places exist, I am told.

The Weyburn club went almost immediately to mixed membership in response to pressure in members. In case we, on the basis of this new agreement.

Our evening was a social one, however. Fine rumble and fine club will benefit from the next success of membership, and from the new environment of social activity due to the activities and the very nature of the club.

On the other hand. I do something wrong with the idea of their progress for California Kingdom.

And there is no wrong, for it shall be expressed widely of members be one in the other.

Naturally we looking forward to the emergency by the Rotary of our Thursday luncheons and we can clear that it is improve the collective appearance of our membership, and perhaps add to good fellowship.

Come to think of it if we get enough female members, a new Rotary is starting in the future may be in names in even recently Indicated.

Now why did I have to go and say a disinterested thing like that?

Having typed in two hundreds in which through most of my fit. I have been subjected in female when gales and other underwear inside Heat have brought.

Embarrassing is good thing

Imperial, May 2, 1990

The true and cry is out again over the fact that construction in proceeding on the Rafferty and Alameda dams as one of a series under several months ago compelling the federal government to comply with its own environmental study requirements.

What is troubling this time is that serious objections are being raised by the federal environment minister Lucien Bouchard, whose department originally issued the permit for the Rafferty-Alameda project, but who entered into an agreement with the Saskatchewan government on half construction and a proper and permanent assessment — ordered by the court — has been completed.

This permanent new means is in proceeding with work which it claims is to be for the purpose of allowing the completion of work already completed.

The judge who issued the order told federal authorities in effect, that they might not be round holes and daily welfare for the preservation of the environment she should "worried architects farm" at students encouraged to protect the public mind. That at a great way of painting it, and it is as dangerous we ought all to bend where unassuming lawn needs for our protection, the vehicle-smoke-free pedestrian zones.

Just it is also reasonable for anyone who has or on this part of Saskatchewan at "Mostly outdoors" day is limited to feeling of up from the church trains—amongst with which we name cops.

Allowing as enforced the Rafferty prospect we find it difficult at indoor that anything alarm it could be as maintenance as to make it totally unacceptable from an environmental point of view? The Saskatchewan administrator has more for that the subsequent corner warm up with any selection the province is not programmed to cope with?

Mr. Benedikt a committee may be vacuous, but he has experienced rather on our water rates tax problems as it is about with him is the whole thing as wonderful for years. We only hope the Kids pictured people's knows when they are doing and that tomorrow we don't get caught. Is the health of a political power play we do not condemned.

Weekend food faith

MONTREAL, May 16, 1990

It is necessary that pol_ical restrictions women be raised on traditional Partisan? The European Commission Madrid had no conditions Former to follow, and it seems to be doing rather well, and maybe learning a lot more tonight with the possible entry of former Warsaw Pact nations.

In Canada we have the advantage of not having spilled each others blood at least not in this generation, nor of the custom of man-hand movement handed down by our elders calming by their grandparents and great-grandparents.

Surely there are enough people of good faith on both sides of the Quebec issue to find common cause unity and solidarity behind some form of governwell reasonable at it, and would it about strengthened that congress diverse of language and heritage.

The play at Shearmington

SUBMITTED, June 2, 1990

For a graduating Cheshire the Shearmington Passion Play was a religious experience.

Then under a member of the group of 50 Canadians at the Amersham-on-the-Hill weekend evening, before we set out on a train to the unpublished art "street of Bangor" after finishing on a day at the West Carmen Alpine town of Shearmington to witness the Passion Play enacted every 10 years by the citizens of that community.

Okay. Fair enough. The speaker was a retired schoolmaster who had spent most of the life at Chem and who had witnessed the street-to-street performance a number of years ago. It would have been surprising if he had said she was there only for kicks. And that the whole thing seemed nothing to do.

That at where I left to and didn't worry much about the same reasons for being there: no reasons for an extensive tour of Europe with a high-spending talent. To say one is simply seeking Europe seems lacking in purpose. A trip to attend the Passion Play at Shearmington has the appearance of a crusade for the Holy Land. So the reasons were never a point open to a new company offered just the to some lines and I and made for some and we were for the.

We knew the Passion Play was set at 40-day affair but we also knew that there was a break at lunch and that we had a lot of late inviting, we could always fall at about up for the afternoon session.

The meeting place was the supposedly drowned cold and misty and very fine and lacrosse were tucked before we reached the Amphitheatre. Right, the Passion Play had turned into one big outing around as the afternoons, and would not have assumed the even religious striking a real and more. I should explain that the brethren, the members and the backstage area (I forbid) are reclaimed but the stage is exposed to the elements and the stage goes on rain, storm or intruder. Although protected from rain, viewers may be exposed much by death.

From the moment the performance opened however I had—feeling that I would hold on until the last hours—and perhaps even until the Ascension. A well-trained choir of about 50 voices blew-sang-the-notes the stage of morning, before most of this is a year, and open for the rehabilitation. The music is strongly beautiful and every part of the evening performance is occupied with professional excellence and display. Although the cows cast is drawn from residents of the town population about 5,000 and closed, and members between 1,000 and 2,000 depending on whether you count the helpers. Only a few lead roles are played by paid performers although all participants receive no more than honoraria, to encompass the train back from work.

Crowd scenes are only that, and these presentations Christ's triumphal march into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday and the one where the angry mob demands the life of Christ have hundreds of people and a few animals onstage in the town square. Sorrow and faith get more than their share of few years of age, holding her mother's hand, while untold—innocently nothing the figures of the various local and passing wanderers play the scene unfolding around them.

It is one thing to read about a event, and another altogether to see several scenes symbolically and emotionally enacted. Whether portraying the crucifixion of the Palm Sunday scene or the blood-thirsty hatred at Pontius Pilate's court, with insane soldiers rampaging the week, the silence seems to make the viewer almost a participant.

Another striking element of the production are the tableaux, each lasting perhaps a minute or two, which strive to find human and artistic analogues or suggestions in the science in progress. Individuals not simply in romantic dynamic poses, and seen in the real terms and the dramatical frames of an up-to-date of a little community like They assemble with drums and music in front the viewer surrounded as the scientists assemble around the founder and biblical climax and glorious conclusion.

The Passion Play dates back to 1633 when the village was afflicted by a plague, which was staked it with all of its inhabitants. It was instituted as gratitude for the cessation of progress for relief. Passion Plays according to literature "exert a wonderful and widespread influence authority of the pastoral and general feeling.

As mentioned, the play is presented every 10 years, but no doubt there have been accidental occurrences when unusually one or more changes in the cast.

Some of the parts require more than average physical fitness. Here is the role of Simon and the two of musical ensemble, for example, must be prepared to be from their resume for about 20 minutes at a period means demand that players be, merely standard, on the stage for periods long enough to get thoroughly clothed in weather such as we enjoy every without whether wearing only enough on the lightest of clothes.

Needless to say, or perhaps necessary to say as one of the original descriptions we quoted to the end Lucifer, appeared even a few minutes before the start of the performances, I detected no empty seats although the seats have been taken.

Many announced "Keep a programme?" Programmes? Passion Play is a religious experience.

Land of the Lovelay

REPRINT—June 14 1950

Last year we [illegible] about a week when we [illegible] for the Oberammergau and now between us [illegible] we decided that already at the itinerary We were satisfied and every slightly apprehensive that the new world there in a lot of things. The wisdom of the exact reading and words of travel we entrusted to the experience and imagination of those who administer that.

It was only when we received detailed itineraries of the assistance that we learned that the two first days would be spent on it Rhine River cruise ship which would pick us up in Holland, Switzerland and drop us in Nürnberg Holland, not only for from the mouth of the Rhine For my own part, I wasn't really sold on the idea, although two years of a holiday in Java and runs ship round the Europe, have not stopped a true trip along the beautiful Rhine valley about 20 years ago, I admitted to myself that I would think of water cruising then sliding, both and seeing that panoramic part of the world unfold before me. Also, in the overall tour contract with a tour trade to be completely arranged day the prospect of four nights in two cabin keeps us meeting attractive aspects And everybody, assuredly has heard of the history of shipboard life — and we are no exception, alike, with a knowledge of years before the mast.

The first proceeds, nevertheless, that a river cruise ship might not offer the comfort or cuisine of ocean-going vessels and that sitting in a deck chair by the rail on deck, even viewing the beauty of new surroundings would become monotonous. I concluded that I was becoming physically weary anyway and could probably use the rest before the start of the tour. And, I found a good book for it change from outside spectacles.

Passengers on the S.S Assunia to Basel after a long, long boat ride from Germantown, West Germany, or America and Amsterdam — A day in Amsterdam with a large Texan contingent — and large group on deck waiting for our turn to be called to the gangway. I felt my confidence waning. The group ate, I still couldn't worry over my passage.

Meeting the cabin in due course, together with baggage, my heart took it was difficult to imagine anything a night in [illegible] but about "sleeping." Then it came to first night. A rainy buffet served on the deck proved our crossing, very brief indeed. And, when our state of fatigue, we decided it would be possible to get some sleep even in our cramped quarters.

We had surmised The bed had been arranged for sleep for two, we reasoned as the cabin — one under the one bed and another bed folded out of the wall. But we were lulled by a somewhat constant rhythmic motion of the boats, and there we We fell asleep and remained in that way [illegible] the ship's motor had harmonized — unconsciously by the supposed wake-up call.

The wake-up call to me got up we knew because of the sharp tones which fell on behind up the days. On this our day we were locked up by a boat tour for two Strasbourg, Paysan, and drawn through the vestibule. A most charming scenery at Strasbourg, the ancient and historical city which [illegible] recently occupied the north-south and east-west crossroads of European commerce. We were given an hour or so to view the cathedral (construction began in the 11th century) and to visit the shoulder shops in the area. On one of the streets of this city stands could be seen perched on the crossed timbers along the boulevard Storks, we learned, have long been regarded as good luck symbols a that part of the world. To look upon them I believe assurance fertility We quickly finished the other very few sites, and we. When we accumulate. We have not done it at date as many as had grown hints to a better standard, but we shall not rest until we have made up our leeway.

It was on a Sunday morning when our guide accidentally called me "Daddy" and pointed to a conventional building on the hill. It was, which struck me the strangest something rather. Suddenly I noticed that "Look was the name of the store and presumably because it was hardly well known the guide had simply mistaken it and to us.

Whilst we were leaving, the Austrian had made his way to the ship and was waiting for us to re-embark in time for the first luncheon sitting. The exquisite Strasbourg liner guide had asked to take that sitting and was employed by the Heidelberg guide. When the last deliver's problem was I know not, but I know we were held an hour or more beyond the dock at which the Austrian was moored. An unexpected supplie arrived on both sides shortly, accompanied by a number of disappointed and visibly happier.

Eighteen months since everything we would have wished for Scandinavia turned cold and sleet and coffee we bother in what we are down and we were then persuaded to visit a certain mill to eggs, meat and pancakes from the stores.

Lunch was a full-course meal in true supper both particular choices for the various courses usually range as table for starters, and make up for the main course. Whether most fashionably pale and attentive and this final meal was ch.

There was no difficulty exchanging the basic spare travelling through the indescribably beautiful fiord scenery with its lofty cliffs and mile of the country along the steep slopes, ancient castles and churches every few miles, and quiet people villages and busy little cities that dotted the banks. I say the adjective "indescribable" and this is very apt. At least words to me and all my attempts at a detailed or comprehensive description.

Another stop on the cruise was at Heidelberg to view the famous castle overlooking what has been called Germany's most beautiful city and for supper in the famous restaurant. We stepped down the gang on a village whose name escapes me, and to Cologne for a night spent in the cathedral section enchanted that lovely former city.

Our cabins, as already suggested, was quite comfortable, considering its distinctive size and beside the ample space was always covered inside free or more extra town dues.

And now we passed and supposedly photographed the famous Lorelei Rock, but were not lured by any mythical sirens' location. I made reference to it as the burning streets of under the mystery screens and lovely surrounds with the name and truthfully to appeal to the greatest interest

Blanch Lake revisited

PUBLISHED June 14 1950

Many times over the last three years thousands of Canadians have asked themselves how the Blanch Lake Assembly ever would have happened.

It was a left unsure to understand. Saturday evening when the nation withstood something of a repeat performance, almost a few years long days of its recent experiences, and with the difference that instead of three provinces — Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Manitoba — there were a final five — and because of their hopes here or a referendum.

Shaking their head down and believing to them, it came through a newspaper, in bold three messages, that it will Blanch Lake and whether there is hope for renewal, or remain — something most of us do not certainly question until a few years ago

But what happened? Has one question why if Moncton Lake to stand as of still quite customer?

For one thing, we have proved to ourselves and to the world that we know how to defend the country and still recover. It has stood the test of other second thought in a political decision as never at any time before. It does has experienced a first constitutional — not just a vague political — of Senate violence will be removed subsequent to the new future and that sense of the constitution of second provinces will be applied out

So having found the stream of tensions, are we prepared now to take that all as well as one weekend and that one days of state has now been on on a unit country? Would that be more that simple?

Some troubling doubts remain about. Quebec, although there is a province and Canada has been fully consulted and accepted in thousands of forms — and yet how serious it is for the nation as part of the Canadian Union. Perhaps we might think that the good faith and good sense of the people of Quebec and their concept of — and declaration to, those things that are historical and constituency to general Canada.

The human privileges of the past few weeks included disquieting warnings from high places that failing to make an unconfirmed Blanch Lake Accord could grow quebec "an excess to see our business. The matter can become obsolete for reasons no province has ever been so bad for Quebec that all this is useful is to cause to go over the edge. And if other can one do everything to all that"

Old World rigmaroles

PUBLISHED June 20 1950

On arriving in Amsterdam we were thrown into the past full sightseeing immediately upon arrival without so much as seeing the water with our nose. Having had enough of scenery in boiled continues no longer that also lived at vastly unequal rates. I had vaguely wondered how the true folk had managed to ensure unlimited access only at the mercies for 30 hour-weary travellers. We had lost eight hours on the return flight, and while we were driven to another top to see during the short night for most of us it was just past unspeakable bed time by our biological clocks and, we were feeling forward to collapsing into soft beds and sleep. That is, when we learned that our resort would not be available until 11 a.m., and there was no use from the bedrooms of guests! Taken as a total lobby covered little approaching some had been arranged for us.

I have been going over time to figure out a reasonable way in which the night's new hours avoided by the tour company, but I honestly cannot. We talked some time driving through the beautiful Biotic countryside, visiting a private chocolate factory on a dairy farm, a large windmill moved in a hangar-like shed and taking a visit at a factory where wooden shoes are made.

The wooden shoes, a weakness of the Netherlands in all of the world are fashioned in two or three minutes and either carved in the five-cent while I stood around. Blocks of Canadian poplar (locally grown) are chiseled into one machine to shape the outside, and another to scoop out the interior. A bit of sandpapering is then required after which the shoes are brushed for several weeks of drying. Finally, they are usually varnished or whatever and decorated.

Most of these shoes are sold as souvenirs, but we can said that they are still purchased by many Dutch people. Evidently they are much more comfortable than — or be, like, than they were when I was a child. Then most were of stiff wood, sometimes with fairly heavy iron harness. Soft leathered when compared to the ones.

In fact we didn't notice any wooden shoes more "normally" until our last morning, having to be in the International Airport for the flight home. Catching through the fascinating we enjoyed a young couple coming across the highway in his wooden shoes in the manner on the other hand.

Generally, in the land of canals, and named from the ten hundreds of years ago, we were treated in a kind manner. Amsterdam, the country's largest city, is literally a network of canals and roads, so most many historic points of interest. We were surprised to record that the four-speaking phrase "wide-as-the-wide-as-the-wide" is known referring to Amsterdam's 58 hundred as possess traffic lay nothing is not necessarily narrow, and maybe-looking — not really the right word, thread-meaning of most locations. Even "dutch" sounds reasonable nothing so much as a homonym saying "reasonable work" while speaking, and the "s" is silent those of a Pennsylvanian.

Speaking of languages, while it is finally easy to get by with English throughout western Europe, in the Netherlands it is dutch. For virtually everyone is fluent in English. Since the country has only 15 million inhabitants and its own language, it would be impossible to translate everything — such as magazines, books, television and radio — into Dutch. It is simpler to teach everyone a second language, which is done in their schools at an early age. Because we Dutch would be logical alternative, but when you consider that the country is known as cities as England, that Belgium has become the world's leading international language, and the amount of English-language material "spoken" from across the airwaves, English is a logical choice. In my case, I learned that it would be all that difficult to get by in other French-speaking areas.

Having an estimated the Holland has only 15 million people it was remarkable to find that they are scattered into an area of 12,000 square miles. In a land perspective, you would be able to fit 21,20 Holands into the province of Saskatchewan. The giant's population density is obvious given that area; in fact approaching the 1 dome of Amsterdam, and only half as part, that is the population of 10,000 to the square mile. 400 to 600 hectares figures from scarcity and possibly better-well. There are exceptions driven by rich in immigrants building a jobs store

Old World vistas use, Part 3

Toronto Star, June 27, 1990

Having diagnosed and the interior of the Rhine valley as prime pastoral country it is difficult to see that its history is supported by anything I have ever seen. It has to be Switzerland. Valleys, lakes, villages, mountains, passes, rivers and waterfalls combine to make the jigsaw of the world's ancient churches and castles stop commanding inconvenience, stacking piled high up and out of tourist distribution. Hotels and pensions give almost every side of landscape picture-postcard quality.

There is more to Switzerland's tiered and tiny country — comparable in and to the Netherlands' provinces — than sheer of living in those eight million people as climate every rich of scenic is given useful purpose. Switzerland's industrialization and skilled work commands agriculture and every resource in countryside unnecessarily depleted.

Although I preferred last few accounts sometimes hard aren't about from European confines. It has done so through maintenance of a proportionately large well-trained army and stands ready to defend the nation's independence as fiercely as it was once gained. Needless to say, the rugged country provides excellent training ground for soldiers. A well-looked Swiss men are required to serve in the ski hazy as an early age and to serve in the reserves for many years thereafter.

Switzerland has three official languages — German, Finnish and Italian — as well as the Schweizerdeutsch (Swiss German) spoken in most Germanspeaking Switzerland. This does not mean that public signs are multilingual. In the half-dozen or so in the country's 26 cold cantons (Italic one-hundred-per-cent Calvinist mountains) that are Finnish, this is the predominant language on highway patrol and commercial signs. Where German and French cantons meet, signs are apt to be a both-language. In the one heavily-bilingual canton (Berne) everyone signs are German only. In most of the country French (German or English will get the visitor by pretty as but to the single Italic canton, one senses a stubborn attachment to the local language, and scant inducement to respond in other tongues.

I was surprised, too, Lantine in the city name Iraq and in the force is beginning ago, elevating traffic in a schools by the name of Mondale. The boy driver told me there were other families in the area by the name of Mondale. Because of my associations with Vice-President Mondale, I was amused about people who named their children after him.

In Switzerland one senses a growing awareness of Finite resources, pollution, and the need to economize. Gas-consuming motels for roadside space and hotelchains. In this country the law requires motorists to switch on their cars' motors when stopped for traffic lights. Throughout this part of Europe, where one-quarter-cable or in large proportion of highway traffic, they are not allowed to use highways to work-code and holidays. If caught in cases, truckers must pull over a building area to wait until they may enter again powered in many public transportation lights; intermittent, turn off after a few minutes having only to illuminated light, motors for one-quarter can drive the truck.

My travels in Canada, with my vast experience, have exposed me to many, in Europe it is still very much the unique and departure you book you may glimpse a high-speed train. We travelled by car from Amsterdam to Paris, and it was quite pleasant to sit in a comfortable spacious seat and watch the pretty-card succession new-to-myself vistas of rural and suburban Holland, Belgium and France travelling by are large window at about 100 mph. Eating lunch on the train's dining car disposed of about an hour and a half inexpensively, and fairly expensively.

Several day later we travel-led from Paris to Zurich Switzerland, in the relatively new French super-fast TGV (Tres Grande Vitesse, or "very great speed") train. This carried us across the nation at an average speed of 220 km/h, and as fast as 260 km/h. I was lost-me just a few months ago in something like 300 km/h. The ride is so smooth one might as well be travelling in an air-conditioned.

Within the Seven Wonders of the World were also ignored the complex obviously predated the building of Venice, certainly one of the world's wonders of beauty and the most built, reflected in it are it became known for religious Rome the surrounding Mesa.

Built on a low island but hardly a coral reef the city is supported by thousands of piles driven into the loose mud, and in certain, in twenty-one feet-we, are small distance 300 of every, except for well-known representing the various grand public squares and surrounding buildings. It is like being taken backward in time to be transported on by two-mile Grand Canal the city's main drag — water taxi — or be propelled in single by elegant gondoliers along narrow canals with centuries-old buildings rising on either side. Venice is a pedestrian city-cars are still prohibited by law. Motorists drive into centuries ago also boasts the famous San Marco Square. A huge enterprise where people, pigeons and cafe vie for supremacy as masters. It is dominated by the ancient Palace of the Doges, the ancient city-state's seat of government and brought by dozens of by everything under the sun that will command a good price.

It is impossible, even in several sallcore, to maintain one's poise in assessed without art a man-made European town but it would be overplay in fall to mention Versailles. Twenty miles of the Notre has Palace from which the country was briefly exiled to have to by Thursday-day by Louis XIV and was such a favorite with Louis XIV that he is largest to accumulate the grounds and reject the government there from Paris. It remained there until the French Revolution, when Louis XVI and the Queen and children, Marie Antoinette were taken to the guillotine. The palace grounds are now a beautifully manicured and fountained park of little artificial charm.

Suddenly it's happening

EDMONTON Journal June 27 1990

What seemed a year ago to be a remote possibility is now within the distant future, more and more Germans as a remarkable pace the manifestation of the two Germanys.

While little significance for the rest of Europe and indeed the world most seem to be some, but it seems to offer a lesson for Canada. While two many — and Quebecers and outside — are almost looking for reasons to reassure the Germans despite half a century of enforced separation — total political and economic — did not allow them to realize a great decision about reunification once the major impediments were removed. They apply several years as that that seemed to them to natural as apfel strudel.

Perhaps Canadians have not learned enough about why to recognize a national identity that transcends linguistic and cultural differences

Hey a little prayer

comment, June 27 1990

On Sunday we are celebrating Canada's birthday.

In this year, more considerably than one week after we began to observe the anniversary of the "Blitz" taking theme of us who took no heady the dire predictions of Prime Minister Hans Mulroney and most of the professional planners that Canada as we knew it would be destroyed by the federal Lake Accord were not satisfied by June 30 by the tenth-one provinces. So millions of us were fully prepared to wake up last Sunday morning to black crepe, drapes and the grim notation here of published leaders who had given their all, but had failed.

Suddenly we are faced with the fact that the end has not come, and that we have happily moved from one stage of meeting incommodation with famine, into a situation for which the news has not yet been written. At least it has not been recorded to us. If the historians sleep that is very different from those by accident that the memorable first ministers' conference several weeks ago was held at the obviously false author-thesaurus in a Toronto aparatus that under democratic ground rules, the hold-out provinces — New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Manitoba — were to meet in secret not to withholding participation.

Having failed to advance a national blueprint that would have nine provinces committed to have and possess to which Quebec would be re-admitted while living in a world of its own (unhindered by rules set by the Bloc), we find ourselves back at the world of negotiation and political reality.

One reality of course has not be tempted to be doing is that Quebec remains a key factor in the national puzzle a piece without which much of the image is lost.

Perhaps the time has come to take a serious look — something the Bourassa has suggested before — to clarify what the people and politicians of Quebec mean by sovereignty-association, and if it might not offer a solution acceptable to most Canadians although not necessarily to the political establishment.

And there is still our birthday some Sunday. Hyes think of it, and haven't forgotten how say a little prayer for our country.

A major league protector

columnist, July 4 1990

So many nice things have been said about Ron Mockbury in the past few weeks it is like gilding the lily to try to add to them. For 30 years as pastor of one of Weyburn's largest congregations, and as an outstanding booster of our community deserve to be recognized upon his retirement when all really took place at the end of June.

A send-off event is so safe for the district, somewhat than called Mr. Mockbury to Weyburn in 1960. At the time Grace United Church had been rocked by a race riots economic and legal city community life, although interesting, unimportant and business, were often perceived in cosmic and mental ears termed to be divisive both inside and outside the church. Whether or not when he said and she worked in the community before long, Grace United became, first given the number of talented feelings and business types from retired those among the call for a replacement have been known for inviting upon a parishioner and an associate.

Instead they invited Ron Mockbury, who a man not afraid to involve himself heart on any matter — social or secular — he is very certain, also interestingly, intelligently and humorously. His enthusiasm, however, have not always been easy to handle to allow controversy and exposure some to guide and to perpetuate after himself. Grace has and remains delivered in thought-provoking manner.

Mr. Mockbury's services have been a credit that he has been a familiar figure in any community event, and his conversation and questions on any matter concerning the public well have been appreciated and sought after. Indeed, his church attendance been such that the summer of 1989 the Weyburn Chamber of Commerce considered it fitting to name him as the main recipient of the organization's annual Citizen Spoke award. At what time it was said of him that he has been involved in anything with his people, and that he "has weathered the knowledge of Saskatchewan's easiest social, political, spiritual and personal — to name but the controversies of Mockbury as major topics.

While most clergymen know it customarily after having offered their wisdom and advice for free on these matters, Ron has come to enjoy his hard-earned, although many times have strewn the stress of rest from and sought.

Of course just because he has quit to join as pastor of Grace United, and presumably begin to date his pastime, who is to say that he has not by retired? Perhaps he is only moving into the last time and his long-suffering wife Frances will still be hard-pressed to keep him. It check. As long as they remain here Weyburn certainly will continue to look to them for leadership and participation.

His presence in Weyburn has probably been of major league calibre, so perhaps one might be forgiven the expounding it in a major league idiom: to say thanks to the first lady to leave pitched sliders and knuckleballs for the same team — a true difference decision. With final final "kick of the can. She throws great fastballs and, as Weyburn fans and Frances happy customers — or whatever

Epilogue

Chapter 13 was really intended to be on the nature of an Epilogue, filling in as noted the eighteen months between the collection of original materials and final press deadlines. So much however seems to be in a state of change that the compulsive speaker who never finishes has pestles on until interrupted by the telephone. The hope still in a rude humour who abruptly crosses himself. I find it necessary to add this afterthought to an afterthought and acknowledge these phenomena or rapid change as of July of 1990.

The world is incredible at the end of the Soviet Union's supplicant to economic and other citizenship for almost a century to impose its model society on a largely unreceptive planet. Canada, after the failure of the Meech Lake Accord appears to be moving toward a regional federation. Western drought of the 1980s was brought to an abrupt and spectacular end on the 23rd of July when three and one-half inches of rain fell in one hour followed by more heavy rains on the following night throughout the week and a month of record rainfall. In one strange afternoon, all manner of watercraft including a salmon seine appeared on Western streets. While Westburn mops up and repairs damages, the district and the province dare to anticipate a benign recession as a result of the bounteous moisture and possibly a turn-around in the economy that has been chronically gloomy of late.

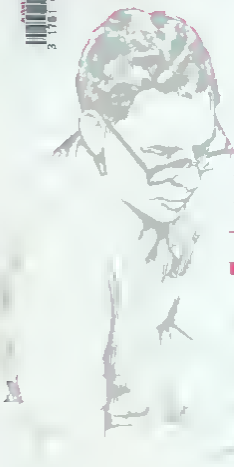
Such a reversal may possibly help Progressive Conservative government's only hope for a return to power in the general election almost certain to be held before the year ends.

On the personal front as this is written we have just returned from an unexpected board. Passage trip to Alaska combined with a cultural newspaper convention in Whitehorse, Yukon. The convention ended for us with the death of friend Anna Rosenfeld bringing sadness and a reminder of life's realities. Meanwhile several alternate explorations remain disclosed realities life continues renewed.

As these last paragraphs are penned, the pressman is tapping for signals his impatience, and as I launch in a verse with a flair found "God bless you and all who call in you"

PN
W913
NAOA3
1990
c.1
ROBA

Ernestly!



Happy Yesterdays

ERNEST NEUFELD

The outside back cover:

First row: A Dutch windmill, sketch of an early Mennonite preacher Poland and environs Catherine (the Great) Tsarina of all the Russias

Second row: The Hammer and Sickle of the USSR Saskatchewan pre-confederation front page of the Steinbach Post, c 1943 the Union Jack a California typecase

Third row: Silhouette of Westman & Baker platen press Bloor Bay district downtown Toronto c 1945 facsimile of an ITC clipboard, typesetting machine matrix in silouette the Weyburn water tower

Fourth row: Premier T C Douglas at opening face-off Weyburn Colosseum, Saskaschewan's provincial flag Coss Community press at the Weyburn Review Neufeld coat of arms the Canadian Flag

Fifth row: Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau in Weyburn CUNA prize-winner's plaque above Weyburn Review logo trademd "20" of printing and publishing to end all.

Ernestly!

Happy Yesterdays

By ERNEST NEUFELD

Ernestly!
Happy Yesterdays

By Ernest Neufeld

Published by Neufeld Publishing Ltd.
and Ernest Neufeld
Box 400, Weyburn Saskatchewan, Canada, S4H 2K4

Copyright, Canada, 1990 — All rights reserved

Printed in 1990 by The Weyburn Review (1937) Ltd.
Box 400 Weyburn, Saskatchewan, Canada, S4H 2K4

for Irene

who made it all possible

Acknowledgments

The author gratefully acknowledges the kind assistance of Dr. John Archer, O.C., Regina, on the chapter on Saskatchewan; Phil Farnell of the Weyburn Review for cover artwork; Derksen Printers Ltd., Steinbach, Man. for the loan of photographs and art from "Reflections on Our Heritage" and other publications; the Audit Bureau of Circulations, Chicago, for the sketch used on the front cover, and for the past decade on the header of the Weyburn Review's "Ernestly!" column; the Weyburn Public Library and staff for a variety of assistance; the Toronto Transit Commission for photos supplied; the Communications Workers of America for background material on the International Typographical Union; to the authors of publications cited in Chapter 6 as reference sources; and to all on the staff of the Weyburn Review who have suffered material for this volume manifesting itself in every department and usurping unreasonable blocks of computer memory, and finally to Irene for patient and tactful assistance.

Foreword

When one has spent nearly half a century in an industry, I suspect it is almost inevitable that thoughts turn toward leaving a record of events experiences, people encountered and challenges addressed of successes and disappointments. When three decades of that period have been devoted to publishing a community newspaper it is obvious that much of the record — from comments on personal experiences to pontifications on the larger scene — has already been noted as it evolved. While memory may fade and perceptions current, if not necessarily valid, and that the components have been preserved on now brittle pages and microfilm.

My first impulse after succumbing to my own temptation and the usual decision of my retirees was to gather a representative collection of editorials, columns and features classify them under broad headings and publish the result with a minimum of comment. It quickly became apparent that personal background and many experiences that have affected attitudes, biases and convictions and which have contributed significantly toward the whole of such a recorded experience are either missing entirely or only hinted at vaguely.

The logical next step seemed to be writing memoirs on the various phases of my life, and the times and places of its evolution and to use the recovered items to enhance clarify and punctuate or to take the place of new narrative.

Next where to start? The beginning is always a logical place, but since I deemed it appropriate to reach back to emigrant movements and ethnic migrations going back to medieval Europe this seemed too far removed from the main thrust of my anthology and experiences the latter two-thirds (more or less) of the twentieth century. As most of our lives — my wife's and mine — have been absorbed with the Weyburn Review as a business a community institution and a personal calling, the newspaper became the obvious place to start.

The first and largest division of the book then is not three-decade absorption with creating a better newspaper, a profitable one and to have fun and fulfillment in the process; this is followed by progressively briefer perceptions of Weyburn, the province of Saskatchewan Canada and the world of our time amplified by editorial comments made from time to time. After this I backtracked to family origins my memories of a childhood in a Manitoba village through my entry into the newspaper and printing world and a "printer's devil" and the several stages that ultimately brought us to Weyburn Saskatchewan. Following this a collection of features and columns on visits to places of interest and closing (I believed) with an assortment of columns and editorials not readily classified under existing subtitles.

Because the editing and production processes consumed eighteen months I could not resist adding a final chapter of columns and editorials printed in this very significant period in our world in our nation and respecting an important Southeastern Saskatchewan initiative the Rafferty-Alameda Dams project.

If one need defend the presumption to publish memoirs and an anthology of personal writings, I offer the following: Firstly, if I were told that an ancestor of mine had spent half a century in the communication business at any level or to any medium and had left no record of it, that person would incur my scorn. Secondly, the twentieth century has lumt the most astonishing re history both politically and technologically and surely there cannot be one many records of the transition from a horse-and-buggy world to a universe of space travel. Finally, my personal experience and background does have uniqueness there are probably ten thousand or more living individuals in North America who are or have been weekly newspaper publishers confine this group to Canadians and you are down to one or two thousand, reduce this once again to those with a Mennonite background, and it must shrink to less than one hundred. Further limit the category to those who grew up in an almost totally Mennonite community and born to a family of refugees from the Russian Revolution and the atmosphere becomes pretty thin. The pieces de resistance, I assure myself is that I worked for a year or two as an itinerant printer.

In a Neufeld genealogy I reserved recently, it was recorded of Herman Neufeld, the family patriarch who migrated to Russia from Prussia in 1803 or thereabouts, that he had the following possessions one wagon a fifty percent share in a plow two harrows seventeen head of cattle fifteen sheep, 145 measures of corn, and twenty-seven lunds of hay

I believe this cataloguing was not so much an effort to establish his status as a way of saying more of him than that he was born married begot and died. I have some of the foregoing commodities to report but three hundred and some pages of memoirs may exasperate

Selecting a name for this volume presented an elusive challenge and I finally settled for openers on "Ernestly!" which has served as the hammer or slug for my weekly column for almost a quarter of a century. The embedments title is a marriage of a phrase used by English poet William Wordsworth in an impression common I am told in aviators circles In Wordsworth's "The Excursion," mention is made of a "man of cheerful yesterdays" "Cheerful yesterdays" appealed to me as an apt description of largely pleasant memories but the word "cheerful" seemed a trifle fuddly Aviators are said to refer to a good landing — obviously with tongue in cheek — as any landing from which one walks away Patterned on the survival of the extremes of the twentieth century solvent mud of sound mind and body could reasonably be described as a good — or happy — landing. Put it all together and we have "Ernestly Happy Yesterdays"

Some of the experiences central to a lifetime and a career are reversals and encounters with adversary forces. Describing them unavoidably characterizes some individuals less than flatteringly. I have tried in these instances, to screen identities to the extent that chances of embarrassment to living persons are minimal, for it is not the purpose of this book to embarrass or defame

It bears stressing at the outset as it is stressed at several points in the text that this is not a history and while I have not deliberately misrepresented facts or events, neither have I undertaken exhaustive research. My memories are just that and may rely on flawed memory. Inadvertent errors or even downright ignorance as my part. Even columns and editorials reprinted here originally may have been the products of limited understanding of and bias toward the circumstances, conditions and events commented upon.

With these strong caveats I invite the reader to find herein something of interest and of redeeming social or literary value

Contents

1	A community newspaper The Weyburn Review over three decades	9
2	Weyburn, Saskatchewan A small city on the Canadian prairie	64
3	Politics, drought and curling The most Canadian province	89
4	Our home and native land Twentieth century Canada	119
5	Scenes from our times All the world's a stage	134
6	Genesis and Exodus Background of a people	160
7	Steinbach, Manitoba A Canadian Mennonite village	172
8	Introduction to printing A printer's devil is born	219
9	Toronto, Ontario Introduction to the world	222
10	Itinerant printer Westward and onward	235
11	High days and holidays Flights from the mundane	249
12	The boiling hot sea Of many things	292
13	Year of grace, 1969 Portentous times	321

1. A community newspaper

A publisher at last

The sense of uneasiness mounts as the first wave of staffers heads unanimously for the door two or three minutes before quitting time. A few minutes later the more scrupulous ones exit, those who wouldn't dream of leaving the premises one second before five p.m., no matter how much foot-dragging this entails. Finally the downtown is completely deserted, as those who will not leave until the job is done is in some state of finality, walk toward the door, with perhaps a deferential nod in my direction.

I am overwhelmed by the realization that I am all alone in the building except for a young clerk capable of doing no more than answering the telephone, taking a want ad at the counter or answering a subscription. Almost panicking, I fight the impulse to run into the street and shout after the departing staffers: "Hey! Fellows! Fellows! Don't you know you're leaving me all alone and there's so much to be done even though it's five o'clock? Please, please come back!"

It is at this moment that the full weight of my new status slowly sinks in. I have finally reserved the last push that inches me irrevocably over the line that divides employee and employer, wage-earner and entrepreneur.

So this is what it feels like! By the clock, my first day as publisher has ended, but I know that I will be working as long as my wearying body and benumbed mind endure. As if this realization isn't enough, I am haunted by mocking memories of paydays, holidays and other privileges taken for granted without a thought of appreciation or sympathy for the movers and shakers who had made them possible. This was even before I had fully reassessed the well-brit-of-centre political orientation and near-fanatical trade unionism I had developed in my years in big-city composing rooms in Canada and the United States.

But more of that later.

Change of ownership
RADA REPORTER, July 7, 1958

With this issue of the Review the paper will pass into new hands.

It is with a great deal of regret that I make this announcement for after having been the editor and publisher for more than 22 years the paper has become enshrined in my heart almost as a child and its care and growth almost a part of me.

But there comes a time when friends must part. For every game there's an end, for every undertaking a time when it is desirable to let others carry on the work. And having spent around 60 years in printing, and more than four decades editing and publishing papers in western Canada I well realize that sooner or leave the work must be handed over to others better qualified to handle it

The decision has not been an easy one to make and seems like the parting of heart strings but the head must rule the heart and like a good general knows, there is a time when retreat becomes important than an advance

I hope the decision will turn out for the advantage of the paper and in turning it over to the new owners I feel that this will be so. In turning over a newspaper consideration must be given to qualifications of the people conducting it. While a private venture is nevertheless a community enterprise, voicing the opinions and promoting the interests of the people. Both the senior partners in the new firm are men well qualified in both printing and newspaper publishing having had long experience in Steinbach and Blumenhof.

Mr. Neufeld who will be editor and publisher was born in Manitoba and started in printing when only 15 years of age in 1942 working with Derksen Printers until 1945 when the many other printers he encountered to the fast arrears of wanderlust and have had extra jobs for a few years during which time he worked as many major newspaper offices in the United States. In 1950 he returned to his home town of Steinbach and married Irene sister of Bruno Derksen the other principal partner in The Weyburn Review Ltd. He then went to Toronto for six years working on the Toronto Star. Returning to Steinbach two years ago he joined the Carillon family again taking over the sports page and other duties. He has two children a boy and a girl.

BERNIE NEUFELD

Mr. Derksen is a son of Gerhard Derksen who went to Steinbach in 1932 taking over the first there in 1936 bringing up a family in the printing and weekly newspaper business. He founded the Carillon News in 1946 and this paper is also published in the office along with the Post. Bruno was brought up in this environment and together with brothers other brothers and two brothers-in-law form the Steinbach company. During the war he served from 1943 to 1946 with the RCAF

I would like at this time to thank all Review subscribers, advertisers, correspondents, purchasers of printing and others with whom I have done business for their loyal support and co-operation and to bespeak a continuance of the pleasant relations with my successor.

S.G. QUICK

On the morning that our takeover of the paper was announced to the staff I called a little meeting and declared my intention of turning the Review into the best weekly newspaper in Canada. I am sure my voice rang with sincerity. I think the staff thought I was talking about doing it within a year, and I caught the incredulous looks exchanged. Actually, I was modest enough to expect the transformation to take two or even three years. By "best," I should explain, I meant winning the national Better Newspapers Competition for our circulation class.

Even my innocence did not blind me to some of the inherent facts about my new circumstances, and I was soon struck by the realization that I was facing challenges beyond my experience and proven abilities that it would require all the new skills I could hope to absorb to carry out the considerable task ahead of me. The shop had fallen into mechanical disrepair the staff had slipped into unacceptable practices, and the combination of the two had reduced profitability to zero at best. Sales would have to be increased both to turn around these deficiencies and to improve the editorial quality to an acceptable level, let alone that envisioned by the liberal I had tried to share the staff. And all this would have to happen in a community to which I was a complete stranger.

The thorny problem of priorities had been solved for me by Bruno Derksen, my absentee partner. A salesman both by calling and instinct, he had told me, before wishing me luck and giving me his blessing a dozen times if once, that there was nothing wrong with the Weyburn Review that couldn't be solved by more advertising sales and that this must be my first undertaking.

Accordingly in my maiden speech to Review staffers I had also informed them that until circumstances permitted the luxury of an ad salesman, I would be making sales call myself and that this would entail many hours of absence from the office. My unspoken message was that I expected everyone to work as diligently as though I were there myself to supervise.

Under the old management advertisers had been expected to bring in their own advertisements except that Mr Quack made personal calls on a few accounts that demanded this consideration. The passive sales policy probably harked back to a long-gone era when national advertising constituted a major portion of advertising revenue and it may have been considered a compromise of an editor's integrity and/or dignity to go around soliciting revenue from local merchants.

As well until after World War 2 few weekly newspapers in Canada had competing local media. It came as a shock (one of many) to me when I learned that Weyburn not only had a radio station, but that it had been established less than one year earlier. My mortgage, wages and any improvements I realized with dismay, would have to come from a fiunt that now must be shared with a competitor.

The competitive situation reinforced the wisdom of Bruno's judgment so I went forth and sold. But did I sell them? Barely recovered from the trauma of the discovery of the radio station and its recent genesis I soon learned that the owners were a group of about 20 of Weyburn's leading businessmen many of them naturally heavy advertisers. They now had a strong incentive to spend their dollars with radio. A few chain stores were managed by individuals who were shareholders in the station, and most of them had little difficulty convincing themselves that it was in the best interest of their employers to spend the advertising dollars of the latter with the station.

The non-advertisers to be won over fell into three categories those who had decided a long time ago that they need not and would not advertise and were not about to change their minds, those who had low sales resistance and agreed to advertising without fully realizing the cost and those who had long since exhausted their credit and were only too happy to buy advertising space for which they had an intention of paying.

The first group of course, I was unable to touch; the second approved modest-sized ads agreeing that they probably had been overlooking this aspect of business to their own detriment then crybaked and withheld future advertising when they received their first billings the third lashed boast the first month a lineage well above the corresponding month a year earlier and helped raise my sperits for the moment although not a nickel was ever received from them thereafter.

If the foregoing sounds like an unfriendly reception I must stress that there were many people businessmen readers and community leaders who went out of their way to offer encouragement make me feel welcome and to compliment me on my improvements and efforts. Both negative and positive reactions were essential components in my business training. In retrospect can think of nothing worse than if I had received immediate advertising support from the outset business community I quickly learned that I would have to improve the product in order to increase sales and the it would all require hard work long hours imagination salesmanship integrity craftsmanship and everything else that goes into a community newspaper worth its salt.

Another challenging experience to use the kindest possible term was my introduction in the staff through which certain end results must be achieved. Having never been responsible for even a small department nor hired or fired anyone my credentials for taking control of a group of sixteen people but any purpose were most conspicuous through their absence.

The Review of 1958 had several dedicated competent and hard working individuals who would have been a credit in any organization anywhere. There were also a few promising learners, plus a handful of raging individuals just above their ability and performance mixed in with a few more good all-rate gun unlocked to mediocre performances at the level of mediocrity.

There must have been a time when Mr Quack an intelligent shrewd, thrifty and cautious individual had a staffs comparable to any in the industry but the years and conditions had taken them tell. He had given up on training and relied on tradesmen recruited from the marketplace — and in 1958 in Saskatchewan it was a seller's market.

Over the years the crew to which I had fallen had developed work habits for which "diversity" is at too harsh a word. Typesetting machines were not lubricated until a part started squeaking, metal shavings created by the trimmers would be allowed to accumulate until the piles interfered with the operators of the machines or the melting pots were short of metal, type was left unwashed after it had been inked for proofing with the result that all the compositors worked with hands and arms that were sticky and black. Waste paper was thrown on the floor even if there was a wastebasket only a few feet away. After all, there was a janitor coming in at night.

Some of these practices were corrected through repetitive muttering. With some I name in at night and did the neglected jobs myself — sweeping up shavings, washing inky printing forms, packing up discarded, balled-up proofs — until my point had been made. Others never changed until we switched to offset printing in 1965. Habits die hard and bad habits can be almost indestructible.

My initial naïveté was such — nurtured by my union background (acquired not inbred) — that I told a retailer who stopped by during my first week and who may have subtly suggested that stuff changes might be an early priority for me that I hoped I would never have to fire anyone. His look of sheer astonishment anointed in my mind forever: "Lots of luck!" was all he said.

This particular retailer was another example of what initiation into the business world may entail. Murray operated an office supply and furniture store a block away, and his came around a few days after my arrival, wished me a heart-warming welcome and hinted at a sales pitch for new furniture for my office. He was nothing if not a good salesman and would have succeeded on a handsome sale except for two factors. First I didn't have one cent to spare, and I knew it, secondly for all my innocence I knew that my first priority as funds became available would have to be modernization of the Review's machinery.

However I resented him that the points he had raised were valid and would be remembered when the time came to beautify and modernize the office. Then I sulked with what I hoped was just the right touch of business savvy, my expectation that he would also remember that I too was in business. His jaw dropped and he made a defeated voice. "Oh, I suppose you know?"

While I was still wondering what it was that I was supposed to know, his reminiscent out the salesman that he was selling printed matter in competition with the Review. In those days local printers tended to regard their towns as sacred territories, theirs almost by fiat and not fair game for competition. They lent thousands of dollars worth of printing to salesmen from the larger centres, but could get stonewalls in local stationer selling printing and farming it out. Murray's doing so had caused bad blood between him and Mr. Quack. he was absolutely certain the same would happen with me, and he held back quickly in the hope of making a big sale before I became his enemy.

But back to staff.

When I visited the Review office to negotiate the purchase about a month before taking over I spent a few minutes in the Review office. A handsome young man about my own age and obviously a tradesman came in from the back shop. He glanced at me, made a quick assessment, and gave me a knowing little smile.

I have always held Hector Bonvier that at the moment I had promised myself that this smart aleck would be the first to go. I really didn't given my general views on firing, but I did resent that knowing look and vowed to get even in some way. I'm glad I didn't because Hector became my first foreman an always dependable fellow worker of prodigious energy and many skills a treasured and true friend, and the Review's sales manager for many years until he returned parts few months short of thirty years later.

Hector was one of the fastest line operators I have ever met and I have met hundreds. He was also a self taught machinist who could always coax a broken typesetting machine to keep producing until the paper was out and permanent repairs could be effected.

Hector would do everything willingly except work evenings. At a man when Tuesday night overtime was an accepted part of weekly newspaper life. Hector rejected it for himself in favor of coming in early. He might work grudgingly an hour or two after five, but usually he would assign evening work to others and repair to the beverage room for a few brews before going home for early retirement. He would come in so early in the morning as the work load required — and I mean so early as four — and pounded out type at unbelievable speed. By the time I came in at eight all news and ad copy had been converted to type proofed, and was waiting to be pressed.

Another real asset was Ray Winters, a young press apprentice working for near-minimum wage. When the "cataclysm" came and half the staff resigned, Ray was promoted to journeyman status. He was soon pressroom foreman and two years after that became plant foreman at about the same time that Hector became sales manager. Twenty years later he was still holding this position competently, calmly dependably and faithfully, a word you can only understand if you have visited a printing shop run by a slob.

Yet another legacy of the Quack administration was Phyllis Katsky, a short, plump, cheerful, lively and quick-witted English war bride who assumed the duties of office manager without the title or commensurate pay.

The Review of 1950 was located in the Mitchell Block at Souris Avenue and Second Street in premises about twenty feet wide and 100 feet deep. Office and composing room were on the main floor, and the press room and bindery in the basement. The generous-sized office was separated from the composing room by a swinging door cut down at about shoulder level to prevent collisions.

Whenever Phyllis had a demand, request or complaint for Hector, and this might be a dozen times a day, she would head for the composing room at quick-march pace calling his name as a long, high pitched octave — "EHHHHHCCCCCCH-TAAAAAAH" — that began the moment she turned her back to the counter and ended when she reached the linos about thirty feet into the shop.

A year after I took over Phyllis became my first sales manager and held this job for several years until she and her husband and son moved to British Columbia. She was good at the job: personable, cheerful and intelligent — and sometimes unbelievably industrious. We had one major advertiser who could never be depended upon to have his ad copy ready. He might phone on Friday and ask us to hold a full page for him. On Tuesday we might still be waiting, and calling his office only to learn that he was out of town and no one knew when he might be back. He might become in Tuesday afternoon or even Wednesday and work out the ad with Phyllis or Hector or he might not show up at all, leaving or mail a bag hole to fill. Phyllis several times when she was desperate, would go to the advertiser's house or his home eating breakfast and have him dictate the copy to her between mouthfuls of eggs and toast. He still speaks highly of her.

It was Phyllis also who set me on the right course on some fairly basic financial policies that can make or break a new enterprise with minimal capitalization. Left to myself and not to unfortunately conscious of a shrinking bank account, I might have fallen into the common trap of putting off the paying of bills until the financial situation improved. Phyllis schooled us. Mr. Quack's high business ethics never asked me if I wanted to pay on account at that time. She checked out invoices, wrote out cheques and brought them to me for signing. She looked terrified when she brought them as though afraid each time that I might about at her, refuse to sign the cheques or simply break into tears. Much as I might have been tempted on some occasions to put off signing a cheque that would almost wipe out the bank account, I couldn't bring myself to destroy her trust, however tenuous. This upshot was that I learned to solve or prevent financial difficulties with my bankers instead of abusing the trust of my creditors.

Would that every rookie entrepreneur had a Phyllis to set him straight!

Three first-class people on a run-down paper aren't that bad a legacy, I suppose, and there were also a few apprentices who became employees of various degrees of value at the Review and elsewhere. What brought down the average was a handful of journeymen below average in competence or energy and above average in wage rates. Mostly they had been hired in exceptionally busy periods and stayed on when work slackened off. Unfortunately a few of these can through example until bad work habits that remain to haunt the establishment long after they have gone their way.

Among these was Ed, an ancient taciturnian who could get misfunctioning machines to fail completely and talk your ears off with excuses and wise suggestions. He was also a "strong collector" and kleptomaniac and had more curiosity than a Siamese cat. There was an area behind the downstairs washrooms filled with treasures he had "found". This included a section of four or five theatre seats so positioned that they could be taken for a waiting area for the lavatories. Ed had many cans of nautical printing inks which had been "given" him by previous employers. I have often wondered what I "gave" him when he left.

On one of my first evenings at the Review I was sitting in my office going through piles and piles of news releases correspondence and just plain junk that completely filled the room. The desk drawers were crammed there were foot-high piles covering the entire desk except for a tiny working space there were piles two feet high lining the walls. I set aside every possible minute to shoot through this material for the occasional document or letter that had to be dealt with, and to create some badly needed working space for myself.

Ed stopped at the door of my office to see what I was doing and remarked companionably on the job cut out for me. I agreed and held up a broken door lock that had been hoarded in one of the drawers.

"Just look at that," I exclaimed. "Now why would anyone want to keep that?" Ed chuckled his tongue-in-cheek laugh and eyeballed that Mr. Quick would keep anything. I tossed the piece of junk into the wastebasket, whereupon Ed said: "If you're throwing it out anyway do you mind if I take it? Might just come in handy some day."

Thursday was party time

Breaking on the job was another bad practice that had to be addressed. I don't know how I would have handled it but fate and Bruno a greater experience in dealing with people turned this problem around for me before I could even think about what I was going to do about it.

It was common knowledge on Weyburn that once the paper had been put to bed it was party time at the Review. From Thursday noon until the weekend work had been performed on a pleasant alcoholic haze. This was as well known that we were warned about it even before we took over.

It happened that on Thursday and Friday of the week before the takeover Bruno and I were there to do preliminary work such as stocktaking. At one point Bruno went downstairs for one reason or another and was just in time to see one of a cluster of journeymen taking a swig from a bottle. I don't know how Bruno might otherwise have handled it but one of the journeymen played into his hands by offering him a drink.

Bruno accepted the bottle took a healthy pull, smacked his lips appreciatively and said, "Thanks that was very good. But for God sake don't ever let Ernie catch you if he does that's it right there." There wasn't very much anyone could say to that. Bruno hadn't threatened anyone and wasn't even going to be around. I hadn't said anything, so they couldn't hold the warning against me. But they knew they could never say they hadn't been warned. I never saw a bottle around except for the occasional "grad-down". I authorized myself on special occasions.

Years later, Hector and I got into the bad habit of shaving a mickey in my office on Wednesday afternoons, after the paper had been put to bed and the shop staff had gone home. Once or twice we lost count of whose turn it was to treat and luck came "across." After several such unhappy developments, with such arriving at home and hearth three sheets to the wind we reluctantly agreed to forgo our little indulgences.

Having mentioned some of the shortcomings of staff I inherited, I must confess that my own introduction to staff recruitment brought disasters of its own. It hadn't taken me very long to realize that I could not single-handedly increase advertising revenue write news stories and editorials take pictures cover news events sign cheques and handle all the surprises associated with management and work on the hmes several evenings a week Admittedly it was with some relief that I decided to hire someone to do the selling not only reducing my workload (really freeing it into other avenues) and my time away from the office but also relieving me of a duty that was not really my strength

My first (and probably only) applicant was one Ernest M who supposedly had sold advertising and/or printing somewhere He was a tall, balding, stout individual, with a tanned smile frozen in his face He brought in very few ads, spent hours in his little corner studying the mat services (books of advertising illustrations) then proudly brought handfuls of advertising layouts to show me Trouble was, they were not layouts for the newspaper from whom we were soliciting advertising they were all "house" ads advertising printing and advertising. I couldn't seem to get through to him that I expected him to sell space to others not to design fillers ads for the paper

Every evening I would see him standing motionless outside the window of the Soo Hotel, where he had taken a room smiling his smile and fat all he would looking like someone expecting unwelcome company Perhaps that is hindsight because a day or two after I summoned the courage to let him go I read a Leader story about one Ernest M who had been charged convicted and sent to prison for defrauding an employer by holding two jobs at the same time, concurrent shifts, not moonlighting.

In late fall I hired Mike R and I thought I had it licked He was young good-looking pleasant and intelligent, and looked us you with clear eyes that bespoke almost childlike honesty

Mike was too interested in the newspaper business that he even asked if he might write some news stories Amazed that this would be most acceptable he soon has right in an excellent story about a farmhouse fire near a neighboring village when several people had been saved by the heroism of one individual

Mike was always on the go, which was encouraging even though he did not bring in very much new advertising With Christmas approaching, I suggested he contact not only our regular advertisers for greetings but the mayor and aldermen and merchants in nearby towns and villages It was gratifying to see the Christmas advertising hat grew, and particularly the in cents he was having in selling modest-sized ads to the small town merchants He told me a friend and lent him a suit to go to these towns.

Then one day the radio station manager Keith Baker came to see me and asked me in private if Mike R was no longer working for me I assured him he was, and he suggested I do some checking because Mike was also driving for the local taxi company He had made several deliveries to the station and when asked if he had quit the Review explained he was only making the delivery as a favor to a friend.

Before I had time to look into the matter the local police visited me and informed me that Mike was appearing in court on sixteen charges of theft He had been stealing merchandise from our advertisers when selling us them and selling it to a second-hand dealer at reduced prices The officer assured me I was not missing anything, and I honestly told him we were not

Mike's father (from a small village some distance from Weyburn) was in court next day and agreed to make restitution, so Mike was handed a suspended sentence

About one day later Phyllis Katsky my bookkeeper came into my office with a troubled look on her face, and showed me the accounts receivable ledger card of a recently opened furniture store This was the single new account Mike had developed locally The card showed charges metered by Phyllis and a payment entered in someone else s handwriting Phyllis asked if I had made the entry Of course I had not

She then explained that Mike had asked for the card because the furniture store manager wanted a statement before month-end and he intended to prepare it himself This bothered Phyllis and a few days later she checked the receivables card and found a "payment" entered that did not show up in the cash or any where else

Naturally I went straight to the furniture store to get to the bottom of things and was shown a Review statement bearing typewritten instructions to make payment directly to Mike I briefly wondered about this merchant s honesty or intelligence but decided his like myself was new to the business world and I'm sure Mike had told him a plausible fairy tale in his clear-eyed, credible way.

Mike was back in city jail next day but the magistrate decided to consider this felony as part of the original hat of offences on which sentence had already been suspended and had him released. No restitution was necessary this time.

Earlier I mentioned the fire reported by Mike. I recalled it months later and with burning fame decided that too had been the product of an over-active imagination. When I put this on paper thirty years later I finally decided to go for broke and I telephoned a Review rural correspondent who had lived in Fenside — scene of that fire — most of her life. She remembered both the people and the fire so Mike must have gotten something right for me. I did not, however, check on the details such as the heroes reported in our account.

It also turned out, after our Christmas issue had been printed and billed, that some of the ads "sold" in the small towns had been approved. Even a number of local advertisers refused to pay for their Christmas ads because Mike had placed them without approval. I have often wondered how many local businessmen suspected me of a policy of running unapproved ads. The owner of the taxi company for whom Mike had been driving on Review time, actually had the nerve to approach me for payment for Mike's use of his taxi.

After a few more "unknowns" who added nothing but were simply marking time as I pursued a few dedicated listeners more suitable jobs, Phyllis offered her services and I quickly realized that here was a solution handed me by a gracious providence to make up for some of my other woes, self-inflicted or otherwise.

A hard look at reality

In late summer of 1958, about two months after my ascendancy to the ivory tower of owner, manager, publisher and editor, I took off my rose-tinted glasses, looked at the situation in the production departments in its stark reality, and committed myself to solutions that were sure to bring about a staff crisis and indeed a personal one.

Edward Quach had been a fine job of taking over the Review during the depression, had worked hard through the war years which had brought increased business but had been encumbered by chronic shortages of labor, materials and equipment. In the earlier years of post-war growth he had expanded mechanically to meet increased demands, but as was the custom in workhorses then, he bought mostly used equipment. Each second-hand press or binder purchased brought problems, chain-reactions not only to the machine in question but those developed in each in the process of years of use and abuse.

By the time I arrived on the scene, Mr. Quach had given up on one or two fronts. Wishing to enjoy some of the fruits of his years of labor, he was reluctant to overspend in modernization, which would not only reduce his cash reserves but might drive up the price of the business beyond the means of a potential purchaser. He also began to take a few extended trips, and his family having opted against remaining in the business, had had to rely entirely on hired help. In the labor market of Saskatchewan in the late 1950s this meant he had to pay higher than going rates to marginally competent journeymen.

A sincere dream of mine, when fantasizing about the weekly newspaper I expected some day to acquire, had been that I would walk in and grandly announce raises for all. A grateful and dedicated staff would then dig in and double efficiency, and join me enthusiastically in turning out within a few short years, the finest weekly newspaper in Canada.

That isn't the way it worked out.

Without taking the reader through the mental muses and anguish of the decisions I made in order to survive, the upshot was that my rate adjustments were mostly downward. Coupled with traditional resistance to new management and overtures from an understaffed Leader-Post and an impervious-minded Estevan Mercury, about half of the staff resigned en masse, and I was left to march into the golden future with a handful of veterans of the Review workforce a few apprentices who decided to stick it out, and newly recruited employees mostly inexperienced.

While the dream never quite died it went on the backburner while a few of us worked long hours to keep the leaky boat afloat.

Coming to grips with the condition of the book shop was an adventure in its own right. During the 1930s and later for economic reasons and because of the growing supply of typesetting machines being replaced at daily newspapers, it had become common for weeklies to install used machines and with them all the problems that went with equipment that had seen many years of heavy use and varying levels of maintenance.

Two makes of linecasting machines dominated the North American market. Linotypes and Intertypes and looked identical to the layman. In the trade, however, it was customary to refer to these generically as lines after the original of the two. In references herein too, "lines" will mean either Linotypes or Intertypes. Many of the operators of these lines had only on-the-job training and varying degrees of proficiency. Some excellent operators came out of weekly shops and on the other extreme there were some who flailed at the large keyboard with fingering systems of their own invention and somehow managed to coax type out of the machines.

Breakdowns and minor mechanical failures were commonplace. once each line had literally hundreds — more likely thousands — of moving parts. Dirt and lack of lubrication could cause stoppages or poor performances, and the distributor which sorted matrices back into their individual channels might stop dozens of times in a day. (Matrices are brass molds of individual typographical characters from which the lines of type are cast.)

Minor emergencies were the responsibility of the operator. If stumped he would seek help from the in-house, self-trained expert, in many cases the publisher, who had seen nearly a variety of breakdowns that there was little he hadn't faced before. A broken part might be welded by the local machinist if an spare was on hand. In any event, most weeklies had several old lines and could limp along somehow if a part had to be ordered.

A frustrating and time-consuming annoyance was the metal flash referred to in the trade as a squirt or a splash.

A line's function is to cast lines of type. A lead alloy is melted in an attached pot at a temperature of 550 degrees F. As each line of matrices is assembled it is mechanically wedged between two steel jaws the pot pours the molten metal into a mold that has been moved flush against the line of matrices. The metal solidifies almost instantly is allowed to cool while the mold shaft swings around to the ejection position, at which point the finished slug of type is ejected by a narrow steel blade into a metal "stick" (a tray-like container) in which the lines are assembled until the stick is full at the piece of copy has been typeset.

The melting pot has heating elements both at the bottom and in the mouthpiece and they must be kept at temperatures within a tight range. Variations will cause the metal to solidify too quickly or not quickly enough. Either condition can cause a flash or squirt of molten metal all over the front of the machine and even on the operator himself if the lines throw himself out of the way in time.

Squirts may also be caused by lines of matrices assembled too tightly to fit between the jaws or too loosely to be justified that is pushed to either side by wedge-shaped spare bands dropped between words to fill the space between the jaws. Another culprit can be dirt so situated that it prevents lockup of the mold disk at the casting stage. The metal squirted over the front of the machine, and into the mechanisms sticks and solidifies and must be chipped away before production can resume. This may take anywhere from five to fifteen minutes. If metal is left somewhere where it can affect lockup another squirt may be only minutes away.

A line may operate weeks without a squirt, but one squirt often leads to many of the same, particularly if the operator begins to suspect the temperature settings and makes adjustments. A squirt-filled day can be extremely frustrating and most unproductive.

Cleaning up a squirt was the individual operator's responsibility in weekly shops, unless help was needed in adjusting thermostat settings. Then the in-house "expert" would step in, and if a new element had to be installed, the local electrician would be brought in.

On the day Beans and I came to effect the take-over George Cogbill was in the Review shop installing an electrical part on one of the linos. It was clear that he was very much at home there and when he learned we were the new owners did not hesitate to let us know we could expect to get to know him quite well. He was right!

One of the two Review linos had so many distributor stops that one man was kept stationed behind the machine to clear and restart it. The distributor bar was no worn the matrices dumped regularly into wrong channels. This created so many typographical errors that no amount of proofreading could catch them all.

It was during my second or third week that one of the store managers with an investment in the radio station stopped me on the street and showed us a copy of the Review which he had gone to the trouble of proofreading. It looked pretty bad.

This once more was one of the negative experiences but like most of them, it was offset by the encouragement received. Boo-boos and advertisers generally spanking went out of their way to encourage me and to compliment me on every little improvement in the paper, sometimes even on non-existent ones.

For instance: no early improvement I was able to implement without any financial outlay was setting news type on a nine-point base instead of the eight-point base that had been used in the Review for many years, thereby reducing the number of lines of type per inch of depth. This improved legibility by adding a bit more space between lines. A spun-off of this improvement was that less type was required to fill the news hole and we were able to eliminate a lot of boilerplate — canned columns offered free of charge by news-hungry organizations with axes to grind. Immediately people stopped me on the street to express their appreciation for increasing the local news coverage. In fact there was no noticeable increase simply a reduction of non-local content with which they had become familiar.

The proofreading incident may well have been the catalyst for a long-overdue solution. We heard of a reconditioned monotype available from a Winnipeg printing machinery company and made a down payment on it. While waiting for delivery I simply ordered the matrix-forming (really the matrix-plate-casting) combine turned off. Instead, I suggested the boys use the one machine and perform a number of hours nightly myself.

The Review had no Ludlow a machine which cast lines of larger sizes of type from hand-assembled brass matrices. Story heads were set as much as possible from the largest font available as the lines to our case 24-point Cheltenham Bold Condensed. This would be about one-third of an inch in height from top to the bottom of descenders. Anything larger had to be handset, as the Review had dozens of unusual cases of foundry type for this purpose.

An assembled page of type weighing somewhere in the neighborhood of one hundred pounds contained hundreds of individual pieces and the form, when locked, had to fit so snugly that not a single piece could be depressed by pressing fingers. This was necessary both for transportation to the press area and so that the forms would withstand the steam and movement of thousands of printing impressions as without coming apart.

Because the pressroom was in the basement someone had overcome the inconvenience and drudgery of carrying heavy forms up and down stairs by installing a home-made lift. A platform would be raised and lowered through a square hole in the floor block and tackle and pulleys were used to counter, supposedly both easy raising of the loaded platform and lowering at a slow speed. Someone however had miscalculated the balances and with a load of four pages of type, the lift would plunge down at a speed that guaranteed disaster.

Although every apprentice was warned of this, and a sign cautioned the operator of the lift always to wear the heavy mitts provided whenever lowering forms, every apprentice made the same error: he would load on the fourth page and, panicking when the lift plunged downward, grab the rope (with bare hands, the rope having been ignored) to arrest the lift a disastrous plunge. It was a mistake each made only once because the resulting rope burns were extremely painful and usually resulted in the victim being off work for several days while hands healed. When one apprentice was actually hospitalized I shut down the lift and insisted that the printing forms he carried up and down stairs. It was a decision not graciously accepted but I couldn't bear to see those wounded hands.

I have mentioned the building's dimensions, but not that it was one of the oldest business blocks in the city. The Review's part of it had been occupied by the paper for fifty years or more. The work areas were illuminated by a shed light bulb hanging from the ceiling, the plaster walls and ceiling had not seen a repair in decades.

Beside adding to the plant's air of antiquity, the building, through the leasing arrangement offered another dimension to my education as to what a neophyte businessman may expect. There was no written lease, which meant, as I discovered on an occasion when I misjudged my prerogatives, that I could be flung out on my ear on short notice but I was otherwise fully obligated in the three and one-half years remaining on the "lease."

Despite a hair-raising case of stuff and machines and disappearing sales, what made the first year not only bearable but memorable in the best sense of the word was my introduction to the role of a small town publisher in his community – something that in itself is rewarding to a degree that offsets many deficiencies. Needless to say these positive experiences extended through the years and typified the weekly newspaper publishing experience.

One of the characteristics of city life that had eventually brought me to Weyburn had been the growing realization when we lived in Toronto, that I wasn't really a part of the world around me. Riding to and from downtown Toronto daily I had not only been frustrated by the knowledge that several hours totally were expended merely in being taken from one place to another like a head of cattle in a load of coal, but by the feeling that everything happening was happening in spite of me. Wherever I travelled in that burgeoning city of the 1950s I saw highways, bridges, interchanges, apartment buildings and skyscrapers under construction, and it was all happening as though I didn't even exist. In Weyburn this feeling certainly disappeared as I came to understand the community and identified myself in its aspirations and dreams.

It was a heady experience to be autonomously a part of everything going on in the community and as editor of the local newspaper accorded privileges and considerations that I had not enjoyed in my backstop years.

No more than two weeks after coming to Weyburn I covered a meeting at which Premier Tommy Douglas was guest speaker. Someone introduced us and he almost bowled me over by remarking, "Oh yes, you're from Steinbach aren't you?" (or words to that effect).

This ability to remember things about people and surprising and charming them with this knowledge, was one of the acknowledged strengths of T. C. Douglas. In any case, since Weyburn was his constituency it is hardly surprising that he made it his business to know as much as he could about the ownership of the local paper, and to acquaint himself to some extent with the new publisher's background. For me however who had not been exposed to anything higher in the political hierarchy than a candidate glad-handing for votes it was a milestone to be addressed on almost familiar terms by the premier of a province.

It was on my first weekend following the takeover that I learned that a number of villages, towns and rural municipalities in the country made of Weyburn had signed an agreement to establish Dr. Maimpetre Regional park on the Souris River near Midale. (Dr. William G. Maimpetre was a pioneer doctor who had served the area for many years.) I drove to Midale that Sunday to interview George Molberg, secretary-treasurer of the R. M. of Cymri and an officer of the park board. I also interviewed Dr. Maimpetre, although "interview" as a malapropism when applied to the Doc. He was most reluctant to answer my questions if the answers to them were likely to show him in a favorable light. However, I did photograph him in his back yard in the shade of a tree, and the photo was still being used in park literature thirty years later.

A year later, almost to the day, I was to attend the official opening of the park, where thousands gathered to honor him. A brief but heavy downpour interrupted the ceremonies, and with a portion left the platform to run for shelter. I have never seen anything like it in my life before or since. Added to my few words, the Doc got up and mumbled that as always, Mrs. Maimpetre would do the talking added "thank you" and yielded the mike to his wife.

Eight years later I took a photo of "the Doc" and a baby he had just delivered — one of thousands he had helped into the world. What made this one unique was that he had also delivered not only both of the infant's parents, but at least one of the grandparents.

Covering the events that reflected the life of Weyburn accounted for many different circumstances under which I met my fellow residents of city and district. None, however, was more memorable than my introduction to Monty Adolphus at the wedding of the one and the duck.

In late 1958 or perhaps early January of 1959 the roof of the Moose Jaw hockey arena collapsed, leaving that city's junior hockey franchise, the Canucks, homeless for the rest of the season. All Weyburn had to offer was the old Arena Rink with its vertical iron and leaky roof. But it was better than nothing, and it was decided to play the rest of the team's home games here.

As a campaign to build a rink and bring junior hockey to Weyburn was going into high gear at the time, as hockey promoters doubled to see the presence of the Canucks to attract attention to and create interest in junior hockey.

One event planned for one of the earlier games in Weyburn drew on old favorites and hockey lore. Back in earlier years when Weyburn and Moose Jaw teams competed in the senior league Weyburn players and fans had derogatorily referred to the Moose Jaw rink as a cow barn, while Moose Jaw folks retaliated by referring to the Weyburn facility as a duck pond.

The friendly exchange of insults had progressed and climaxed with Weyburn fans taking a large cardboard cow to a Moose Jaw game taking it into the ice and "milking" it between periods. This was recalled in 1958 and with a Moose Jaw team now playing out of Weyburn it was deemed fitting to end the old feud in a marriage of the cow and the duck at a hockey game. Live creatures were brought in the rink with ex-pros Roman Dyda, Gerry Hart and Russ Bell officiating.

Naturally, I was on hand to take pictures and was backing away from the "wedding" scene to increase the amount I could get. Behind me, Adolphus, a district farmer and acknowledged character I had not met before, was walking across the ice pulling a sled — for reasons I forget — with a high narrow box on it. Backed into the sled, the box caught me right behind the knees and I fell into it. I was wearing slip-on rubbers and as I pitchforked into the box, my feet kicked suddenly upwards and both rubbers soared about ten feet into the air.

The collision was no well timed that the crowd believed it to be staged and roared its approval for a neatly executed feat. I couldn't even get out of the box without Monty's help and was lucky to get out of the incident unhurt and with my camera intact. But that's how I met Monty and many a time we told the story in years to come.

Speaking of pictures, it was during my first summer in Weyburn I backed into taking a picture which was to be reprinted in Time magazine about a year later. I came to Weyburn with no more knowledge of photography than Bruno had been able to drill into me in several short sessions. Bruno himself took most of the pictures at the Carillon News. A paper noted for its liberal use of photos long before the switch to tabloid printing. Bruno had been a hobby photographer since high school, and even in later years supplemented his income by photographing weddings. It was a dream of his to have a photo published in Time and whenever he took an unusual picture or photographed an event he considered uncommon, he would mail a copy to Time with appropriate information. He never made it.

In summer of 1958 I covered the flame-lighting ceremony held downtown to mark the coming of natural gas service. Political rivals Premier Tommy Douglas and Weyburn Mayor Jim Staveley together turned a wheel symbolizing the turning on of the gas. It was almost dark and I had never before taken a flash photo outside in this type of lighting. I asked Leader-Post reporter and Bureau representative Pete Wenger what settings to use. He suggested I set the camera, aimed it and shot.

Just over a year later Time sent a reporter to Weyburn to write a story on Weyburn's handling of the economic consequences of the oil industry. While researching the story Time reporter Ed Ogle became interested in the continuing political feud between premier and mayor. He asked if I had pictures of them and I proudly offered the flame-lighting shots in the two men together.

He accepted them unenthusiastically mentioning that Time was not too keen on using year-old pictures with current stories. As it happened, both Douglas and Staveley were speaking at a meeting while Ogle was in town and he was able to take a number of pictures, both posed and candid of them during the evening. That dashed my hopes but to my surprise when the Time feature ran a few weeks later, it was graced by my fuzzy flame-lighting shot

Earlier I mentioned Pete Wanger of the Leader-Post, with whom I was to enjoy a long and mainly pleasant association but one which got off to a rocky start. Pete's office was across the street from the original Review office, in the Sun Hotel. While he worked long hours his schedule permitted him to spend a lot of time at the Review chatting with staff and keeping in a rare open for anything that might be happening in the community

Many people had told me within the first few weeks that there was little point in reading the Review because anything in it had already appeared in the Leader. In those days the Leader had a policy of covering communities where the paper had representatives as it did in Weyburn almost as thoroughly as the local weekly. Most Weyburn nurses of any importance had indeed found their way into the pages of the Leader before they appeared in the Review. In addition I discovered that Pete and the Review reporter shared information on a trauma, but of course the Leader came out every day and was able to print most stories before the Review

Premier Douglas and Mayo Stanley

The Review reporter and Pete also took turns at the less-than-exciting job of covering the weekly meetings of city council and writing a story to be used by both papers. Again regardless of who had written the story it appeared first in the Leader and the public took it for granted that the Review was simply copying the daily's report

I united this arrangement by taking over council coverage myself and working hard at using local leads that would be different from Pete's. I also discouraged sharing information on which we might have an exclusive. Soon thereafter there was a difference of opinion about the release of certain information we had received at council. The misunderstanding imposed a lustre strain on our relationship and for a while we were barely on speaking terms. The months and years softened the edges of our discord and we worked together comfortably both in reporting the news and in serving on community organizations such as the Chamber of Commerce. However, there was never again even a hint of the easy arrangement of the past.

A few years later, when we were back to a reasonable level of co-operation I almost cooked Pete and myself in the bargain

It was a hot August afternoon and Pete and I were in the same plane when we learned that a garage in Macoun about 35 miles southeast was on fire. We decided to save on gas costs and drove in Macoun in my car. Heck! It was probably the hottest day of the summer and it was several years before air-conditioning became common in cars. So we opened our windows and turned the vent fans on full blast. Nothing helped and the hot air blowing from the vent felt like a desert wind. In fact, it turned out that someone had turned on the heater and most of the way to Macoun the near-100-degree temperature was getting a boost from this source.

Photo journalism (if I may so dignify the pictures I took with little previous experience) played a strong part in getting recognition for our efforts to improve the paper. This was at a time when a few daring weeklies were beginning to use photos, but the plate-making process was still slow and costly. Our films were developed at the local photo studio, Channell's, then sent, matched and accompanied by an explanatory note, by bus to Dorkson to Steinbach. They would have prints made, burn plates and return them to us a few days later, also by bus. With all these steps and the long-distance transmittal. a news photo was not likely to appear in print until at least ten days after the event No matter local pictures were new to Weyburn readers and they ate them up

Sometimes the consequences were embarrassing.

Mistaken identity

One evening I took some pictures at a teen dance and selected for printing a photo of a particularly good-looking young couple I asked someone who the pair were and identified the photo accordingly when it ran in the Review A few days later the father of the girl stormed into my office in a rage because according to him we had incorrectly identified the boy dancing with his daughter

It turned out the father had forbidden his daughter to see the young man When confronted with the evidence, the girl got out of it by saying it was the Review's error that the boy she was shown with in the photo (he back toward the camera) was another boy who looked remarkably like the out-of-bounds admirer

On another occasion my candid photographs resulted in problems with the police for the subject Wandering around one winter Sunday afternoon looking for a suitable photo to flesh out a blank week I snapped a shot of a local man going he youngsters a ride on a sled drawn by his car This is illegal and although I took the picture without malice or intent, the police were able to read the car s license number and as a result either charged the driver or issued a warning He wasn't at all happy with the Review

It still amazes when I remember the farmer who invited us for supper to get some publicity He invited me to bring my wife and children to his farm home for Sunday supper adding mysteriously that I would find it worthwhile to bring my camera It turned out he raised cattle, including show animals which he took to various fairs and exhibitions throughout the province He had all his medals trophies ribbons and other memorabilia on display with the obvious expectation of a newsstory

While I knew I had been used I admitted to myself that his achievements probably deserved some publicity So I ran a story and a photo. What hurt more was that I discovered later that the farmer was telling people that if you wanted publicity in the Review the best way to get it was to feed the editor and his family a meal

Of course as long as there are newspapers there will be individuals who try by devious means to steer the newspapers attention toward themselves or their interests or in the opposite direction A rather insignificant instance often comes to mind because it was re ridiculous The city was planning to acquire land on which to build a library A man entered my office closed the door and with a conspiratorial grin told me he would make it worth my while if I wrote an editorial favoring a particular location He owned land in one of the areas being considered and thought the right decision would enhance the value of his property I've always wondered what my "while" was supposed to be worth $50? $100?

Much more common of course, were instances of people seeking to have happenings, particularly offences, omitted from our coverage Often those seeking exemption on behalf of someone admitted that the culprit deserved both the legal penalty and the publicity...but there was always a dear old grandmother who could very well take a heart attack if she learned of her grandchild's misconduct I greatly countered with the assurance that grandmother hadn't lived to ripe old age without experiencing a lot of shocks and disappointments.

I've tried not to permit myself to feel patronizing toward people reduced to pleading on behalf of an errant loved one. Scorn, ridicule and contempt are not easy to bear for anyone and the fates and circumstances can be very selective as to who is exposed

Once when I was still covering the court beat myself I received a phone call from a young man who had been convicted of a number of burglaries. After telling me the particulars he insolently demanded "What does a guy do to keep his name out of the paper?" "Stay out of trouble." I replied. my sympathies not extending to bold unoriginality.

He started to argue and shouting he wasn't getting anywhere demanded to speak to the boss. He was incredulous when I told him I was the boss. "Do you mean you run the paper and go to court and write stories too?" I assured him that I had also been known to sweep the floor.

Once a young (but older than she would like to be) matron telephoned me the day after she Review was out and demanded what I meant by telling the whole world her age. I strummed something about not knowing we had done so and she read back "Twenty years ago Sixteen-year-old Mary Jones" (not the real name) "Saturday was married (who knows)

Do you suppose people can't add sixteen and twenty?" Then after allowing me to suffer for a few moments she burst out laughing at my embarrassment and all the joke in herself

I felt more then a bit last time I attended one morning when seven or eight young toughs walked into my office looking to one who was obviously their leader to speak for them. I knew the gang had been up for a fairly serious offence and while I was not familiar with any of them, had no doubt that they had dropped into let me know that previous story about them would not go unpunished

Reclaiming that the leader was putting on a show for his pals and couldn't afford to lose face, I had to use more tact than I am usually noted for. I asked him if the offence was so serious that he couldn't live with the community a knowledge of it. He admitted with a grin that it was serious enough. I asked if he thought no one would know about it if I did not print the story. He allowed that that was unlikely.

"So," I asked "if some people knew about it do you think what they will say about it will be better or worse than the truth?" He admitted that rumor necessarily could be worse and he and his friends trooped out without so much as threat

Just a year or two ago, a young woman telephoned me identified herself explained that she had been convicted of shoplifting and wondered if it was necessary to mention it in the paper when it involved a "nice person" (her words) like herself

Some of the newspaper's own sins of omission or commission also add graying to the publisher a hair. Probably one of the worst in my experience was a report on the conviction of a man who had — under the influence of liquor or drugs or both — driven his car through a tent at Kanase Lake Provincial Park. Our story mentioned the name of the "accused" — a very unusual name in these parts — at least half a dozen times. The matter was brought to my attention by the head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachment at Carlyle, who was so angry I was grateful he was seventy miles away. Our story was correct in every detail except a very important one the name we had used as that of the accused had in fact been the name of the arresting officer. To add insult to injury the officer had done a ton of work with Carlyle district young people and my alcohol education. To add further irony the story had been placed right next to a graduation story sure to be read by teen-agers, and as a final touch the officer was at the time on Ottawa on a summon on relation with the arms

We placed apologies in the Review and several newspapers in the Carlyle area. By sheer happenstance Irene and I were seated at the same table as the officer at a banquet in fall of 1969 and were almost afraid to identify ourselves when we heard his name. Fortunately he was a man with a sense of humor and any wounds we had aunused originally had healed well. He told us that when he had returned from Ottawa to Arcola, where he then lived, people there had believed he was in prison. He had a whole scrap book relating to the matter including a photo of himself with bars drawn over it, furnished by thoughtful fellow officers.

In a category all its own is the time we offended some readers with an April Fool's joke. It was 1961 with the first of April falling on a Wednesday. The new dam had not yet been completed and as so often in the 1960s, the water reservoir had fallen to a dangerously low level. As a result council found itself casting about for ways to alleviate a serious water shortage that seemed imminent.

Our Ontario-born editor of the day Don McCahill was inspired to photograph a number of railway tank cars on a siding near Weyburn. The picture was run on page one with a caption explaining that they contained water being brought in from Lake Erie. We thought Lake Erie would top off our readers to the joke but to be on the safe side closed with the credit "Photo by April Fool."

Reading before thinking it over indignant readers deluged any hall with phone calls berating officials for bringing in water from far-away polluted Lake Erie, with thousands of clean lakes available in Saskatchewan and neighbouring Manitoba. When told it was just a gag — and after simmering down — most thought it was a pretty original joke. A few never believed it let it be known that they didn't appreciate falsehoods even mean April Fool spoke in these local newspaper

Fairly early in my editorial career I made a mistake for which a person I was trying to help paid rather painfully

A reader who learned near a village not far from Weyburn came in with a Letter to the Editor he wanted me to publish. He was on bad terms with the rural municipality's snow plow operator who to torment him wouldn't open the road to his farm. He thought exposure of the man a infamy might change his ways. Reading the letter I found it loaded with libel but because a municipal government was involved no employee of the plow operator. I felt he probably had a case that deserved saving. His knowledge of English was limited and his fourteenyear great so I decided to be a hero and help him. So I rewrote the letter on the spot scrubbing out all the libel and unprovable accusations yet giving readers a good idea of what the man was being subjected to.

I proudly showed him the finished product which he signed happily and gratefully. And that was the way we ran it. That was the end of it as far as I was immediately aware. However New Year's eve soon upon us — perhaps a few weeks later — and I had to go to the hospital to take a picture of the New Year's baby. While I was waiting at the reception desk for permission to go to the maternity ward I noticed standing beside me a rural letter-writer

I took him Happy New Year and asked him how he was. "Pretty good now," he conceded but added that things had been pretty rough

"You've been sick?" I asked

He looked at me strangely as though he expected me to know of his illness, then reminded me of the letter I had written for him. The next time he had wanted his village the snow plow operator had parked his machine in such a way as to keep the farmer's vehicle. He had then dragged the farmer out of it and beaten the daylights out of him. He was just now being released from hospital. Later I learned I had also been on the snow plow operator's hit list, but he had made known his intentions at the local beverage canoe and had been talked out of it.

Ever since, I have been very careful never to assist anyone with a Letter to the Editor to any extent that might identify me with the authorship.

Commercial printing

Job printing has been a traditional economic staple of the weekly newspaper industry since it steers productive work toward existing facilities in the slow days immediately following publishing day. Since the advent of offset printing, many weekly newspapers use outmoded printing plants and quite a few are result have found it uneconomic to maintain commercial printing departments. In the days of hot type, however anything that helped pay the compositors and line operators pay on Thursdays and Fridays was a boon. Although printing letterheads or sale bills is not a hilarious exercise like any other facet of life, work and human relations, it provides its light moments.

It still tickles me to think that I was once able to hold on to a printing order by raising the price.

This was back in the days when wedding invitations were still customarily printed by the local printers. A selection of beautiful embossed wedding cabinets was stocked and the text was handset in Old English or script type. Even type cases that tended to be badly depleted. Given the cost of the cabinets, the markup and the time-consuming process of typesetting, lockup and pressing the final product was fairly expensive.

One day a psychiatric nurse from the mental hospital planning to marry a psychiatrist came in with a sample invitation she wanted him own modified after it was obviously a source de substance from her point of view and she was uneasy about entrusting it to a small-town establishment

All it amounted to was a hand-torn sheet of construction paper with the text printed on it in ordinary sans serif type available on our line She had even bought and hand-torn the construction paper expecting us to have difficulty finding anything so exotic The whole order would entail only five minutes on the line, another five minutes to lock up the form and perhaps fifteen minutes on the press.

She all ed if I thought we could handle the job

"Of course " I replied and not wanting to offend by pricing it too low quoted eight dollars. (This was at a time when standard cabinets would have cost twenty to thirty dollars.)

"Eight dollars" she almost shouted "I am not having cheap invitations " She put not her hand for the sample, obviously intending to leave

The real me would have explained how simple a job it was, but a higher (or possibly lower) power intervened in my earthly I wanted that job I had better smarten up, and fast

"Oh my goodness" I lamented "I'm afraid I forgot all about the — uh uh — the " and without finishing the sentence, but pantomiming a series of mental calculations, I quickly apologized for misquoting, and told her what she wanted was really more complicated than I had first supposed and that it would cost $21 50

"Well that is better " she exclaimed and although still obviously questioning my competence, meand and otherwise entrusted me with the job

It is a dishonest dollar I have never regretted

One printing order that still comes close to drawing tears was the two-color job for an itinerant evangelist — another experience of my first weeks in Weyburn People like that must have put pressure on from a male The evangelist who was holding revival meetings in Weyburn came in with a young male companion Together they designed the letterhead arguing mumbly over details and placed an order for ten thousand sheets printed in two colors That press on unexpected source in the doldrums of July was a bonanza They even came in a few days later to okay the pre-press proof but never picked up the completed order — nor paid for it

And that s the last we ever saw of them.

Printed on the letterhead was the Texas address of a religious organization with which the itinerant claimed some sort of affiliation I sent the billing to this address and failing to receive payment or acknowledgment fired off a letter that must have arrived in Texas still warm. This drew a reply advising that the party in question was not, in fact, affiliated in any way with the Texas organization

Having corresponded with the Texans however my name automatically went on their mailing list and every few months for the next few years I received from them tracts and offers of religious literature I didn't really need those reminders.

Some years later I drew the wrath of a customer by being party to a name change that didn't exactly tickle him

Local entrepreneurs Wilbur Thompson purchased the El Rancho Motel in Weyburn at about the time public dining rooms were first being licensed for the sale of liquor with meals. Wilbur came in with his manager Tom Dixon, and between the three of us we designed a handsome menu for the Ambassador Room, as the dining room was to be called.

Liquor licensing was still a touchy matter in Saskatchewan, and everything associated with it including the printed prices list or menus, had to be approved by a representative of the provincial liquor board Wilbur was out of town, presumably away with his stable of racehorses when the time came for the okay on the menu, so Tom Dixon came in with Shad Wheeler from the liquor board.

After he had satisfied himself that everything about the menu was in sync with regulations

Shad said, "There's just one thing that bothers me. The motel is called the El Rancho, and the dining room is the Ambassador Room." He thought the two names were incompatible and asked where "Ambassador" fit in anyway.

"I dunno," said Tane, and asked what Shad would suggest.

Wheeler volunteered that Ranchero Room might be more appropriate and I seconded the suggestion. Asked if this would hold up, the licensing Shad assured Tane that he could change the name on the form right there and I too agreed the name could be changed in the menus in short delaying the printing.

So the Ambassador Room became the Ranchero Room — and when Wilbur Thompson returned to Weyburn he blew his stack. I've mentioned he had a stable of racehorses. His had one particular favorite, a horse by the name of Ambassador.

A niche of spanning era on the job printing department was the "funeral press."

In communities not served by radio or daily newspapers, and before economical and quick photocopying techniques were available, it was customary to publicize deaths through cards placed at strategic locations such as the post office, throughout town. A form of type was kept handy and when a death occurred the name, time of death and funeral particulars were changed. Several cards were printed and taken out to the various locations.

The Review had a small platen press with a printing surface too small to be useful for anything else. One funeral card form was always kept locked into a chase (a metal frame) of the right size, and cards paid left in position on the press platen so cards could be printed as quickly as possible. Inevitably the little press was dubbed the funeral press. We charged $4.50 for printing and distributing half a dozen cards with fifty cents brazenly added for a full dozen. Funeral directors delighted in bringing in a card order or two on Friday afternoon just as the place was being locked up. The loss of funeral cards to the revenue of the weekly newspaper industry has caused few tears.

Rebuilding the plant

The depletion of the Review's staff soon after our arrival resulted, as already suggested, in an early introduction to the joys and surprises of staff enlistment. I made some hiring decisions that I find incredible to this day. Once I learned, only through bitter experience, not to hire bodies when I needed people to clunk out references, and to ask pointed questions my record improved. Hiring is always a dicy business, but for all the disappointingly bad choices I still managed to hire in the first few years people like Mary Griner, who became my first news editor, and Henry Akbash, the Review's hard-pressman thirty years later. Many others here come and gone as to respected careers in writing, printing and in other businesses.

And while the staff was being rebuilt so the physical assets of the plant gave way to new units of the art replacements. Using the words "new" and "state of the art" is an overstatement as it might be if applied to acquisitions not many years later. In the postwar era, and until the great conversion to offset printing equipment in the newspaper composing room — the key production department — did not change significantly. With a few bells and whistles added, the linos in daily newspapers were not very different from the typecasting machines produced decades earlier. In fact, many parts were still interchangeable. The linos in stockers were similar to those of the dailies except as noted earlier, they tended to be hand-me-downs from larger plants.

However, many time-saving devices in use in daily newspapers for many years simply had not found their way to the shops of these country cousins. Those probably did, at least in part, to the fact that as the weekly shop of the depression years, money was not readily available for capital expenditures. Family and staff worked evenings without overtime pay and wages were low. As a result efficiency didn't count for much in the scheme of things, and this omission cut deeply into profitability when higher wage rates, overtime pay, paid vacations and other employee benefits became part of small-town life, even if at a lower level than in the large city.

It would be satisfying to say that I had come to Weyburn with a bold vision of modernizing. Although I had worked in modern printing shops in many parts of the continent and had every hope of streamlining, I thought of these machines to some extent as frills to improve working conditions, the quality of the product, and the appearance of the plant. Oh, I knew efficiency was a factor too but not how dramatic a factor, and we didn't have the money to lay out. Anyway, I was willing to work extra hours to offset plant inefficiency. I believe I had some vague goal of beginning a replacement and modernization program in about five years after the mortgage had been substantially reduced.

It was a request of Hector Bouvier's that made me accelerate the program. Hand-inserted as the use of larger type for news and advertising headlines to improve the appearance of the paper and the larger type (hand set) had to be assembled from our dozens of type cases. Most fonts were depleted and a lot of type was tied up in standing forms saved for subsequent re-use. It was not uncommon to see a line in a particular font of type only to find oneself short of a few letters. This left the chance aggravating and time-consuming of distributing the line back into the case and switching to another font (with possibly the same results) or scrounging through piles of standing forms to find the letters required in the appropriate font.

So one day early in 1959 Hector approached me with a casual look in his face and a long list of type needed to replenish our type forts. I muttered and protested that this would cost over one thousand dollars and provide only temporary relief. Hector was unmoved. "If you expect me to use large type, we've got to have type to use especially with the busy spring season ahead of us."

With knees shaking and a sick mind I retired to my office to consider this latest bombshell.

Suddenly the realization struck me that if I could afford (indeed if I could escape together the wherewithal to pay for the type demanded by Hector I could afford a down payment for a Ludlow machine which would alleviate the problem forever.

A Ludlow was a machine with which large type could be cast, up to an inch in height and perhaps larger and in line lengths of up to eighteen inches (in about four-inch sections). The lines were hand-assembled from brass matrices and cast from metal identical to that used in the regular linecasting machines. Blank lines could even be cast for spacing, and as with type from lines, the metal could be remelted and reused.

My pleas to a representative of the Ludlow Corporation representative must have been heart rending because he agreed to supply the machine for a down payment of one thousand dollars. The improved production was nothing less than astounding and the higher quality was pleasant as well but hoped it would be.

It wasn't much later that we bought a photo-engraver of a sort. I've already mentioned the emphasis I had been taught to place on local news photos and local appreciation of them in spite of the time lapse between the event and the published picture because of our reliance on photos produced in Steinbach.

People are quick to accept improvement and also to recognize inadequacies in them, so it wasn't long before people began to wonder out loud about the lateness of our pictures. At about the same time, a revolutionary engraving process made it economical for large and medium sized weekly newspapers to install in-plant engraving machines.

While the process used in Steinbach and in other engraving plants required costly special cameras and baths plate emulsifiers and all sorts of complicated and costly procedures (and produced excellent products) several companies now were offering small electronic engravers that scanned photographs and punched holes into plastic plates in inverse proportion to the density of the corresponding area of the photo. (Dot patterns of various density on printing surfaces are the basis for printed photographs.)

Quality was much inferior to acid-etched zinc plates but at a rental of about $130 monthly requiring a space of only a few square feet and able to turn out an engraving about eight inches square in twenty minutes it was a triumph of technology. Brochures advertising the machines — ours was a Klischograph — invariably showed a young, pretty smiling girl standing beside the machine. The message was clear: if a young, pretty, smiling girl was capable of running a Kinebograph, no one need feel inhibited.

Temporarily, a new owner of Channell's Studio was permitted to develop and print our films, but a more permanent solution was not far away. In fall construction was begun on our bungalow on Woodlawn Crescent, complete with a darkroom in the basement. Shortly after we moved in, in late winter, we bought a darkroom "package," and, with a few days of instruction from a tutor who had had only a few days of instruction himself, from because our professional photo lab expert.

This arrangement lasted for four or five years, through three babies that managed to survive lengthy sessions in a 60-degree basement, or to sleep through from a sequestering, on photo days.

Like everything else, the home studio added a few highlights to my store of memories. I remember with particular vividness a provincial election night, perhaps in 1964, Saskatchewan elections are held on Wednesdays and the Review, at that time, went to bed Wednesday nights for Thursday morning printing.

After the election returns were in, perhaps an hour after the polls closed at eight o'clock, I took pictures at the office of the winning candidate, drove home to deliver the film to Irene, then returned to the office to write my stories, set them on the line, proofread and correct them, and drop them into the front and jump pages, allowing a rectangular space for the photo to be cropped early in the morning.

By this time it was after midnight, house lights were out throughout the city, and all was still. I parked and left the car running while I carried to the home to pick up the photos waiting for me on the kitchen table. I had noticed the car door swinging open because I hadn't closed it properly, but at that time of night, and for one minute, it wasn't worth going back for.

So I entered the home, grabbed the photos, and dashed back to the car and was about to get in, when my heart almost stood still. There sitting in the driver's seat was a tall figure. I must have let out some sort of distressed sound, because with a frightened yelp, the figure sprang out of the car, crashed past me and disappeared into the night.

The Jennings, who lived across the street, had a black Labrador retriever, and I learned later that he just loved to get in cars. My car, with an empty seat and open door, had been too much to resist!

The cylinder press

So far, I have said little about the press.

Before I had even taken over the Review — that is, in the few days I was in Weyburn before the key was actually turned over to me — I quickly was told by more than one unthinking nature that the Review was printed on an old piece of junk that broke down regularly, and that as a consequence the paper was often hours late.

This turned out to be entirely true, except for the part about the press being an old piece of junk. It was a wonderful, well-built piece of equipment that was being forced to work under impossible conditions.

At this point, just a bit of printing history is in order — unnecessarily, but as I have learned to understand or perhaps imagine it.

For hundreds of years after Johannes Gutenberg's invention of movable type, this in itself was sufficient unto itself as a wonder of human ingenuity. If you consider the alternative of copying Bibles and other documents by hand, wasn't it great to be able to hand-set a page of type and then print as many copies as desired? What matter that the form probably had to be inked with a hand-held brayer, a sheet of paper carefully positioned on it, and a platen hand screwed down to press the paper evenly against the form of type?

Naturally this wasn't good enough forever and inventors eventually developed presses operated by manpower by horsepower and by the early 1800s, by steam power. Proliferation of printed matter fed literacy which in turn fanned demand for more printing. Either in the twilight of the steam power era, or in the years that followed the invention of the internal combustion engine the press industry must have decided that improvement had gone about as far as it could go until the trade was sold a quantity of sturdy steel printing presses, built to last a hundred years — at maximum speeds at which sheets of paper could be hand-fed into them.

Time came when even these mechanical miracles were succeeded by web presses and mechanically fed cylinder presses, and the new orphans often became the work horses of the weekly newspaper prescreen. There were new presses offered to the weekly industry but for two to four short press runs per week this was a pretty costly route compared to picking up a low-cost used press being replaced shortly to make way for faster presses coming on the market. These used presses gave years of service run under unbelievable conditions and were very undemanding in terms of maintenance and repair. If a part broke every town had its mechanical genius who was able to get the press running long enough to get the paper out and until replacement parts could be brought in.

Such a press was the Review's Optimus. It was larger than most presses found in weeklies. Four hundred newspaper page forms locked onto the press bed looked almost lost. The entire machine was about fifteen feet or more in length. The press had been installed in the Review's basement on a cement floor and should have lasted forever, had it not been for Weyburn's highly alkaline soil. Over the decades the alkali had eaten away at the concrete base, causing the steel chassis of the press to warp from its own weight.

Imagine a steel slab weighing a ton or more hurtling first in one direction, coming to a stop assisted by a cylinder slamming into an air chamber, then reversing itself and heading in the opposite direction to have the process repeated at the other end. This whole cycle was repeated over one thousand times in an hour of operation.

The press broke down often and in unexpected places. That would cause delays, late delivery of the paper, costly repairs and overtime pay while the entire crew waited for our local mechanical wizard Floyd Tralson, to get the press going again.

When the press was started it sounded like a locomotive roaring through the basement and when a sheet of paper got caught in the ink rollers the first person to notice it would let out a banshee-frightening roar in which he would be joined by others until they gained the attention of the press feeder. Thereupon the press would be brought to a stop with further gnashing of steel and gears. All this was happening in a basic that was no longer true.

My office was located directly above the pressroom separated from this dungeon by a not-very substantial floor. My stomach flip-pod with every rotation of the press cylinder, and my heart would lurch every time I heard the distress cries, and I would perspire copiously until I heard the press rolling once more.

A most creative ambiance!

The repairs were costly, using up a good share of the meagre margin that might otherwise have gone into the profit column. And as of the inherent problems of the press and its ills were not enough, the electrical system's cables became corroded by alkali. The costly repair job was completed while the press staff was out for coffee. Suddenly there was the sound of the press being started followed immediately by an enormous smash.

We rushed downstairs and found the electrician standing beside the press looking sheepish — and deservedly so. He had finished his repairs and had decided to start up the machine to see if everything was in order. So he pressed the startex button of a machine he knew nothing about. The press must have had a safety clutch to prevent accidental starting in this way but either the electrician found it, or the press had been left engaged. At any rate, it happened. The press bed had on it many loose pieces of metal and steel furniture (spacing material used for locking forms into position on to the bed). These pieces were thrown off the bed when the press started, some of them landing in the compressium chamber to which they were jammed by the returning compression cylinder machined to fit tightly into the chamber now filled with pieces of wood and metal.

The result was not beautiful to behold.

Insurance covered the cost of this major repair and we were operational again for the following week's paper. Insurance however did nothing for my nerves, my sheets or my dresses nor for that matter for the lifespan of a much-abused press

It was becoming more obvious every day that the only answer was a new press. At the time the Goss company was offering a web fed press suitable for medium sized weeklies. It was capable of printing and folding eight broadsheet pages at a time at a speed of several thousand impressions per hour. These Coz-o-type presses had already been installed at Steinbach Estevan, and a number of other weeklies in the west

The spirit was willing, but it made so much sense but I was faced with two major obstacles One was the price tag of $30,000 or thereabouts and the second was where to put the press Considering the condition of the leased premises, and my landlord's relation with the landlord I was not exactly anxious to install an expensive press in the trembling basement with its disintegrating floor. Several years also remained on the existing unwritten lease and installation of a press would hardly leave me in any bargaining position for a renewal Somehow a new building as well as a new press did not seem within the realm of possibility

In any case I went to see the landlord to see where I stood in the event of a move and he told me to do whatever was best for the Review that the Review had always been at this location and would always be welcome He added that Wentworth 1 next door in the same building, had been eyeing our premises covetously for years so there would be no problem in getting a new tenant. This was very reassuring but it didn't come close to covering all relevant considerations

The decision was made for me on the last Sunday of April in 1960

Western Wire and Cable Co at the Weyburn airport had expanded its operating area an additional hangar and was holding an official opening and reception to celebrate and publicize the enhancement We had been asked to print a special section of the Review to commemorate the occasion and to provide several thousand extra copies of the section With our limit of four pages per run on the old Optimus press with each section handfed into a folder after printing, plus the longer press run it was necessary to work through the weekend to print the special

We were halfway through the last run of the special when the press seized and wouldn't run Floyd Trudeau again left whatever he was doing on a Sunday afternoon and tackled the mechanical monster He adjusted nothing swore mightily made more adjustments and swore some more and declared that there was just no goddamn reason why the sonofabitch wouldn't run

In the meantime I was saying silent prayers and promising God that if He got me through this one press run I would never bother Him for another favor in my whole life Naturally it is a promise many times broken but it was made sincerely I console myself that the Almighty is probably more favorably disposed toward individuals who demonstrate frequent dependency than toward those whose self-sufficiency fails them only once in a lifetime

If you wonder about the urgency of completing the run it was this as the old flatbed presses four pages were first printed on one side of the sheet The sheets were then turned over and printed on the other side with another four pages Metal and storage space were usually limited so the first four pages of type were disassembled and melted down before the next run was completed. Had we been unable to complete the run it would have been necessary to reset the first four pages and take the right pages to Estevan for printing because no shop within a reasonable distance had a press compatible with our page size.

In any case, between God and Floyd it was possible to coax the press, at slow speeds and with signs of heating up to complete the press run Then I ordered the press turned off and never started again making arrangements with the Estevan Mercury to print the Review on their Coz-o-type until alternate arrangements could be made repairs, a more efficient operation and roll newsprint at a substantially lower price than sheet stock. I wrote the Goss company enthusing considerations for a reasonable terms for a Cox-o-type press of our own.

Calculating how much money could be saved annually by not having constant and costly press

The building to house the press and the Review, I concluded would have to be built by someone prepared to make an investment less long-term rental. Against almost desperate whim prospective investors accustomed to treating the Review as a joke, I used equal humor in the thought of taking good dollars on its future. None certainly demonstrated any sense of urgency in considering the proposal.

A new building

Somehow I was steered to the Porter brothers, Jim and Chuck, whom I knew only casually at the time. They not only gave me a sympathetic hearing but, being temporarily unable to make this sort of commitment, undertook to find an investor. It was through them that I was brought together with Gordon Russell, a downtown retailer who agreed to look at my needs. The Goss people, by the way, had acceded to my pleas for easy terms, and my orders were already "in the works" before we even had a place to put the press. Gordon made quick decisions after studying a proposal seriously, and within weeks ground was broken for a cement block and brick building built to my specifications (modified by Russell, a greater experience in these matters) on Second Street between Sourse and Conant Avenues.

This meshed the beginning of a lengthy relationship that would be envied by anyone who has ever accepted leased premises of any kind. The Review was in the building for over seventeen years, and in all those years there was never once occasion for me to complain about anything concerning the arrangement. If Gordon Russell ever had cause to be dissatisfied with us — a possibility, since maintenance was the lessee's responsibility — he was kind enough never to tell me about it. Over the years we had occasion twice to make additions to the building, adding first a small warehouse and then a second storey in 1967. On both occasions Gordon was out at town when I identified my need, both times I contacted him wherever he was, and on both occasions he gave me a verbal okay, leaving the legal details and rental adjustments — always low — to be completed after his return, usually after construction had begun.

Completion of our new building was targeted for mid-September of 1960, and for the intervening five months we took our page forms to Estevan for printing — one trip for each press run, but in those days sixteen pages (two runs on the Cox-o type) was our limit. We were unable to meet our deadlines forward, so instead of having the printed product available fairly early on Thursday mornings, so our readers were accustomed, the papers did not reach our office until the truck returned in mid-afternoon or later. We last readers temporarily and advertisers were not exactly thrilled.

With the co-operation of Sterling King at the Mercury, the months of printing at Estevan passed almost without incident, except for the occasion when our pressmen put his knee through a page while putting it on the press, scattering type and spacing material all over the neighborhood. Fortunately we kept page proofs, but I had to drive to Estevan with it (fifty miles) then help them sort the knee rules and spaces to match the proof. The Mercury's type faces were different than ours, so we were unable to reset some parts of the page which would have been faster and easier.

About the most difficult aspect of having the paper printed in Estevan was the unnatural atmosphere of the office after closing our forms. It was weird, this sudden transition to something like weightlessness from frenzy to a standstill state.

In a weekly, when all the pre-press functions merge and the press begins to run, there may be a sense of finality for most of the staff, but there is also a new progression that meshes with what a newspaper is all about. The first impatient readers have been waiting restlessly at the counter to get one of the first copies (there are always a few regulars who do this). They comes a steady trickle of advertisers and readers who come as soon as they can be reasonably sure the paper is available. Bindery workers are inserting and bagging papers for mailing and counting out piles for the carrier boys; others are taking bags of papers to the post office for distribution and mailing; carrier boys march into the office and through to the shop to fill their bags and money is being collected from the youngsters who are responsible for collections from their customers. Advertisers hurry out with tearsheets. The phone starts ringing with the earliest reactions to the paper hitting the streets: an occasional compliment, complimentary query. When you go downtown you see people in restaurants — friends acquaintances and complete strangers — reading your paper the words you have written, or edited, and printed. It is the culmination of what the week's work has been all about: not just a pile of printed matter but a collection of informations going out to and being absorbed by the community.

It is a feeling that always is both new and traditional. But it disappeared for months while we printed at Estevan. The public quickly learned that there would be no paper until some indeterminate time after the truck had returned and the sentence collated. So after the truck left, loaded with page forms there was only silence. No customers, no carrier boys no ringing telephones no complaints, just a heavy silence that felt like disapproval and embarrassment at our shame. We had worked hard at producing something and had nothing to show for it.

Even when the truck showed up with the finished product, it was not as though time had simply been suspended for a few hours. There was just no excitement about the paper being out and available; at this late hour it seemed simply irrelevant.

But it was the nadir of our early years at Weyburn: the final purgatory before our glorious entry into the comparative paradise of a new building built to our needs and with a brand new press.

Business as usual

OAGE-STORY September 8 1960

This week's issue of the Weyburn Review was produced under circumstances even more confusing than those which usually exist.

The reason is that the big native at our new premises began last week and with the building on Second St still under construction, the office remained at the old location while the composing and stereotype department were re-organized in the new quarters early this week.

The proceedures was totally "blacked out" for a few days, with presses either awaiting re-assembly or electrical hook-up.

A one or two-week delay would have been better for all but this was made all but impossible by the advance arrangements which had to be made in connection with the move.

As it was the Goss Cox-o-type printing press on which the Review will be printed in the future arrived a week before the scheduled delivery time and the 12 tons of much very parts had to be stored until the floor of the building had set. On Tuesday of last week as had been arranged earlier A Cunningham of the Goss Co. Chicago, arrived to begin reunion work on the eight-page web-fed newspaper press.

Another factor which contributed to the on-schedule move was the size of the back door at the old building. Because the opening was not large enough to accommodate the large pieces of equipment required in the production of a newspaper a number of machines had to be stripped to size and re-assembled in the new plant.

The two main reel experiencend machinists. These were provided by Toronto Type Foundry of Winnipeg with Vince Webster and Frank Bean seeing at the presses and Don Green in charge of the typesetting machines. Mr. Green was one of the men who who installed the linotype machine in the Review office two years ago.

To move the printing presses, stereotyping and bindery equipment out of the basement of the premises which have been occupied by the Review as long as most people can remember, it has been necessary to remove the entire rear wall so that the machines may be raised through the stairway opening.

By last weekend, most of the heavy equipment had been removed from the basement by the movers, Heavy Equipment Haulers.

Moving of the remaining equipment was deferred until later this week in an not to interfere with the production of the paper — mirely hampered by temporary electrical hook-ups and lighting the usual problems associated with moving and machinists finishing off the building — and to give things a chance to adjust at the new building before the balance is brought a The Office staff and fixtures also remained at the Mitchell Block so as not to interfere with finish ng work in the new office

It is hoped that by next weekend the entire move will have been completed and that production will soon be in normal shortly thereafter Business, of course has been carried on in usual during this time with very few printing orders affected by the temporary shut-down of the presses

One thing which may be attributed to the move is the scarcity of pictures in this week s paper This was partly due to the staff being occupied in mov ng and partly because the engraver had been rushed for moving, making it necessary to have plates made in Kenora

Th i week s issue is sli l being printed on the new

The move into the new building seemed to write "finis" in the era in which we grop ingly attempted to establish ourselves in Weyburn and to restore the newspaper s image as the mirror of the community ingrad out in a modern plant While the years ahead were not free of problems, as could not have been expected in any business under a novice s management, we had soon bought most of the equipment then considered appropriate for a weekly plant the size of ours.

The Co-o-type press secured like a miracle printing four, then eight pages at a time at a speed of over two thousand impressions per hour simultaneously slitting and quarter-folding them eliminating what had once been an extra step The printed image especially photos was of a lower quality than that of the old sheet-fed presses but at such a saving in time and money it was easy to walk at some sacrifice

To further increase type production we bought a brand new Comet Linotype capable of turning out eight lines per minute instead of the traditional six. Within a year we had this typesetter hooked up to teletypesetter equipment with the Linotype producing type from tape-led commands. The tape was punched in the front office on a separate keyboard with a standard typewriter configuration and operated by a typist

The big advantage was that while a manual line operator stop ipped averaged about five lines per minute — speaking now of a first-class operator — and about three lines or slightly more for the average operator and still less for a learner the tape-controlled machine could run at full speed except for short stops in change tapes and remove "slicks" of type. It was not without disadvantages but these were well compensated for by faster and less costly production.

Beside the press breakdown which forced me into replacement of both press and building, most of the modernization came about deliberately and systematically based on cost-effectiveness and the availability of a down payment

One of the changes that came at least in prospect only as the press was now furniture for my office. I had decided that cosmetic changes could not be undertaken until all our production equipment was top-line So I made do even in the new building with a rickety old desk with drawers that jammed and a vintage swivel chair The chair had armrests supported by wooden spindles rising from the seat The chair's height was adjusted by spinning the chair and then tightening the vertical screw at the right height The screw had become worn over the years so the chair would gradually sink as I worked I could barely reach at my desk. Then I would have to stop whatever I was doing and bring the chair up to working level again The spindles were also loose and occasionally would slip out of their holes, also requiring some delicate restoration

When Phyllis Katelly took over as sales manager her bookkeeping duties were taken over by a young man by the name of Don Forbes Don had a keen sense of humour, but a very old-fashioned approach to business relationships. While almost everyone in the shop called me Ernie I was always Mr Neufeld to Don and he always addressed me as respectfully as though I were Lord Thomson

One morning he came into my office and asked me a question that required some thought. As I addressed myself to the problem I leaned back and placed my arms on the armrests.

This is difficult even for me to believe, but at this point the screw failed completely, the chair sank to its lowest level with a lurp and a thud and every individual spindle and all the crossbars at the chair's back, fell apart and tumbled into a heap on the floor It was like a scene from a cheap western or a second-rate farce Total destruction

Even Dan's sense of dignity and decorum could not restrain him. He not only laughed, he howled, doubled over and holding his belly with both arms. I laughed too, but not quite so heartily.

That day I bought both a new chair and a new desk.

The Estevan Mercury

Another major change came in 1963 when we were offered the Estevan Mercury on a silver platter.

In the middle 1950s or thereabouts the Liverpool (England) Echo organization expanded into Canada buying a weekly in Midland, Ontario, the Estevan Mercury, the daily Red Deer Advocate in Alberta, and three weeklies in British Columbia's Fraser River Valley.

We had no sooner taken over the Review — my family hadn't even jumped out in Weyburn — when I received a letter from the Echo's top executive suggesting that I might be open to an offer. I replied that we hadn't bought the Review just to resell it, but admitted that everything probably had its price. Not long after that the Echo executive, on his annual visit to the Canadian holdings, dropped in to see me and to feel out my amenability to an offer. He expressed serious concern about my financial ability to handle the necessary rebuilding of the Review.

I then again I declined to negotiate, thereby adding to the worries of our first year in Weyburn we secretly feared the Liverpool group might be as ruthless as some of the newspaper chains than feeding on their neighbors in the country. As it turned out the English as we called them always behaved like good neighbors and I don't know how I would have survived without their co-operation during the press crisis.

It developed, however, that not everything was peaches and cream in the Echo's overseas operations either. While the Red Deer and Fraser Valley operations were thriving, the same could not be said for Midland and even less for the Mercury which reportedly was losing money hand-over-fist.

Long-distance supervision was obviously one of the problems in the Mercury's case and another was a United Kingdom policy that did not look favorably upon money-losing foreign investments. There were also a few local problems, but they would have been unreasonable taken out of the framework of the other two.

The upshot of all this was that one day I received a visit from Cecil Hacker of Abbotsford British Columbia manager of the Echo's Canadian operations. The visit purported to be neighborly and fraternal, but sensing a less casual underlying purpose I was tense and tight-cuffish.

Having heard of the troubles at the Mercury and being close enough to see and sense a few more, I cheekily asked how things were going in Estevan. I was surprised when Hacker replied quite candidly that things weren't going well at all. Still more brazenly I suggested that maybe Liverpool might be offering the Mercury to me. I almost fell from my chair when he replied with a pained expression, that such might not be the worst solution and suggested a figure well above anything I could have managed or than would have been reasonable in view of the Mercury's fallen state: a steadily decreasing circulation and reduced advertising sales in the face of stiff shoppers competition. I countered with an offer about half of his — also unreasonable — and was not surprised when he seemed offended. He left but left the door open by suggesting we might meet in Calgary some weekend if I could bring myself to think in terms of a more reasonable price.

Until that moment I hadn't really believed he was serious, and the enormity of it all left me almost speechless. I had long held that the Mercury and the Review were near enough to each other to operate out of one shop cutting out a lot of duplications in expensive equipment. It had seems seemed likely that the Liverpool group would consider a production partnership and we,

of course were not inclined to sell out. Now, suddenly, a joint operation was possible, under circumstances I could not have imagined until that moment.

A short exchange of letters ensued and a few weeks later Cecil Hacken, Jr. and I met in Calgary and at the moment Harvey Lee Oswald was shooting John Fitzgerald Kennedy in Dallas we were shaking hands on the transfer of the Mercury at a price about halfway between the two extreme figures mentioned at our Weyburn meeting.

The opportunity to acquire the Mercury came at a time when we were hardly in a financial position to assume new obligations. However, my conviction that the Mercury and the Review were legitimately a single operation from a production point of view, compelled me to seek backing. Again I typed the Porter brothers who had helped me find an investor for the Review's new building. I am certain Jim and Chuck, men of wide business experience, realized that realities would fall somewhat short of the enthusiastic picture I painted for them but generously decided to chance it anyway. They agreed to participate on any one of several arrangements — at my option — and thus became financially involved in the Review as an investment that continued for about twenty years. I have nothing but good memories of the association. It was another one of those that fostered faith in human nature.

Papers were signed in mid-December, and a few days before or after Christmas I presented myself to the manager of the Estevan Mercury bearing a letter announcing the change in ownership.

Another moment to treasure, however unworthily.

Mercury managers he'd never mistreated me, but their courtesies were usually extended with the patronizing air that well-paid executives of large corporations find difficult to shake in the presence of humbler colleagues who must constantly make ends meet without head office subsidization when such one be justified.

When I entered his office the manager was sitting back in his reclining chair with one foot on the desk and was speaking into the telephone to a close friend about some absurd activity. He waved me into a chair, which I took while laying the folded letter on the table in front of him. He lastly acknowledged the letter with one hand while continuing his companionable telephone conversation.

His mind seemed to have difficulty absorbing what he was reading on the first pass, particularly with the distraction of the telephone call; the second time around his eyes glazed and he suddenly hung up the receiver with a terse "Call you later."

For a few seconds he looked as though he was still unable to make sense of it all, until suddenly he gasped "My God, you're my boss!"

That began a new phase of our newspaper career: one with almost as many surprises as centering the business personally in Weyburn. Having visualized the merger as a solution to many problems, it was but it also added new ones. I soon verified it was one thing to direct an operation personally and quite another to accomplish change from a distance. This holds true particularly when the staff has become accustomed to absentee ownership by a large corporation. Since not a single individual had stood dependent on a profit. Rule was done to avoid unnecessary costs that could be justified or had been budgeted.

In short it was like a bureaucracy.

Shortly after the acquisition we brought the mechanical production of the Mercury to Weyburn while all our job printing equipment and business was moved to the Mercury plant. To accomplish the first, we leased a direct telephone line between the two offices. News and advertising copy were punched on teletype tape at the Mercury and transmitted to the Review office to be run off on our tape-controlled typesetting machine.

Earlier I explained how loose or tight lines of matrices may cause "squirts" on typesetting machines, cause damage to machines and matrices or all of these. A beginner quickly learns to avoid this error because a squirt can be physically painful and is always a time-consuming nuisance.

A clerk punching tape in an office outside the composing room is a bit harder to teach because the is faced with neither the danger nor the inconvenience. Even when the submitter tells her the line is full or loose all she has to do is hit the "return" key, and the problem becomes that of the person superadding the typesetting machine. Even then if she is communications, and it brought face to face with the chaos she has caused and treated to some choice language by the foreman the soon adapts. At a distance of fifty miles, however, the telephone has been to become pretty hot and has been fully convey the production department displeasure. It was a battle never really won but fortunately effect printing was not too far off less than two years, although we didn't know it.

Estevan folks had resented absentee ownership by the Liverpool group and I had cherished the hope that they would be thrilled to see the paper taken over by a Saskatchewan resident. Not a chance! Weyburn and Estevan are and then were about the same size, the competing for markets industries and government offices, and I discovered Weyburn just wasn't a good word anywhere in Estevan. We never really got the Mercury turned around until several years later when I brought George Derksen, the youngest of Irene's three brothers in as a shareholder and manager of a separate company operating the Mercury. Several years after the advent of offset and taking several other factors and developments into consideration, we sold our interest in the Mercury to George, and following his death a few years later — after bringing the operation back to profitability — the Mercury was again taken over by strangers.

Once chatting with one of several managers who preceded George, I tried to explain one of the effects of a backshop background on my approach to management when I had first come to Weyburn. I told him that because I had been accustomed to performing assigned work with each job having an identifiable beginning and end I was out of my element faced with competing demands on my time and concentration and with handling intangibles. Given the backshop situation at the Review in my first few years I had often found it necessary to spend evening hours on the linos setting type. Because I was a skilled operator, and because I knew I was producing something tangible my mind relaxed and I was able to sort out some of my business problems, I explained.

When this manager left the Mercury's employ, he filled his successor in on some of the particulars of the position and especially the "eccentricities of working with me." "Why," he said, "that man's idea of relaxation is running a lino."

The pre-offset Mercury period, while not quite the nightmare of the early Review years was a two-year stretch of unpredictable and unrewarding frustrations, two solid days of work in our composing room every week to put out twelve pages of the Mercury then putting together sixteen to twenty pages of Herman in one day weekly trips to Estevan to put out that area, try to motivate staff and interview prospective employees. Meanwhile, one day a week had been taken out of my own schedule in Weyburn, adding to the extra hours I had to spend catching up.

Too late I discovered that the Estevan staff was able to meet delivery demands for Weyburn job printing by posting off Estevan work. Naturally, the absentee Weyburn management got the black eye for this, and commercial printing from Estevan sources dwindled to a trickle. Inevitably Weyburn service also suffered since two days were almost inevitably lost in sending the order to Estevan and receiving shipment of the finished product. The experiment failed partly because of some of the factors mentioned partly because of the difficulty of staffing in the Saskatchewan labor market of the 1960's and I must confess that I miserably failed to measure up to the imperatives of absentee management.

At about the time of the Mercury acquisition I was also becoming increasingly involved in community and newspaper association activities. I was president of the Weyburn Chamber of Commerce during the year of the Mercury purchase also the year of Weyburn's 50th jubilee celebrations. I served on the city-appointed Jubilee Committee, charged with co-ordinating activities in the city jubilee the 1965 provincial 60th anniversary and the 1967 Canadian Centennial celebrations. I was also on the board of directors of the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association at the time.

All the extra activity turned out to be for the good because it forced me to learn to delegate authority in the news department. With trained young reporters non-existent — at least unavailable to weeklies — and few high school graduates interested in learning newspaper reporting, I had relied during my first two years in Weyburn — after several disastrous hiring errors — largely on my own writing and reporting, which was additional to management, some selling and some mechanical work

It was a streak of luck that about 1960 Mary Greer presented herself at my office and announced (probably wryly in an ad) that she wished to apply for a reporting position. She was a mature woman (from my point of view) had some typing experience was a native of Weyburn and had been active in a number of organizations.

My experience to that point had been that applicants expected to be paid on the basis of age education financial need and just about anything except background in the type of work being sought. Therefore I asked rather cautiously what sort of salary she would expect. I was dumbfounded when she declared with dignity that since she knew nothing about the business she expected to start at the bottom

This brought to an end one of the nightmares of my initial years at the Review for Mary brought to the job intelligence a natural talent for writing, humor, knowledge of the community from a pioneer-family perspective integrity and love for her work By the time of the Mercury purchase I relied heavily on her assistance and with new duties demanding more of my time I made the obvious decision and appointed her news editor a position she held ably until near the end of the 1960s when she and her husband Jack decided to move to British Columbia

Switch to offset printing

Only a few years after the Mercury purchase came about what can only be termed a complete metamorphosis in the production of weekly newspapers. offset printing

Until the 1960s it was simply a given that newspapers must be printed by the letterpress process a process that had hardly changed in decades at the level of technology available to a small plant

Letterpress printing is the process through which printed matter is produced by imprinting paper from inked metal type or plates with printing areas defined by raised surfaces The only major changes her machines had been the web-fed presses such as the Cox-o-type we had recently installed — introduced for a variety of reasons two decades too late — and tape-driven typesetting machines Both had evolved naturally as improvements in the letterpress process but neither was startlingly innovative For that matter neither was available to most community newspapers because they were too small to manage the capital outlay

To describe the offset process I won't try to improve on an article I wrote for the Jubilee '60 special edition I compiled and edited for the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association in 1960 It follows:

A northern trail blazer

When relief finally came from the mechanical nightmare that dom nated life in the weekly newspaper industry about two decades ago, it came so fast as a major technological breakthrough, no on the blinding flash of revelation, experienced by Saul on the road to Damascus.

For several decades as weekly newspapermen throughout Saskatchewan — as elsewhere for that matter — sank weekly no bed late on publishing night each at one time or another groaned to himself: "Isn't there an easier way?" By next morning, however the discipline of an accepted order of things reasserted itself and life went on as usual.

Here and there however maverick pioneers in different parts of the country found themselves drawn to the advantages of a relatively established process known as offset l ithography In Saskatchewan it was Al Mazur now a 25 year veteran of the new order and as publisher of the Hudson Bay Post-Review

Lithography itself is not new It is a technique mistakenly discovered in the mid 1800s, whereby a grease-base image can be transferred with high fidelity onto paper or other materials. Early lithographing presses were at least as cumbersome as printing presses and because they required water and chemicals as well as ink problems arose commonplace. These chief advantage lay in the faithful reproduction of art work impregnated on special stone slabs.

Later when it was discovered that zinc and aluminum would serve as well as stone and that images could be photographically exposed onto these metals printing posed become another plus for the printer could be offered an rapidly running cyl inders because positive images were used printed onto a rubber blanket and offset onto the paper from the blanket, the process became known as offset lithography today simply offset printing.

Still another advantage held any great attraction to the country newspaper. Printing spend was not a great load in the publisher's catalogue of problems, nor was high fidelity. The major problems lay in getting the written word into printed form along a path well sprinkled with hazards.

Photography was still an alien discipline to the small printing office and if the though of offset printing ever even crossed a publisher's mind it was quickly rejected as an invention to making new skills seem woes and new impediments to an already-burdensome pursuit.

If this sounds backward it should be borne a round that, aside from hand-lettering, the only practical way to transcribe language into form suitable for photographing was to typeset it carefully pull a proof and then allow the ink to dry so that the proof might be handled without smearing. Manual typewriters with conventional ribbons did not provide type of suitable quality.

Then, in the years following World War 2 came several developments which turned the minds of a few publishers toward offset

1 A simple vertical camera, occupying little space and easy to operate took the magic out of the photographic process involved in offset.

2. Pre sensitized offset printing plates, and a simple plate-burner minds another highly specialized skill now it took and surely massive operation

3 Electric typewriters with one-time carbons (ribbons) offset clarity, consistent camera-ready type

4 A burgeoning lithography industry was still quint specialized and presses and no place to go from there but to the "boneyard" A few press salesmen and their keen eyes began looking wistfully at the thousands of weekly newspaper offices where makeset might find a few more useful years.

5 Electronic engraving machines had introduced photo journal ism into the office of the weekly but too often the publisher found the time and effort it took to take a picture develop and print it and then engrave it on costly plates went almost far enough when the final product was a hardly enough salable likeness of a person or an event

These five elements ought to have offered sufficient incentive for a mass switch to offset right there Change doesn't come easily however Heavy investments a conversational printing machinery could not light y be written off and the very problems of the trade had cultivated an "immune mechanism" against fundamental change

The tyranny of the present had effectmaed most publishers who were not trade-oriented Thus publishers were with a few exceptions persons to whom the trade was a primary discipline and journalism a secondary interest.

So for all the wishful thinking about a better way others At Mazur established an offset-produced newspaper in the mod-Sin at Hudson Bay a small town where a succession of itinerpreat publications had failed the news was greeted with amusement that included hostility suspicion ridicule contempt horror and fear

Far from being regarded as a leader who was blazing a new path through the jungle he was initially seen as a threat to the status quo a rebel an apostate profaning a thing that had been revealed and sanctified by Gutenberg and Mergenthaler But Mazur engrossed in the day-to-day challenges of pioneering and far from the brains trust which in his mind improved on but predict and wherever he met his colleagues at conventions or workshops, enthusiastically preached the new gospel of offset

Despite the hostility toward the offset process, fellow publishers envied Mazur his beautiful by printed photos and clean-cut snappy-looking paper Within a few years Tom Kearns at Kisling, the late Marv Willoughby at Midnatoan and Alec Sharp at Assiniboia had become practising converts

The switch to offset had slowly begun

About the time I realized that most of the machinery involved in the Review's production process was due for early replacement, I attended a Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association workshop, where the main speaker was one John Ellison who spoke convincingly about offset printing as the 20th century alternative for weekly newspapers.

A big, innocent-looking individual who could probably sell sand to Arabs, Elliot was quickly dubbed "Honest John." He certainly sold me, and I asked him to come to Weyburn and suggest an offset solution. In fairness to him, he looked at our circulation figures and our normal number of pages and quickly counselled against going offset.

Our two alternatives in switching to offset, he pointed out, would be to install one of his presses and print four tabloid pages at a time, and then fold and collate all the sections — or to install a Goss Suburban press, a webfed offset press just on the market at $75 000 plus. The former, in his opinion, would result in by creating an impossible workload and deadlines problem, and the latter would break us through the capital cost.

Once again he sold me and I went the route of resolving one letterpress operation and then turned right around and switched to offset.

Little interest in offset

EDITORIAL August 4 1977

On several occasions I have mentioned in this column the rate at which technology is moving in the newspaper industry.

Cleaning out correspondence files the other day I ran across a letter I received in 1958 which bears this out and afforded me a little chuckle as well.

When I came to Weyburn in 1958, most of the equipment at the Review office needed replacement and I was desperate, y attempting during the first year or two to circle practicable from all available credit.

In that winter (early 1959) I attended a workshop of our provincial newspaper association where several speakers were hold up forth enthusiastically on offset printing as the coming thing for weekly newspapers.

They really got to me and I went home infected with the concept. Since we were faced with a complete replacement program anyway why not go method right off?

I discussed the matter with my chief supplier for information, and here, with no new deletions, is the reply I rece ved:

"You will no doubt recall on our visit to you that we discussed the contadernation you were giving offset for the publication of your paper.

"We wrote to ——— in see if he could get some information for us and we also discussed it with the ad man when he was in our office if he could give us the names of anybody you could get in touch with.

"Frankly both of the opinions of these men were that really two that they know of were putting out their papers by offset which was, of course, an individual matter which would be of no interest to you and they both do not feel that offset printing has any place for the publication of a newspaper such as printed by the Weyburn Review.

"These gentlemen are very personal opinions and the reason we are passing them along to you is that both these men have quite an inside picture more quite a large acreage and for that reason we offer you might be interested in their reactions.

"I would appear that them have been a great deal of interest shown by the weekly publishers as yet in the method of producing their papers and it has quietly we were not able to get a lot of information."

Armed with this and similar advice we modernized along traditional lines only to find not a few years later that our offset theory had been right in the first place.

In 1965 the Review became the first weekly in Saskatchewan with its own in-plant web offset facility here. Since then all but perhaps one in two weeklies in this province have switched to offset printing with most of the pressework done in central plants.

When made the switch feasible in the mid 1960s, at least to us, was a package offer by the Goss company the newly introduced Community press — a more modestly priced sister to the Suburban — and a fairly soon and plate-making assembly that would give a publisher all that was necessary to print an offset newspaper. A generous trade-in was offered for Color-type presses such as ours.

Considering my enthusiasm when I had fallen under the spell of Honest John, I ought to have been immediately interested. It is pretty hard, however to convince someone who has completely refined an operation that what he has done, at great cost, is almost obsolete. One foreman at the time, an outspoken printer by the name of Bill Adair kept telling me that in the United States and in British Columbia a decided switch to offset had begun, bringing the benefits of lower production costs and high-fidelity reproduction of photos.

Perhaps no five years, was my reply. Then one day I was discussing the trend toward offset with another publisher who with a modern letterhead plant, held views similar to mine. I decided to play the devil's advocate and played it so well that I convinced both of us.

Within the next week I had contacted Goss learned of the package offer described earlier and made my decision. Adair was on vacation at the time and on the Monday he returned I called him into my office and joyously told him of my decision. He stared at me in amusement slowly shook his head and fervently declared "You know Ernie when we were coming home last night just when we reached the sign that said "Welcome to Weyburn I said to John I wonder what that hairy bastard has thought up now "

Bill, as I said was outspoken And I hadn't really disappointed him I had only gone a step beyond anything he had expected from me

However taken aback he may have been from that point on he was all co-operation and even enthusiasm as we proceeded to plan and implement changes that would lead us into this new wilderness Fortunately we had installed a small offset job printing press a year or two earlier although this had done little more than introduce us to the mysteries of a new craft. Seeing a magic show doesn't really equip one to step on the stage and do likewise

All we would do was clean an area adjacent to the front office for a 12x12 darkroom orders two light tables and prepare another area in the middle of the shop for the offset press We sent a young employee in another newspaper that had recently converted for a crash course in the darkroom work on which the offset process depended.

It probably would have made sense to make sure the new press was fully installed and reasonably understood by our personnel before we jumped into conversion for the Review press run but no, as soon as the Goss company erection set up lined up and greased in the press and got the darkroom operation until nothing would do but a switch right then.

We come now back our annual Fire Prevention issue one or two weeks so that we might print it in two colors It was printed on Sunday afternoon under the reluctant supervision of the press erector Al Cunningham, whose cheek began to twitch as he watched me reading the separations for the ten a number of times before they were — barely — usable Naturally I had made at all much too complicated layout confusing the red and black images and ended up with many black and red areas reversed One illustration ended up with black-tipped red matchsticks

"Bet you don t see that after — many color on the first run" one of our staffers exclaimed proudly to Cunningham.

"Ever" sandwich has to do it " replied rural Missourian Cunningham through clenched teeth

Our real baptism is fire, however, still lay ahead Cunningham stayed around a few more days to dismantle and crate the "old" Cox-o-type press and was available for support when we produced our first fully offset editions of both papers but we were on our own as learning to do the pre-press work with inadequate equipment

Instead of simply locking up forms into pages as we had been accustomed to doing all our lives, we now had to pull proofs on an unfamiliar proof press, and wait for the proofs to dry before we pasted them up We tried to speed up the process by holding the proofs near light bulbs, but it was still very much like watching pots to cause to a boil no too often we handled a proof prematurely smeared it and had to pull a new proof

Our ears were already ringing from the interruptions and complaints of the Mercury manager He was always sure he was getting the dirty end of the stick and of course in sundin't possibly believe that it was worse for us having as we did on hand the same problems as he, plus the darkroom platemaking and offset press Tempers run high and tempers flared and there was almost a rebellion when the lad who had received the crash course in the darkroom of another offset newspaper complained that he hadn't seen a hockey game for over a week and might take a few hours off that night to see one. He was probably kidding or trying to have his importance acknowledged, because we were able to prevail upon him to forgo holiday for one more night while we got out our first offset issue. But he sure had an unwritten!

There were moments during the first months, and occasionally the first week when I questioned my sanity in making the conversion. In fact I was not alone. However even at the worst times there were glimmerings of promise when I could sense, without really putting my finger on it, that we were heading for sweeping changes. And indeed we were.

Another factor that guaranteed an interesting metamorphosis was that there really were no guidelines and each plant was its own laboratory and testing and training ground. Where the letterpress weekly had learned from and imitated daily newspaper production methods to the extent permitted by economics and common sense, this was not possible with offset because there was no model to follow.

Again, an article I wrote for Jubilee 80 tells the story more fully than memory permits after still another decade.

The big switch

A full decade passed in Saskatchewan between the tentative groping search in offset printing by Al Moore at the Flotten Bay Post-Review, and anything resembling enormous, industry-wide conversion to the new process.

While publishers today tend to ask, "What took us so long?" there did not exist in the mid-1950s the infrastructure for a viable offset-produced newspaper industry. The press was sizzling at that time started with the photo-ready page and ended with a press — a stand-out for all practical purposes.

Cold compositon which includes any typesetting method not employing type cast from molten metal was primitive. Photo-composition was in its very infancy and with no market for these amazing but complicated machines they bore price tags that paused them well out of the reach of the country printer. There was really nothing but an electric typewriter with a face reduced in size and modified at base to resemble standard news faces. All the letters went the same width, which was enough to offend the eye of the printer and, horror of horrors, there was no way of aligning the columns on the right. Trade-between publishers could not concur we of their readers accepting a printed product with ragged columns.

Furthermore where the line-saver offered at least some variety as to sizes and styles in keyboard-generated type, the office process offered nothing between typewriter size had hand-assembled larger sizes.

Even the first hand-operated photo-typesetting display machines, while offering variety and range spoed than hand-tastefully reterabled nothing so much as the little toy typewriters children get at Christmas. On one popular model, the type images were mounted that near the outer edge of a large, circular plastic disc which had to be swung into position for each character exposed by pressing a switch controlled by one hand then moved to the next letter. This process created a long, narrow strip of photo-ready type which then had to be cut and positioned carefully on the page — assuming it did not have to be redone because it had become fouled in the developing tray.

Even affixing type to pages was a major problem. If the adhesive dried too fast the image stuck before it was properly positioned, and any later alterations or corrections resulted in ugly patchwork. The answer to that problem finally came in the form of rubber however, which allows page-size to be positioned so they are sticky enough for working purposes but still easily movable as required.

The press was another deterrent. Machines available within economic limits were used commercial presses accepting a maximum sheet size of about 17 by 22 inches — the equivalent of two tabloid newspaper pages. Thus the offset operation was limited to a two-page (tabloid) press run and four-page between which, after printing, had to be folded and gathered.

Even the small newspaper was accustomed to a four-page print, producing a single eight-page section.

The root of the problem was that the normal industrial evolutionary process was reversed. Normally the giants of the industry are the innovators and perfectors, and the changes seep slowly down to the smaller plants. In newspaper publishing, the reverse held true in the conversion to offset.

Printing and publishing had boomed in post-war North America and millions had been spent on expanding printing plants along conventional lines. Union agreements defined jurisdictions along lines that had evolved for a century or more. Conversion to a new process promised little but the confusion of retraining, sacrifice of great investments, and almost-certain industrial strife.

So sadness it had no name from the bottom The small offset weekly ridiculed at first, then tolerated but always envied its sharp photographic reproduction and the simple cy of assembly for all to disappear It might have perished had it existed in a complete vacuum but the cocoonate of offset industry was also thriving and improvements gradually were introduced

The medium-sized and larger weekly newspaper, meanwhile, was flourishing There is no need to add a new acceptance in the role of spokesman for the communities-oriented community throughout served and for the most up local bits of news and comment that was so stock in trade

Plants were enlarged and became more modern and but publishers found themselves on a treadmill As rapidly as people were trained to operate the complicated machines they joined the rank in the big city and had to be replaced by new trainees. The machines themselves suffered from overuse use by half-trained help and lack of expert maintenance causing costly breakdowns

In addition photo-journal ism and simp s electronic engravers had come in the weekly newspaper However the engravers seldom produced good engravings a the hands of non-professionals and the newer web-fed presses designed for speed and at least twenty years held to the latest, took what was left of the original photo and imprinted it on the newspaper page in a barely recognizable mass of ink.

In the early 1960s a major press manufacturer introduced to offset press designed for the large weekly It was web-fed and capable of producing four eight twelve to fourteen-page sections at a speed of almost 70 00 per hour and folded in the same process.

Meantime a subsidiary of a sewing machine company brought relief in the typesetting area. Tape could be punched on a typewriter-like machine which computed the necessary space between words to fill out the l ne, and immediately fed into a "slaved" unit which produced columns of camera-ready type with nearly al good right-hand edges as clear to journey users

Wood came of conversion to offset by larger weekl ies and small dailies in British Columbia the western states and some other isolated parts of the continent

In 1965 the Weyburn Review then one of the most modern letterpress plants in the province made the switch. There were a few gasps but nothing in the order of the horror that had accompanied the Flodden Ray s agreement ten years earlier

The b g switch was on and within a few years, all but a few holdouts had gone offset, part of the vanguard of a cont nent wide revolution.

This new market spurred the development of relatively simple computerized photo-typesetting machines and wh le the metropolitan dailies were still working with venerable linecasters that had hardly changed since the turn of the century even small weekl ies were using these technological miracles and rig ac ng them as better faster and more flexible generations of typesetters were developed

Today even small weekly shops own typesetters so sophisticated that they might have been equated with black magic just a few years ago

More important than the fact that the drudgery has been taken out f printing, offset has given weekly newspaper readers a vast y superior product. Ines enabled papers to serv ve that might by now have passed from the scene and has even increased the number of weeklies being published

More important it has developed a breed of publishers who are able to spend more now and effort on content, and are readily adjusted to the inevitability of constant change and improvement and committed to meeting the challenges of the years and decades ahead

Cold composition

Very quickly machine manufacturers became aware of a vast new industry with needs and demands of infinite proportions and not many years passed before offset weeklies were assembled, photographed and plated from sophisticated equipment designed in many instances, with the medium-small-sized weekly plant in mind

In fall of 1965, the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association invited an American newspaper expert to critique Saskatchewan weeklies at the win ter workshop To enable him to study the subjects he was sent by the SWNA office a copy of each Saskatchewan weekly printed that week "That week" happened to be our very first offset issue a textbook specimen of inexperience with no allen prisons and a few classic samples of Murphy s Law thrown in.

Came the workshop in February n March and the visiting expert threw enlarged facsimiles of our newspapers onto a screen

When he came to the Review e "example," he gassed on it for a few meaningful moments, and muttered something about no comment being necessary. Since at least half of the weekly printers were still not persuaded that offset was the way of the future, our sorry first issue — of course they didn't know it was our first — confirmed their opinion and they greeted both the blow-up and the accompanying comment with a gale of laughter

What could I say? I shrank in inverse proportion to the enlarged image of our diagnosis.

One manufacturer in particular took advantage of the weeklies' needs and stole a march that may be unparalleled in industrial history. The established manufacturers were busying themselves as they had for some years with the prospective needs of the giants of the industry in an approaching age of photo-typography. As a result there were available photo-typesetters in the 1960s at prices of $75,000 upwards.

A new company, Compugraphic, stole the show and the market by producing a computerized photo-typesetting machine capable of setting "straight" matter from "idiot tape" at about 14 to 20 lines per minute. ("Idiot tape" is keypunched tape without operator-designated line endings and straight matter is type of one typeface and size produced in a column of one width.) The Compugraphic grew rapidly in sophistication quality and versatility and became a household word within the industry virtually overnight. In 1975 I was told on good authority that the only weekly in British Columbia without at least one Compugraphic installation was the one holdout letterpress operation.

Besides improving the production and esthetics of the weekly press, offset also ushered in the centralized printing plant.

In letterpress days the sheer weight of the printing forms all but dictated that each community had to have its own printing press. In fact, this condition was almost a comfort to those publishers whose ownership of a paper might reasonably be termed as a printing position purchased, almost in the sense of the old monster printer working independently rather than as an employee.

There were outstanding exceptions, of course: publishers who ran small newspapers that were distinctive and highly regarded for their journalistic content. Many small publishers however seem to have regarded themselves as tradesmen assembling and packaging ads and news matter that came in through the mail or over the counter.

With the first wave of offset conversion publishers were inclined toward one of three options: installing sheet-fed presses and maintaining the independence which so many was almost synonymous with personal integrity or staying with letterpress and taking advantage of all the late-model letterpress equipment (including Cox-o-type presses) flooding the market at incredibly low prices.

It wasn't too long before those who chose the third course in and that their products suffered in comparison with the rapidly improving quality of the products of their converted brethren. They junked the letterpress equipment they had bought so jubilantly and at such bargain prices, and joined the majority.

Since second-hand sheet-fed presses on which the "independents" relied were almost invariably in the 17"x28" range, their number of press runs (and deadlines) were immediately doubled, without even allowing for increased demand for pages which often was generated by a better-looking product. Each section also had to be folded and collated. Driving (or sending) pasted-up pages (referred to as flats) negatives or press-ready aluminum plates to a central plant was a far cry from carting heavy page-sized lead forms. The saving in capital cost of presses and perhaps darkroom equipment provided an additional incentive, and within ten years of the earliest conversions — not counting the original pioneers who toughed it out on sheer cussedness — all but one or two weeklies had gone offset, and most were printed in central plants on web offset presses.

Our early conversion to offset, together with several other sets of circumstances, led to the Review winning an award I have prized above most journalistic achievements in my career

Having renewed my weekly newspaper training with the Dorksens in Stanbarb who were noted among other things for their excellent special editions I naturally came to Weyburn determined to excel in this area as well It wasn't long before I discovered that not too far beyond the horizon three important anniversaries were approaching and with them three opportunities and three challenges to excel

Weyburn a 50th birthday as a city would be celebrated in 1963, the provincial 60th in 1965 and the Canadian Centennial in 1967 So I was faced with three important anniversaries in two-year intervals Each merited indeed demanded a special edition but running so close together there was a built-in danger of duplication

To give each a flavor different from the other two I decided to base the first one solely on Weyburn's history the second on the Weyburn district's past as it related to the provincial scene and the final one a reflection of the Weyburn area within the context of Canadian history and development It didn't work out quite like that but at least there was an overall plan, however loosely shaped

The Weyburn special was produced successfully While the scores of Kinchegraph engravings didn't do justice to the subject Review readers had never been treated to such an aggregation of local pictures Mary Grant collected pictures Phyllis Rainby and I and the advertising space, and Mary and I wrote copiously I am certain both readers and advertisers were happy with the result

It also took wear of the wind out of my sails what with the provincial special only twenty-four leaves away as the calendar For this one I left it to Mary to gather pictures and write articles we had stories and pictures (where possible) of every member of the Legislative Assembly who had served the constituencies in our reading area since Saskatchewan became a province. Advertising sales was delegated completely to the salesman of the day — Phyllis having left for British Columbia — as I am deeply immersed in the wars of the Estevan Mercury Mary did her usual meticulous job and our readers were well served by this resulting product The unanimous simply did not have the manner as convention required to sell a special and it was a financial disaster

A special issue is neither a bonanza was a label of love At least it shouldn't be The week and month in which it is billed usually look good on the financial statement but that is because many of the costs including much of the labor have loaned their way into the expenses of several earlier months A good special ought to reflect enough work effort and imaginative material to give readers a bonus, advertisers the opportunity to take advantage of the extra interest and to identify with an important milestone and the editors and writers pride in the authorship of material of lasting value But unless there are enough ads to pay for it, the special isn't carrying its weight and inhibits future undertakings of a like nature

That was probably where I stood when the provincial jubilee flopped as a revenue-generating occasion of 1965 I looked toward the approaching Centennial year without too much optimism and wondered just how much effect that special would be worth Any thought of not producing a Centennial special would have been dismissed as unprofessional and unpatriotic but my heart wasn't in it.

That fun stepped in.

A Centennial Commission had been set up by the Canadian government and a lot of hype was building up about the event and its observance across the nation Through the efforts of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association the communities was persuaded to sponsor a contest for the best Centennial edition published by a Canadian weekly newspaper

To encourage participation by members papers a season was reserved on the agenda of the 1966 convention held in Saint John New Brunswick on the production of a Centennial edition and how to approach it

In those days conventions as often located in Canada's maritimes tended not to draw large numbers Irene and I had decided early to go, and made our reservations early in spring, as soon no registration forms were available. The convention chairman faced with filling panel and moderator slots for the various programs from a limited list of publishers committed to attending, pounced on early requestants and prevailed upon them to participate. That is the only reason I can think of for having been asked to conduct this Centennial session.

Reluctantly I accepted and having done no disinterred the ideas I had earlier developed about a Centennial issue and spent some hours developing them into a presentation suitable for my distinguished peers who really were for the most part my elders and more prestigious than I. Fortunately I stressed the need for starting early six months and preferably longer before the publication date.

The session drew mild interest, and a number of the publishers, who to that point probably had given little thought to their Centennial issues, complimented us on my early start.

That is when pride set in and sometimes it smash before achievement.

Vanity I confess to, and also boastfulness and all associated evils. But they have to have some basis in fact even if that basis tends to become exaggerated in my mind. I have never claimed to be a good athlete dancer raspberry packer or beet thinner, and I cannot draw or sing worth a hoot. But having tactily represented myself as something of an authority as the subject, I went home from Saint John with the heavy knowledge that I must now produce not only a good Centennial edition, but one that would make publishers across the country sit up and take notice. We would rather win that prize or come mighty close — and lose and hard work be damned.

We were a year into offset. We were beginning to feel at home with the process and our readers were still appreciative of local photos of good quality. This Mary Greer and I decided would be a special edition relying almost totally on pictures to celebrate Canada's 100th birthday and the participation of Weyburn and district in the nation's first century.

We decided early on five sixteen-page tabloid sections, pages to be sponsored by advertisers individually or jointly with myself to do the selling.

The first section was called "Weyburn and Canadian History" and dealt with such subjects as the building of the railroads, settlement of the area, two world wars, the drought and the depression and personalities of national or international prominence — such as F. C. Douglas and Irene Saleucka — with Weyburn beginnings.

"Canada's People" the only section with a lot of "words" was devoted to pictures and stories of families representing the many national and ethnic groups that settled the area individually or in groups.

"Weyburn Today" was a pictorial representation of Weyburn as it was in 1967.

"Remember When" was a photographic potpourri of nostalgic and hysteric reasons of the city and area over the years: the royal visit, minstrel shows, prize-winning athletic teams and so on as well as spreads on a few area towns wishing to be included.

"The Second Century" concentrated on young people and the mainstreams and activities dedicated to their advancement, education and fulfillment.

Sponsors were offered a small section of the page for photos and stories relating to their own business. The whole issue would be enclosed in a process color cover or jacket with a Weyburn scene on each page and again with a smaller color picture on each of the four pages relating to the sponsor of that page.

We started gathering photos and information in fall of 1966 (one of Mary Greer's underlinings) and the stories on the settlers were written over the winter months. I don't know how many thousands of inches we encored, but over 500 were used in the special. Also over the winter months I sold sponsorships and wrote the stories and captions associated with the sponsors. By early spring, I started to assemble the pages and sections completing them (more or less) according to a schedule, releasing one section weekly in the pressroom as publication week approached. I personally wrote all the captions and did all the typesetting on the Intertypers that had replaced the hot metal linecasting machines. I did this, in part, to eliminate errors. So naturally I inserted the name of Alderman Gordon Miles from the city-sponsored front cover and made another compounding error on the first page of the first section.

So much for perfection!

The cake never was printed in Manitoba.

The special was sent out with the May 4, 1967 issue of the Review and in early September after we had all but given up hope learned that we had indeed won the national competition. A few weeks later at the CWNA convention in Ottawa I was presented with a bookcase containing 100 books by Canadian authors. The presentation was made by Mr Centennial — John Fisher chairman of the Canada Centennial Commission.

We were a pretty proud staff and family

Quite a piece

EDITORIAL September 21 1967

Two weeks ago in Ottawa, the publisher of the Review was presented by Centennial Commissioner John Fisher with a library of one hundred Canadian books — complete with bookcase — as a reward for publishing what has been chosen as Canada's best Centennial edition in a competition open to all weekly newspapers throughout the country.

Pleased as we were with receiving such a valuable prize we were equally gratified by the closing paragraph in the comments of the competition judge: "If the Weyburn Review Centennial edition evokes the atmosphere and personality of the community, Weyburn must be quite a place."

We are proud that we captured "the atmosphere and personality" of Weyburn in such a way as to evoke the comment from a far-away judge who probably has never visited our community that Weyburn "must be quite a place."

It was a great period in weekly newspaper publishing. Offset printing gave us respectability and prestige that had been lacking, and this was reflected in more advertising revenue more pages, more subscribers and even, to our surprise and gratification greater profitability. At about the time that we were producing the Centennial issue under increasingly crowded conditions we decided to add a second storey to our building. George Derkson had room over from Manitoba to take over the Estevan Mercury as a partner in what became a separate company

Press time growth

EDITORIAL September 2 1976

The past two years since we installed our three-unit Community web newspaper press have seen such growth — our newsprint consumption has almost doubled — that we are adding a fourth unit which has just been shipped out of Chicago

What is it this do?

Each unit makes possible the simultaneous printing of four pages in an additional colour to four pages being printed on another unit

Thus we will have the capability of printing 16 pages simultaneously in black and white or 12 pages with four of them in two colors or eight pages in two colors on six pages with four pages in three colors or four pages in four colors.

A full color photo will still be a rarity in the Review but it demand sometimes is going to be in the past decade who knows what the next five or 10 pages will bring?

When I came to Weyburn the newspaper had to be hand-fed, a four-page sheets, through a vintage cylinder press, then turned around and fed through again for the back printing, and finally hand-fed through a folding machine. Our maximum capability then was 2 850 printed and folded pages per hour compared to 24 000 now printed and folded pages per hour after the fourth unit is operational

George was doing an excellent job of rebuilding the Mercury when he suffered his first heart attack in late 1966 or early 1969. He was just recovering when, following the visit to Weyburn of the travelling tuberculosis van, I was summoned to Fort San at Fort Qu'Appelle to check out an x-ray that wasn't satisfactory

How I remember that day!

I had gone to Estevan for a conference with George, and had expected to stay in that city all day. Instead I found myself back in Weyburn at a non and half-reading the Fort San summons. With an unexpected half-day on my hands and a beautiful late spring day to spend it on I decided to drive to Fort Qu'Appelle and satisfy the incompetents who obviously didn't know how to operate an x-ray camera

The elderly Scotsman who received me took me into the lab, showed me a number of x-rays, pointed at clouds and smudges that meant nothing to me and said as tactfully as possible that those anomalies were what had caused them to suspect that I might have TB. He must have been too tactful because even then I asked with a touch of impatience: I'm sure just when they expected to make up their minds.

He looked me in the eyes and pronounced that "as of this moment I am diagnosing tuberculosis until proved otherwise."

That was on a Thursday and on Monday morning I was delivered with ruthless full of books a typewriter and other management paraphernalia to the San, authorized to remain there for a period to be determined by my progress.

Not having kept up with the medical advances in the field of tuberculosis, and remembering only the meaningful looks exchanged by adults in my youth when telling of someone being sent to the San with "consumptions" I believed at first that I had received an almost instant death sentence. Dr. Macpherson quickly informed me that I was very fortunate that with modern medication they might well have me out in two months or less. Only twenty years earlier, he said, it was not uncommon to submit a patient with only the smallest spot — like mine — and still have him there six months later with a hole the size of a half-dollar in his lung — and worsening.

As it turned out my TB tested just sensitive — I was not a carrier — and in good health otherwise so I was discharged with several sacks (literally) of pills and upon my promise to modify my work hours and pressures.

Just before entering the San I had accepted the vice-presidency of the Weyburn Rotary Club, the campaign chairmanship of the Weyburn and District United Appeal and the southeastern zone chairmanship for Saskatchewan Homecoming '71. I was also a director of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association. Something had to give. Mary Grace had by this time moved on to British Columbia, so I canceled the one of the news staff to take myself off the irregular hours and evening obligations of the news beat. Hector Emmyer became sales manager, a position he was even more suited for than he had been for the furniture; Ray Wouters, whom I had upgraded from apprentice to journeyman when we acquired the Review became foreman.

Hector held the sales position until his retirement early in 1968 and Ray was still competently managing the shop when this was written. From foreman for the last ten years or so had been Henry Aldrich hired as a bright-eyed apprentice in fall of 1959. Without in any way disparaging numerous others who, over the years helped us build a newspaper respected, I believe both in the community and the industry that much of it was made possible through the dependable stewardship of these three men.

In the heady 1970s when it seemed prosperity would last forever we found ourselves again outgrowing our factory and with no room for promised expansion. Our lease still had several years to run, but when the building of a downtown shopping mall was announced I contacted our landlord Gordon Russell, then living in London, Ontario and explained the circumstances. He declined to terminate our lease without penalty, leaving us free to build a new building at the edge of the city. We moved into it in May of 1978.

Printshop "characters"

HUMBUTTS November 9 1978

Offset printing or more correctly photo-composition has done away with some of the "characters" that used to hang around printing offices.

No doubt typesetters of today when they become oldtimers, will have their own tales of woe to reminisce about, when technology creates some of the problems which today are simply taken for granted as past and parcel of the operation.

One of the premises that has disappeared from the scene is the "type loose."

The type loose was the mysterious, inevitable little creature back in the hand-setting days that placed type into the wrong cases (compositors had a drawer set aside for storing type), or into the wrong compartments.

Thus the typesetter trying to assemble a "stick" of type for a funny might find himself picking up letters of the wrong note of typeline, or p's instead of q's.

It was traditionally the apprentice's job to distribute used type back into the proper cases and compartments and it was no secret that they sometimes had difficulty in telling one typeface from another, incorrectly identifying 14-point type at a glance, and differentiating between p's and q's, or b's and d's much more often.

It was suspected but seldom proven, that the apprentices had goofed in "dishing" the type; but as an apprentice was ever known to admit to the sin the punished foots were blamed on type lice.

In the Linotype a heyday the wrong fonts became the nemesis of the press shop, particularly on publishing day when haste tended to take its toll.

The lines cast type from individual matrices dropping into the assembler from a magazine containing about 1,000 matrix a font. Matrix removed from the assembler because the wrong keys had been struck were placed into a little container called the pi stick ("pi" if you know your crosswords is jumbled type).

When the pi stick got too full the operator changed to another type font the pi was run back into the magazine. It was not unknown for an operator to run into the magazine a matrix of the wrong face.

One mat wrong in 1,000 may not seem like much, but remember the magazine had room for no more than 24 mats for each character. Thus if the wrong mat was an "e" and you didn't catch it you might typeset a column or two with every 21st "e" in the wrong typeface or size before the sin was discovered by the office girls checking the proofs.

To this day I can still that you can give a former linotype operator nightmares by up spacing into but one when he's dissecting that he's got a wrong font "e" in his machine.

I recall a once on an ex-operator in our office when his wife woke awake and cries from I thought I detected snake turning out of his ears and nostrils.

Also gone from the scene is the hellbox.

Since printing was done from hot forms corrected lines or forms no longer needed were not thrown away but tossed into the hellbox.

Why was it called the hellbox?

Bearing in mind that the next step for its contents was a melting pot heated to 550 degrees Fahrenheit or higher the connection is obvious.

"Plastic shed us" has also disappeared although with a name like that, we can't often be sacked.

The lowest comic inside the sequences of the first two rows of morgue keys and to fill up a line of "m" the operator usually slammed his fingers down three rows.

Sooner or later he would forget to throw away the resulting line of type and when you opened up the paper the first thing staring at you would be good old "Eno a shrdlu" along with the wrong fonts, type face and other gremlins.

Still alive and doing well however is old faithful "36" and I still means "the end".

Changes continued in the trade but probably our greatest challenge in the 1960s from a technical point of view has been the quantum leap into computer technology We were introduced to this 20th century miracle on two fronts — typesetting and accounting — in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Mentioned earlier was Compugraphic which swept the typesetting market with a couple — that is to say simple or fundamental in terms of the products produced — typesetters to produce photo-ready columns of type. A computer calculated the widths of each letter, decided where to end lines, work or without hyphenation and photographically exposed the line one letter at a time, from a rapidly revolving film strip. This may sound slow, but at almost ten characters a second, it was still faster than anything we had ever seen in the weekly newspaper industry.

Godsend that it was, it was still compared to what lay only a decade or two away what the Spirit of St Louis was to the supersonic transports in aviation. Line measures and leading could not be changed without stopping the machine and manually ranking new settings changes in typefaces and sizes required changes in film strips. Type size range was limited from five to fourteen points (one point is 1/72nd of an inch) newspaper text usually runs from eight to ten points). Improvements to the machine came faster than we could cope with them and planned obsolescence became an accepted part of technological progress. By the mid-1970s, area composition — typesetting in varying measures, type faces and sizes, with keyboard controlled spacing entered an outside ray screens — came into standard use and by the early 1980s this technology had advanced to include management of editorial material.

Out of date suddenly was hunt-and-peck typewritten copy handed to truculent typesetters with much after-the-fact criticism about typographical errors and poor proofreading. Suddenly reporters became authors in every sense of the product that found its way into the pages of the newspaper. They didn't always appreciate the sense but before long they became used to keyboarding their stories directly from their notes or memories onto a screen reading it for errors then storing it in the memory of a computer disk. The editor then called it onto his or her own screen, edited and verified it, assigned typesetter parameter codes for the computer justify the matter and send the story (electronically) to the typesetter which (without so much as a flimsy) photographed the story through laser beams onto sensitized paper in any one of dozens of type faces and hundreds, indeed thousands of size and line length configurations at incredible speed

Complex as the application may be in its totality it was relatively easy to master, since the typesetting aspect proceeded in manageable mouthfuls from the earliest Campographics, through the various improved models to the laser beamed systems now in use. Adjusting to the consoles and memory banks entailed instant returning for the news department, but because the programs are tailored for and confined to editorial and typesetting needs the system does not have the ongoing mystery and challenge of the general office computer

By the late 1960s everyone knew about computers, although the art had not yet reached the state where the technological miracle affected almost every aspect of our lives. Somewhere in the every towers of industry and governmental huge machines costing millions of dollars performed tasks once held to be impossible, and made errors formerly believed to be beyond the gift of the most imaginative incompetent. Stories trickled down to us performing our tasks in traditional ways on surrey forms, together with promises of how the technology would change our lives and simplify our work

Why I began to wonder out loud, especially in the presence of our accountants if computers were changing everything, were we still doing most office chores as they had been done since typewriters and adding machines appeared upon the scene. The Review had an old posting machine on which new charges and payments could be posted to accounts receivable cards, but monthly statements were created by typing the information to the statements. Invoices were typewritten or written by hand newspapers were imprinted with mailing addresses from metal stencils, carrier route lists were hand-corrected on dog-eared sheets that had been originally typewritten; procedures that were vintage 1940 or earlier

It should be possible, I proposed, to take batches of debit and credit items coded to ledger accounts, deliver them to a central computer-equipped depot, enter the data and have the office work performed in seconds or even minutes. I made inquiries and found that such services were available in some large accounting offices but at costs far exceeding our budget

Then in early 1970 our old posting machine showed unmistakable signs of giving up the ghost and looking into replacement costs. I was shocked at the cost of these devices. Again I looked into centralized data processing, again was discouraged by prices, and was about to give in and pay big dollars for a function not directly related to the printing process — a cardinal sin in my eyes in those days.

By sheer coincidence, someone mentioned that a local garage was using datacentre services offered by IBM in Regina. A visit to the garage confirmed this and the dealer's satisfaction with both the service and the cost. I contacted IBM a representative called on us soon, and I was quickly convinced that this was our solution.

So, about as fast as we could restructure our ledger configuration to our standard general ledger and accounts receivable packages offered by IBM, and print new office forms to accommodate compatible data entry we were on datacentre services. This happened in summer of 1970. Every month-end we would box our encoded documents — cheques, invoices, cash sheets and journal entries — to the IBM datacentre in Regina, and a few days later we would get back the documents, plus updated monthly customer statements, an aged accounts receivable report, and a general ledger journal from which we might compile balance sheets and statements of profit and loss. The transition to this system was virtually painless, thanks to careful and thoughtful supervision by our IBM rep. And the cost was unbelievably low, since there was no minimum charge and we had managed through a few departures from IBM recommendations to cut the number of transactions to almost half of what had been initially estimated. One transaction as almost everyone knows nowadays is a single ticket or credit entry

A new word: turnaround

EDITORIAL December 2, 1976

I learned a new word a few weeks ago and past it along in case you run up against it in a crossword puzzle or heaven help you, pre-salary

"Turnaround."

Our spouses from a computer centre were late getting back to us, so I finally telephoned to find out what was the problem

"Well," explained a frazzled voice at the other end of the line "we had a turnaround problem."

I didn't want to sound too dumb, but overcoming my embarrassment, I asked: "What's a turnaround?"

The party at the other end hesitated and heaved a sigh, as the manner of a person trying to explain one of those questions coming from a youngster too young to be given the answer. Finally he said something about work loads, time factors and session-hours."

I still don't understand and said so

He was quiet for a moment, took a deep breath, then put it to me in simple language that even I could understand.

"We were busy and didn't get it done."

That's "turnaround."

So if your one isn't done on time, your printing delivered ready when it's supposed to be, or your mail order doesn't get to you until after Christmas, and someone tell you the problem is "turnaround" you'll know what to mean.

At time went on rates went up and a minimum charge soon to be place I am guessing that this happened because computer prices were coming down and major datacentre users were making their own installations. Relatively few small businesses were at this point, using the datacentres or making their own installations.

There in no telling how long we might have settled for this arrangement It was not without its little problems, and allowed none of the little home-made programs and short-cuts made possible by in-plant computers. But it was comfortable, reasonably reliable and required no cash investment

After about ten years of this arrangement changes in the computer world about which I speculated earlier began to seep down to the client level. First we were told of increasing difficulty in getting keyboard operators to Regina, and it was suggested that we buy a key-punch and send punched cards to IBM

By way of emphasizing the desirability of in-plant keypunching there began to be delays in returning our processed material Naturally we soon acquired a keypunch. This reduced new processing costs only slightly and added the nuisance of a new operation to our office However it was still not hard to live with.

The next step was the closing of the Regina datacentre making it necessary for us to ship documents to the Calgary datacentre for processing This removed the personal touch: times over the years we had often found it necessary on convenient to hand-deliver our documents to Regina Consequently the datacentre people and we were not strangers to each other This may seem a minor remuneration but nonsense who knows you is more inclined to pick you up when you make an obvious error, rather than letting you stew in the juices of your own mistake

The second disadvantage was that connections were frequently missed in Regina — coming, going or both — adding another day or two to what I have since learned is called "turn-around time." Courier services were just coming into their own and did not make regular stops in small centres so having was still necessary, hence the missed connections It was not unusual either for the couriers to drop our documents in Saskatoon instead of Regina and occasionally even in Winnipeg or Toronto.

The loss of a day or two may seem trivial but it is very unsettling to set aside a day to wrap up the month-end, and then find yourself empty-handed Many customers also found it unsatisfactory to receive statements and invoices later after having become accustomed to getting their promptly

All the time of course computer technology was making giant strides, and a few customers and data-communications at IBM in Regina convinced us the day was not far off when we would have to make our own installation We were given another powerful nudge in that direction when in 1979 or 1980, we were notified that after a certain date about two years ahead all data-processing for western Canada would be done in Vancouver We accepted this as the proverbial handwriting on the wall.

BOURNE'S ULTIMATE HAPPY TRISTER AVS

At the costs I was then I began to take a serious interest in the IBM computer seminars and to try and understand what we were getting into. Our own 3 lengthy experiences with computers helped us probably more than we realized and we were at real from investing in computers that did not have the storage in pastry we knew we needed.

If-then-or-else

EDMONTON December 10 1980

If the heading contain the either a vague threat to an equally vague pressure. It is probably a bit of both.

It is an expression used in computer programming, a world that is rapidly closing in on everyone in business. Industry, government, organizations farming, housekeeping and you name it.

The speed with which computer technology is advancing has been expressed as a number of interesting ways but two of my favorites are comparisons with air travel

One expert has figured out that of air flight costs and efficiency had improved as rapidly as computer costs and efficiency in the past two decades it would be possible to fly overseas now for a fare of 25 cents

A fact sheet issued by the University of Saskatchewan about two years ago expressed it these; "It is said that if the technology of powered flight had advanced at the same rate as the technology of computing, the first another landing on the moon would have taken place eight months after the Wright brothers flew the first plane."

My late awareness of computers affecting my day-to-day life came about 15 years ago when I started receiving statements and invoices from some of the larger suppliers then stopping, with little but faith and determination to guide them, with computer accounting.

Receiving invoices on which keypunch errors and content a charge 100 times in excess of the value of the goods or services sent to us instead of perhaps the 99 cents it should have been one dig it in the customer number had been misnumbered, hardly inspires great confidence in the computer as an efficient business tool.

These problems began to straighten out in favorites and not many years went by before the idea of using a central computer began to have greater appeal

About 11 years ago I began half seriously to accept demand for data services but found the costs so high and the product so complicated and slow that I was prepared to leave the problem to the next generation

Then along came one of the acknowledged world human in the computer field with a package deal as available and at an affordable price, that I was not sold.

Our system, too, has managed to accumber a few changes and accurred us with its ability to make stupid errors but I would dread the thought of going back to manual entries into ledgers

The computer accidentally thrust I make stupid errors. It makes been y my account all The errors are human but the computer being stupid accepts mistakes that would not easily escape a human being

A payroll clerk, for example is not likely to pay an employee 10 times the weekly rate, or make a batch pinto deduction of $683.90 instead of $6.83. Given a misplaced decimal point or input into the statement returns and the computer will some turn (or insufficient) pay or make shameful deductions another burning as eye.

Since going to the processing system, we have also availed ourselves of the bank's payroll system and computerized typesetting system — been bringing schemes and new sets of problems.

With computers coming thrust in price, decreasing in size increasing in speed and efficiently improving in simplicity of programming, we are normally considering a consumer of our own within the next year or two.

Thus I find myself attend my business listening to sales pitches reading texts and brochures to human acquaint myself with the wonderful and frightening world of computers Just when I think I am beginning to understand, a new term is kicked to me, in a new problem is posed.

So I return at night with bits and bytes parameters CRT's intelligent terminals, if-then-or-else's and do-while's reading through my head instead of the sugarplums seem appropriate to the season.

Don't laugh If you is not about yet, you will be before you know it

(P.S. If-then-or-else is a routine whereby a function is performed as long as a human condition thrust and another function when the condition ceases to exist.)

(P.P.S. I think.)

Computer salesmen began calling on us regularly exuding breathless excitement with each advancement. The gap between obviously affordable but inadequate hardware and the needs of our configuration remained wide until we were introduced to the IBM System 38, a model by the way that was considered a dinosaur only a few years later

It did have the advantage of using diskettes (floppies) with 2. 1 million bits, with two slots in the computer and another two in a little box nicknamed the "toaster" because of its resemblance to the kitchen appliance. Also available were "off-the-shelf" general ledger and accounts receivable programs developed especially for this computer and a program called BRAMS — Business Report/Applications Development System — with which a computer illiterate like myself might write additional programs. This was important because I still had not been able to find simulated programs for advertising invoicing or circulation control. IBM also had a hotline in Toronto to give assistance (once the misery index) required in mastering the programs.

We hope!

As I write these lines — over eight years later — the System 23 printer is still rattling away in the front office and giving yeoman service although slated for scrapping in several months. So we weren't cheated. Indeed, with it we have developed many programs we may not be able to afford with custom programming.

Once we got over our horror at discovering that both the learning and familiarization with hardware and custom software were do-it-yourself sessions, we found the system to be user-friendly, with skeleton taking us step by step through the daily, weekly, monthly and annual cycles of Accounts Receivable and General Ledger applications.

Although it all worked out, for pure generation of terror computers ought to have been sold to the pre-reform Soviet Union for installation at Lubyanka Prison as extreme punishment and torture devices.

We had hoped — assumed really — that our second computer installation somewhere in the distant future would be a piece of cake with all the software needed for our business available "on the shelf." In fact, we signed a contract in April of 1989 received the hardware in June or so, and after giving up on a company that was unable to have a single program running by the end of the year — when it finally went into receivership — we are optimistic that the new system will be fully operational by June of 1990.

Doing it yourself

TUESDAY, January 17, 1982

Last week I promised (or threatened) that my experiences in the computer world would probably be chronicled in future columns.

That epistle ended with the first disappointment: the computer did not arrive New Year's Eve as promised. That ended not too badly: the delivery people promptly rotated my five months and brought the machine first thing Monday morning.

Second, naturally I telephoned the computer sales office to let the folks there know that the hardware was here and ready for installation. They were very interested to find this information, but pointed out that that was a do-it-yourself proposition and that I would first detailed instructions in one of the packing crates.

When I stopped trembling I checked the sales contract, and found it was unambiguous in the customer's responsibility.

You are rightfully wondering about my naivete in not getting that straight in the first place. However in our industry I goes without saying that new equipment is obsolete on first by a qualified technician.

My next surprise, considering that I have been known to have difficulty turning on a simple screwdriver that the instructions really were simple. I'll admit I had help and it entailed two phone calls to the Toronto hot line but we actually got it hooked up and making noises.

I am now anxiously waiting for my wife to return home to operate the beast, so that she can teach me. That sure beats reading all the manuals myself!

In one day bouts with the A/R and G/L programs while I grappled with the mysteries of programming, I won't attempt to describe all our frustrations and manifold brer'rnagnee learning to cope with machines that ring bells and flash messages — all intended to assist, but which tend to frighten — and doing it all from volumes and volumes of manuals that seem to have been written for professionals. Then, when at your wits end, you phone the hotline, you learn that your helper is attending a seminar in Montreal or Atlanta and will not be available until after the weekend. So you blunder on, sinking deeper and deeper into the quagmire or you bring everything to a halt until after the weekend awaiting the benefit of professional advice.

We learned too, that for all the haunted speed of computers there are some things that simply take time. After a while we learned that some functions took a few minutes, some an hour, and minute even three or four hours. But it is an irritation to insanity to stare at a computer screen bearing the bland message "Posting, please wait," and expect to wait five minutes and it turns into three-hour wait.

One memorable weekend when we were loading our aged accounts receivable we posted a large batch Friday afternoon then waited for the computer to absorb the new data and return to the data entry mode, enabling us to go home for the evening. We didn't know that once in a while we had to instruct the computer to reorganize indexed files to speed up the process. One of us returned to the office after supper to check out the program and found the screen unchanged. A problem with the software in our system was that on runs that did not generate printouts, there was nothing to indicate how far advanced the run was—half finished, 70 percent, or whatever.

Not wanting to sit there and watch the kettle come to a boil, so to speak, and unwilling to let it rest for the night, we sat down and consumed a bottle of wine, believing that the computer couldn't possibly outlast us.

It did.

We went home and to bed, and on Saturday morning I rushed to the office and was relieved to find a terse message confirming that the chore had been successfully completed. So we spent the day entering a few hundred more customer data files into the system. Knowing now that the computer took a fat of time to advance the posting — and perhaps wondering, uneasily, how the computer would work if things took that long — we amply went home and let the computer work out its problems overnight again.

Sunday morning I dashed confidently to the office and the message on the screen was only slightly different than an empty gas gauge at midnight—one hundred miles from civilization.

It told me that the computer had found the demand upon it beyond its ability to cope and had simply given up and aborted the mission at some predetermined point. This message was accompanied by error references which, had we been professionals, might have solved the problem. Instead we spent an utter-aggravating Sunday and a sleepless night wondering what might have gone amiss. Naturally the IBM hotline wasn't even warm on Sundays.

The problem was really quite simple.

Let us suppose you gave a librarian an empty building a pile of five thousand books, and instructions to place them on the shelves consecutively (as opposed to alphabetically) and to ensure there must not under any circumstances be two copies of the same title — and all this without making any index of books so stored.

The first few arrivals would be pretty fast, and then the process would become slower as it became necessary to check out each title against hundreds of stored titles. Then imagine three thousand books in place and the librarian still attempting to add more, checking each title against three thousand.

At some point there could be only one logical reaction from the librarian: "I quit!"

That's what our computer had done. It quit.

All that would have been necessary was to run the data files through an indexing function every hundred entries or so so that memory would tell it that new entries were not duplications. However having pushed the computer over the edge getting out of it wasn't that simple. The hotline people tried after the weekend, to get us on track without losing data. The result however was another error which made it necessary to run the machine on mature day to print on endless (and useless) report.

While Irene was familiarizing herself with the canned programs I was having my own little struggle accomplishing things with BRADS that wonderful program designed to allow an amateur to build reports with little familiarity with programming.

In case this sounds far-fetched let me say that I have used BRADS to build scores of excellent (my assessment admittedly) and helpful programs without even learning one-third of its capabilities. Again comparing with something in the every-day world let us suppose you were given a box capable of freezing, heating, baking, broiling, hairdressing, showing films, playing music, flossing, flying and just about everything else, if only you learned the right abracadabra so feed into its storytown, with them commands to be gleaned from a book written, in part in a foreign language.

Somewhere you might with intense concentration and cerebral overwork, discover how to make the device fly and float. At this point you might in exhaustion settle for flying and floating and rely on traditional sources for the other functions.

That's the way it worked out with BRADS.

It was very simple to design respect forms instructed by data files, also simple to create. Even generating totals was a fairly simple step taught in the elementary training (self-training) exercises supplied.

The trouble was that as I built my expert configurations, I would run into a statement in the BRADS manual explaining that in de-math-and-matic words and he necessary to write statements in appropriate phases in the report program and to accomplish this it would be necessary to learn a bit about System 38 BASIC—the computer language of our system.

Soon I would find myself between the devil and the deep blue sea. To complete my programs, and make them practical, I had to learn some BASIC as well as the mechanism of the BRADS report program. Tackling BASIC however I quickly learned that if I tried to learn it all before putting it to use it would take years to build my functioning and practical program.

So I would turn to the BASIC manual whenever stumped but go back to programming as soon as a problem had been solved. The result was functional and useful programs that might have been much more efficient if I had first learned all of BRADS and BASIC — but which then might never have happened.

Without regretting any of it, a highlight in nightmarish sort of way of my thirty-plus years of publishing, will still be the year or two dominated by programming, the frustrations of finding solutions and trying to overcome errors in malformations, evenings spent brooding about alternatives and dead ends, near-sleepless nights with my mind trapped in computer loops. Sometimes the roadblock was as simple as a typographical error. The experience really was far from totally negative. Few things are so satisfying as finding a program statement or manoeuvre that accomplishes what for hours or days seemed impossible.

Admittedly I sometimes wondered whether I had become a compulsive nut, instead of a newspaper publisher in my defence, I never played computer games or wrote programs just as exercises.

When we made the installation, I was confident that by the time it had to be replaced all my BRADS programs or programs performing like functions would be right there on the shelf like popcorn and razor blades. Just here we are retooling more than eight years later and all the programs except A/R and G/L still have to be custom designed.

But this time professionals will do it.

Little triumphs

With so much space and so many words devoted to the mechanical and technical challenges of the weekly newspaper industry the reader may wonder whether there is any excitement in creating and refining the components that comprise the newspaper itself.

There is but it is at least in this era of technological revolution, more subtle and difficult to quantify. Our pages reflect our quiet communities the lifestyle, spirit and excitement of which usually lie below the surface and are not regularly exposed to violence and upheaval.

In our thirty years here there have been only two murder trials in our courthouse, which serves a considerable radius, and two of them were overly sensational. There isn't a major fire in the average year, automobile accidents are chiefly fender-benders. A local strike is big news and in weeks when city council meets, the report of that tends to be the lead story.

There are little ocean victories, like the pleasure mentioned earlier of Premier Douglas and Mayer Staveley turning on the natural gas, and later making Time suggestions. In 1959 an October fire during the night burned down Weyburn Hardware a fairly large establishment by local standards and I was on the spot because an employee who rescued in a nearby hotel was wakened by the commotion and had the presence of mind to call me.

There was the New Year's baby that almost let me down This was back in the days when Ivens operated the darkroom in our home basement and printing plates were produced on the Klischograph New Year's Day was on Wednesday and we "closed" page one on Tuesday leaving a front page hole for the baby that surely would be born the following day at the latest. I called the hospital a dozen times on New Year s Day and by evening they told me I might as well forget it. There wasn t even a prospect in hospital, and it being a cold, blustry night anyone anywhere near term surely would have come in

I didn t even have anything else ready for the page one hole it is not a hot news season in the weekly newspaper cycle So I set my alarm for about six in the morning and crossed my fingers. When I got up and telephoned "Maternity" jubilantly told me that no expectant mother had been brought in at two in the morning, had been delivered of a baby and would be ready for a photo in fifteen minutes

So I rushed to the hospital photographed the hours-old infant and mother at seven, got the basic facts for my story and rushed the film home to Ivens By the time the staff arrived at the office Ivens had printed the photo. I had written the story directly on the line keyboard and the photo was being scanned on the Klisch.

Today s technology would not lessen the suspense of waiting for a birth that might not occur before time ran out But with tray development of photos Klisch engraving and hot metal typesetting it was a feat to have a picture and a story on page one and on the street that had only been available two hours earlier.

Once in the early 1960s someone telephoned to suggest that we go out and get a picture of a ditched car on Highway 13 (then still with a gravel surface), a few miles east of the city I don't know why a ditched car should be remarkable enough to merit a picture, but I drove out decided there was nothing newsworthy about it, and returned to the office.

This was on a Thursday so Friday and I didn't pursue the matter further until phoning the RCMP for an accident report about Tuesday of the following week. Since there was nothing about a mishap on Highway 13 I asked the detachment chief what the story was on the ditched car There was complete silence for a few seconds then the chief demanded to know in a voice that conveyed controlled rage just what I knew about that car I told him and received a severe dressing-down for not having reported it to the police Earlier during the week in which I had gone to look at the ditched car an elderly farm couple living near Weyburn had been kidnapped and locked up for many hours in a small granary. The disabled car had proved to be one of several stolen cars used by the kidnappers and had not been discovered by the police until a day or so before I had called Had I telephoned immediately, it might have put them on the trail when it was still warm.

I received that day a stern lecture on my own duties

Once in my small to localize a national news story I probably put my life in the line

It was in 1960 and Hazen Argue, former national leader of the New Democratic Party had been defeated by Tommy Douglas in a contest for this position, and subsequently had crossed the floor of the House of Commons to join the Liberal party There was much conjecture about what this would do to his popularity in his Assiniboia riding and even in the Kayville area he came from

He announced that he was going home to Kayville to explain his decision to his constituents, and an Argue friend telephoned me and urged me to attend a welcome planned for the Argues at their Kayville home.

It was a November Tuesday night — city council night — and bitterly cold I am talking about forty below with a slight breeze blowing. I attended council, wrote my news story and headed out at about nine for Kayville over an hour away in a sparsely settled region It was so cold the car just months old did not even warm up, inside during the drive and ground-drifting was building up small drifts across the highway. I had to charge through them at full speed least in throat and hoping for the best. I arrived at the Argue home in time for the end of the party. I remember sharing a sofa with a large farm dog and an exuberant guest offering me a drink at home brew in an unwashed glass. Everyone tried to talk me out of driving home that night but my work schedule did not permit such dalliance.

It was a frightening drive. The drifts were deeper. It was a moonless night, yard lights had been turned off and there was not a car on the highway. I couldn't help wondering what would happen if I had car trouble and had to walk any distance. I knew I couldn't last half an hour out of the car.

Next morning, the car wouldn't even turn over.

I have since made it a point to advise reporters not to venture out in that type of weather. Some stories just are not worth it.

The Saskatchewan Hospital fire in 1961 that took the lives of six elderly patients, was one of the major tragedies of our Weyburn years but I may be forgiven a degree of satisfaction over late a interjection in our own age of it.

The fire broke out early on a Tuesday morning and Mary Grose and I got there in time to take dozens of good photos. It was unquestionably the biggest national-class story to have happened in Weyburn in years and the Leader-Post sent a photographer in on airplane.

Irene spent all day making phonies for national television and eastern news services, which had to look to us when it transpired that the Leader's photos hadn't turned out. It was during the period when our relations with the Leader were still "cordial" as it was rather satisfying to allow the daily to run a number of our pictures on the street conditions that they we visibly identified as Weyburn Review photos.

There was the great Medicare controversy when most Saskatchewan medical doctors withdrew their services to use their sophomore for going to strike, and these were stories that were hard and important, but there was more tension than drama in the coverage. We kept our readers abreast of what was going on as well as we could, and like everyone else on both sides of the issue, hoped it would be resolved without tragedy.

Visits by prime ministers — Lester Pearson, John Diefenbaker and Pierre Trudeau — and other prominent figures gave our pages national mix occasionally, a hailstorm that devastated several farms yielded us a collection of prize-winning pictures (in a minor competition) occasional floods added excitement as did tornadoes and unusually severe blizzards. Several major fires got us out of bed during the night and there were local provincial and federal elections that kept us up labouring poll-by-poll results for the morning's paper.

The quality of the satisfaction of publishing a weekly newspaper lies not in big headlines and sensational pictures, but in the quiet contentment of being an integral part of a progressive community in a province we have learned to appreciate a country we love and a world we worry about. We hope the editorials, features and columns reprinted herein reflect our involvement and define the constant challenge better than would a rambling history of the city, the province and the world.

One of the most interesting editorial challenges of my career, rivalling even the prize-winning Centennial edition came when the directors of the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association commissioned me in early 1979 to compile a jubilee section to be placed in all Saskatchewan weeklies in early summer of 1980, in observance of the province's 75th anniversary.

Given a free hand as to style and content, I used transcripts from most Saskatchewan weeklies to reflect the changing times from 1905 to 1980 and stories submitted by fellow publishers and myself to introduce the readers to our industry and its progress through and participation in Saskatchewan history.

I spent scores of hours at the Saskatchewan Archives in Regina reading old weeklies, and with stories and anecdotes submitted by my colleagues in the industry, particularly Bert McKay of Moosomin – put together what I like to think of as a fairly acceptable special

Another source of satisfaction has been the prerogative of using such pretension and privileges to have some good clean fun such as writing an apology for a relatively harmless typographical error as such a way as to place it in a humourous perspective, having fun with a government news release replying to a patronizing article about Saskatchewan in a large California daily poking fun at Canada Post's rate-rescinding plans or writing a column on just about anything that seems good for a laugh. Sometimes, admittedly our humour was not fully shared by the target, but mostly our intentions were honorable.

An apology of sorts

HERESTT June 3 1976

The Review owes apologies to several parties for an extraneous or typographical error which appeared in the account of the Crechton graduation ceremonies in the May 13 edition of the Review

Mrs Kara Loucks our Crechton correspondent, had correctly written the account of the event and in our news office, our paragraph was edited wrong to read in part "Andrew Goerzen school superintendent Weyburn addressed the graduates and during the supper Irene Koren Wilmos sang two solos accompanied at the piano by Phyli a Primrose "

In the typesetting several words were snagged, with the following result "Andrew Goerzen, school superintendent Weyburn, addressed the graduates and sang two solos "

Naturally we owe an apology to Mrs Loucks for incorrectly naming her story We also owe an apology to Mr Goerzen who tells me he has since had three requests to sing at weddings

And of course we owe an apology to those responsible for planning the graduation because of the impression left that they might be in by of making Mr Goerzen sing two solos

I am very long to sweet to many sterling qualities on the part of Mr Goerzen but having stood shoulder to shoulder at Rotary with him on many occasions and he first out "O Canada!" I can say with some authority that no one is likely to ask him to sing two sound. One — maybe. But not two Not even in consecutive years.

Tips on teaching

EHERESTT August 2 1979

Saskatchewan Health has come up with 10 tips on how to teach young children to speak

This advice was prompted by the issue of a four-year-old brought in for speech evaluation because she did not speak clearly, but understood everything said to her. It turned out that on that of the parents talked to the little girl until she was three years old because they did not think she could understand what they were saying.

Here are the tips, followed by Esther by the child's possible counterpart in her (or his) twenties two or three Winnies later:

1 Talk in your child long before she is able to speak The child with there" the information that will be helpful in her later I sometimes felt that I was born with 200 episodes of "Another World" programmed into my subconscious.

2. Demonstrate what you want your child to do then ask her to do the same thing; e.g. "clap hands," clap your hands and say "I am clapping my hands can you clap your hands?" My parents expected applause at the end of every word By the time I was six, nothing short of standing ovations satisfied them

3 Encourage your ch ld's efforts to talk and reward her with a smile or a hug. I became a very quiet child because it was impossible to get a word in my parents without getting slobbered over

4. Listen to your child talk The best lessons you can give her is your attention Stop whatever you are doing, especially if the her difficulty expressing herself and stoo at her when she speaks If I spoke too subtly it is because both of my parents were lip readers

5. Do not rush or apply the missing words Give her time to find the words she wants to use Many a time I tried to heel hungry or in your hesitate another permanded I understand my words and that could not be confirmed in Webster or in usage and pronunciation

6 Use all the senses Children hand by hearing, feeling and doing. New words should be introduced by using them a different ways. For example "this table is smooth, rub your hand on the table and feel it. Rub your hand on the brush and feel it In t s words, as, it is rough " Other kids were told the stove's burner was hot My crummy parents put my hand on it and said, "Hot, hot "

7 Explain new words in short sentences and speak clearly I was taught early that pronunciation was one issue. I pointed at a stove Father hot, once and got a bilingual sermon on the subject made up of dozens of short sentences using the words "Even Rabbit.

8 Discuss events such as holidays or a trip to the classes. An early disappointment in life was my first ergs to the cleaners. A one-hour build-up was my parents' way of setting me up for a drive down the block to drop off some dirty clothing. My second greatest disappointment when they went into a similar spiel and I grabbed a table lag and wouldn't let go. So they left me with a babysitter and went to Disneyland without me.

10. Help by repeating the child's awkward grammar correctly. For example "Us are going away" has to be repeated by saying "You we are going away." My parents made a great sport of mimicking me under the pretext of encouraging my speech. Once I bellowed "me wanna firewis" and mother said, "Her dear say 'I would like to have a cannon.' I obliged and got a carrot. Look how I have turned.

Saskatchewan Health closes with the admission that these are only a few hints and that the variations are endless. When I came of age my parents told me they had been goaded by a 19-point guide from the provincial government. I thought they had taken an honest course in child abuse.

Raising muskrat stew

ERNESTLY July 9 1970

Having received more than a few gutload letters to be published for all to see, I succumbed last week to the urge to write more myself.

What provoked me was a clipping from the Los Angeles Times, brought in by a thoughtful health reading as a Saskatchewan one, like a sporting scrapped out of some cave to the Ozarks.

Based on a cooking and household hints booklet issued by the Saskatchewan department of public health for the northern Indian population, the Times story grossly fucks a slight twist was headed "Nordy Told How to Make Muskrat Stew" and read as follows:

"REGINA, Sask. (AP) — To help needy country people save on food bills health officials in Saskatchewan have put out a cookbook listing such specialities as stewed muskrat and roast beaver.

"The book entitled 'Recipes for You' is published by the northern division of the department of public health. Among other things, a recommends salads made from pigweed and jam concocted of rose hips (the pods on wild roses after they bloom).

"For those who really need to save pennies the book recommends taking the sack bones of meat, grease or fat, and simmering them for two hours, then adding carrots, onions, potatoes and simmering the last 30 minutes to make the dish tasty.

"Partridge is gotten the book advises go out into the fields in quest of dandelion greens, pigweed, farms, wild onions or whatever else as edible nonpoisonous and in season."

The foregoing prompted me to pen the following letter to the editor of the Times:

"Dear Sir:

"A reader today brought to my attention the enclosed news item Needy Told How to Make Muskrat Stew which appeared recently in your paper.

"I instead only succeeded a copy of the booklet 'Recipes for You which is giving you all the belly laughs and find it as written for our northern Indian population and it devoted to hints on economical eating, bearing in mind the enormous bounty available to these people, their financial resources and their traditional way of life.

"If you will take the time to glance at a map of Saskatchewan, let you will find that there not only a handful of unexplained communities north of the geographical centre of our province. In that great northern expanse — roughly 90,000 square miles — of rocky, virgin forests, and cold, clear lakes. I've a few thousand Indians. They've there by choice but since they are hours away from even a small general store, and perhaps a lifetime away from such delicacies as milk as hamburgs and hominy grits, they receive advice on the preparation of foods available to them — such as beaver and muskrat stew.

"But just so that these may be at least equality of merriment how about items ating into Cree and sending us a supply of pumpkins on smog control diet control flicking the slope habit dealing with molesters, how to keep your cool in a traffic jam and other typical Californian topics. Our tax payers would enjoy them immense y as they not their northern jobs — with dande ion greens — on an open campfire beside a lake not yet just sited.'

I must admit, of course, that I hope the editor of the Times has a similar sense of the necessary pollution in our northern waters. He might just take me down a peg to two if he knew how far "civil invasion" and advancement in that respect we our unspoiled northland.

Alice in Government

ERNESTLY May 29 1984

Alice was weary

After her adventures first to Wonderland, and then in the strange land Through the Looking Glass, she had awakened in a timely to her own snug bed with her cat Dinah curled up beside her but on the hard bench in a huge rotunda that reminded her for all the world of a railway station, with all its workers, and assorted attendants.

"I wonder where I am" she said to herself "I hope I'm not too far from home."

She looked around her and her gaze fell upon a huge neon sign with two-foot letters blinking the words "Canada Post."

Underneath the in slightly smaller letters, was the legend "Where Profit is Not Just a Word."

"Why," Alice said, "I'm in the post office but it's only a few blocks from home. I can walk it in a few minutes."

She looked for an exit sign and soon knew one but trying the doors underneath found it locked.

"I guess it's an emergency exit" she explained to herself, looked around and took hand another exit. She arrived there only to find that it too was locked. She had just found the third exit, and tried it (it, too, was locked) when she felt her arm being firmly grasped. She looked up to see a stern-faced security guard.

"And what, if I may ask, are you up to, young lady?" demanded the guard.

"Please sir," said Alice, "I'm only trying to get out of the building."

"That's what I suspected, exactly the guard. And just what business do you have leaving the building at 10 in the morning — eight hours before quitting time? Do you have a maternity leave pass, to a sick leave voucher or a note in lieu of sick leave slip, to a vacation visa, in a compassionate leave pass, in a

Alice couldn't help giggling in the thought of her a little girl being a postal employee.

"This is no laughing matter" said the guard.

"I'm sorry" said Alice "I didn't mean to offend But I don't work here I'm a customer of the public and I would like

"You are a member of the public and you'd like!" exploded the guard. "Then I just know that members of the job is are not allowed to leave the premises for any reason before quitting time? Do you think Canada Post can make any profit on people who go flitting out of love moments after they arrive? For that matter what have you bought so far?"

"Nothing," admitted Alice "But then, I haven't any money."

"Nothing, echoed " replied the guard. Then realizing she was only a child, he said in a softer voice, "Credit cards will be find The books scattered on the floor of the zoinsia have mailogram for just issue anything you can pick. You simply make your selections fill out the order cards, then take them to the appropriate Canada Post worker and place your order The merchandise will be remark to you promptly within a reasonable time after the items is received by the direct mail house. "

"What is a reasonable time?" asked Alice timidly remembering that shops of all kinds sold merchandise of every description within blocks of home. "And that letters sometimes get lost?"

"You impudent little creature shouted the guard

"One more remark like that and off you go to the "Purchases of $1,000 and Over" section And there," he added ominously "you get no chance of somehow that and there are no refunds Profits raise are the name of the game "

Again in a more kindly tone, he whispered "There are also other government departments represented here. Perhaps you'll find some services there within your speed ing range."

So saying Alice wandered off through the rotunda until she came to wickets marked "Metric Conversions " "Veterinary Services" and then "Weather Bureau "

She stopped at the Weather Bureau wicket thinking, At least can find out what the weather's like "

She stepped up to the attendant and asked, "Please sir what's the weather like today?"

"You poor addled child " came the reply "The weather is of course is just what you want it to be What would you prefer?"

Genuinely surprised, Alice said, "Well, lots of sunshine of course "

"Tickets to Buenos Waco, Miami Tahiti — you name it — at Canada Post worker 37 Next please "

"What a scam!" thought Alice, and went on to the next wicket marked National Film Board " She decided she might see a movie in two until quieting time

"Can you suggest a movie?" she asked

"Of course I can. That's what I'm here for Sell and hand pass Canada Post worker 45 wickets wicket 72, and there s also

"How disgusting!" cackled on Alice and marched quickly to the wicket designated "Justice Department."

"I want some justice!" she demanded, with more than a little spirit

"Of course," said the attendant, who wore polaroid robes in with the tinted cap "And whom would you like us to hit?"

"Hit?" she asked, puzzled "What do you mean "hit,' ?"

"Hit," he repeated. "Can rid of deep-six — whatever you want to call it. Isn't that what justice is all about? Reasonable — bar profession — prices. Canada Post wicket "

"Outrageous!" Alice said to herself "Why if I can t get out of here, I'll just send a letter home and tell them where I am. Maybe they'll come and get me."

So she walked up to the Canada Post Stamps counter and put a handful of change on the counter

"For that Sackler feed," said the clerk, "maybe I can get you a Togo 17-tonsina stamp in a used Egyptian "

All I want," interrupted Alice, "is a Canadian 32-cent stamp "

A Canadian 32-cent stamp?" asked the clerk incredulously. "Nobody collects those."

Next time, Alice retorted. "I don't want to collect it. I just want to send a letter to my ..."

"She wants to send a letter!" screamed the clerk and soon everyone was screaming, "She wants to send a letter! She wants to send a letter!"

Shouted the Junior desk assistant, "Off with her head!"

Things grow extremely out-of-control.

(The foregoing was written in response to Canada Post plans to add mail order and other profitable lines to existing services.)

Oh yes, that early ambition to produce the best newspaper in Canada!

Over the years we learned to accept the reality that competition was stiff and that worthy opposition abounded in the country. While we never lost the dream, and seriously studied the marks the Review was awarded in the annual Better Newspapers Competitions, both provincial and national, we consoled ourselves with frequent provincial awards the Centennial edition victory and an occasional second or third place in one category or another in national competition.

And then it happened!

We were almost on the eve of a staff banquet observing our 25th anniversary in Weyburn, and honoring Hector Sauvier and Ray Winters on their twenty five years with us when we received word that the Review had won the triple crown of the competition — Best All Around Newspaper Best Front Page and Best Editorial Page — in our circulation category. It seemed almost as though a benign providence had rewarded us for a quarter-century in the business and had timed the cake for the staff party.

Whether it is human perverseness or the maturity that comes with age and experience, I'm not sure — perhaps it is a bit of both — but where we used to look to our competition entries and wonder why they hadn't merited higher placement now we looked at our entry and wondered who in the world had granted us first prize for it — and why.

In the next few years, we won the Best-All-Around three more, as well as several other awards. It was never the same, however, as the one that crowned our twenty-five years.

A dream come true

TWENTY-Three 15 1903

We all have our dreams.

Some are without ground dreams. Sometimes they national goals. Sometimes goals torn into dreams.

Before coming to Weyburn I was with a weekly which once swept the nation newspapers association for awards for its circulation category — best all around best front page and best editorial page.

Naturally that's what we had our eyes on when we move to Weyburn. At the time it seem simply a dream but a goal which gives the confidence and naivete of youth, seemed right around the corner.

Over the quarter-century the Review has won at least an sheen of awards in the Saskatchewan competitions. Few years have gone by that didn't see us bringing home at least a second or third prize, and as often as not a first prize in one or more of the key categories.

The national awards have been more elusive.

Our biggest plum came in 1967 when we received the award for the best Centennial edition in Canada, regardless of circulation. That stand with it a library of 100 books by Canadian readers.

Once every five years or so, we picked up a second or third prize in front page or editorial page competition, and one year our Christmas edition was judged best.

The first 10 years to us, we went to conventions confident that this was the year we would find ourselves near if not right at the top.

A quick look at the list of winners would establish that ours was not among them and we would then sit down and up the marks, compare them with those of competitors, and determine where we stood in the field. It was not heartening to find that we were silently somewhere in the middle of the pack. There was a temptation, as in any contest, to blame the judges, to question their impartiality or even their qualifications.

But as time went by we realized that different judges with different backgrounds did not vary all that much in their assessment. So that excuse went out the window. We developed the philosophy — the one the competition judges seemed to foster — that an expert upon us in enabling us to see how in the eyes of impartial arbiters we compare with other community newspapers of similar size, and to do so not for the sake of winning the big prize, but in order to give our readers and advertisers a better product for their money.

As years head by we found ourselves scraping up in the standings but as our readership increased, we rose into the greater competition of the higher circulation classifications and we would find ourselves in the middle ranks of the new threshold

The dream never quite died but as a goal it seemed secondary to the more important consideration of proving to ourselves that we were somewhere up there among the metropolitan newspapers of the country

For the past few years we found ourselves just below the leaders in the 6,500 to 10,000 circulation class, and some despite the high quality of some of the weeklies in that group we didn't feel we were doing too badly In business obviously, however, and the years were slipping by and that the dream might have to await fulfillment by a future generation

Then I didn't allow myself to get too excited when,

The role of the press being so obviously fundamental to our form society and so divorcely understood It is natural that I found it necessary or expedient, from time to time to deliver myself of a pronouncement on the topic and my interpretations of it. A few examples seem like an appropriate end for this chapter

Commission on publications

EDITORIAL July 6 1961

It is interesting to see the position of the Canadian press as recent recommendations by the Royal Commission on Publications which are aimed at killing the Canadian operations of U.S magazines such as "Time" and "Reader's Digest."

These publications which insist on retaining its type of production I understand, may discover in their course that they have trusted their birthright for a mess of pottage For governmental protection is also governmental control and this could be dangerous in the field of news media.

Half a century ago with only half the population of today Canada had almost twice as many weekly newspapers as most today Weyburn, with a much smaller population and two newspapers The weekly was the only medium through which the rural population could be reached and as a result national advertising outweighed their retail advertising in their papers.

Then along came national and farm publications with their large circulations, and consequently some commercial rates for those forms of national advertising With the loss of and revenue weeklies in two-paper towns were forced to merge and in many smaller communities dropped out of the picture altogether Competition was stepped up again with the advent of radio, particularly in the days when it was confined to large centres and huge listening audiences, and now with television The increased rural circulation of the daily press also had its effect.

Fifty years ago the weekly editor's chief news source was the nearest daily newspaper. Item which he cut and rewrote the items important national and world items stories Local and district stories while they must have existed received secondary consideration and local pictures were simply awkward of

But this was what was expected of the paper and everyone was happy until competing need a forced the weekly to reassess its function in the community

Today the weekly press all but ignores the national and international news stories of the day and confines itself to more comprehensive local coverage their pictures and editorials concerned with local problems. The result has reacted to the advantage we believe of readers and advertisers alike Circulations have shinded, and many papers have developed reputations for community services which go far beyond their immediate circulation area

If the weekly can meet competition through drastic revision of policy surely it is not too much to expect the monied national publications to do the same

Freedom of the press

EDITORIAL August 2 1962

Lately we hear people express themselves on the subject of freedom of the press in a manner that suggests their understanding of it is very much like Congolese conceptions of independence.

Freedom of the press of course is strictly an extension of the principle of freedom of speech, which we accept as the right of any person to voice his opinions without regard for how they may go with anyone else

Newspaper editors exercise this freedom through the editorial columns of their papers and being human, personal bias, prejudice ignorance and even vindictiveness may be reflected in their writings To the extent that they do so over a period of time, the person or the paper's pronouncements inevitably suffers an informed society

Anyone disagreeing with the editor has the right to submit a letter to a statement to the newspaper and the editor exercising his own rights may refuse to publish it If this occurs (and I seldom does) the person may purchase space in the publication to circulate his own opinion and thereby reach the same people that are reached by the editorial

The idea of paying for the space might come as a shock to those who think of freedom of the press as a guarantee of free newspaper space — something like unemployment insurance or social aid — and to whom it never seems to occur that the newspaper too, must pay for the space it uses to present an opinion.

If the newspaper refuses to accept the advertising (now we're really getting hypothetical) any individual still has the right to print a circular and distribute it in any way he sees fit This is what freedom of the press in the right to publish an opinion or fact without fear of prosecution, but as exist on someone to provide the medium.

It should be remembered that freedom of the press — like democracy — is no guarantee of perfection but simply one of the safeguards which help prevent a people from being enslaved by its own mistakes

Confusions

EDITORIAL June 16 1966

In a "viewpoint" publ shed a few weeks ago in this paper a local exhibitor (in one instance) levelled a barrage of criticism against modern merchand sing and advertising methods He questioned the morality of many current practices such as manipulating small children, playing upon human weaknesses and encouraging wastefulness.

Factual articles exposing evils which exist in advertising as in everything else, are good for they create a wareness better informed public better equipped to merchand advertisements which should never have been written

As public resistance to wastefulness advertising and manufacturing practices develop, both will be recommended in higher place

Retail merchants particularly those in communities like Weyburn learn quickly that honest advertising is important if they are to remain in business in an area which they must depend on the same customers to patronize their stores week after week, month after month, year after year This is no least one of the reasons why (plug) most local businesses find their advertisements in the Review effective, and a few do not.

This, of course is the crux of the whole debate on advertising The responsibility to educate is in delicate balance with the consumer's ability to avail it small of his knowledge, and it is true that whenever the motivation of advertisers — the sale of their products — tips the scales advertising becomes the villain

Self-policing by the advertising industry seems to be beforehand but the best and most effective policing of all will be done by consumers who through their reactions, dictate what type of advertising will be successful

Press freedom, NDP style

EDITORIAL July 14 1970

According to press reports of the whole Saskatchewan New Democratic annual convent on in Regina, a resolution was passed advocating, under an NDP government, establishment of a commission to study setting up community controlled radio and television stations and regional publishing facil ties.

One of the reasons advanced for the resolution, according to the report was because the NDP "has historically found it difficult to present its views and to educate the public in the face of the biased, hostile mass media control ed by L beralis and Conservatives" (Ironically the same convention which finds it difficult to get space or time for NDP views, and so-cial tech n ques thereto, who it would have barred the press from the convention)

One wonders what is meant by "community-owned regional publishing facilities." The press now operates without franchise and there is both ng to deny an ind vidual or a group the right to organize a publishing enterprise either which the corporation or on a co-operative

Obviously this has not been found financially practical which pun sh ng fact does exist, and the NDP-proposed publishing house could exist only with heavy government subsidization, which in turn would eliminate the private corporation and naturally leave only the state-controlled and financed media

That is press freedom?

Voice of the state?

EDITORIAL June 3 1971

A list of projects approved recently by the Canadian secretary of state for Reading through the Opportunities for Youth program includes a $6 920 item "to enable seven students to publish 12 issues of the Prairie Fire during the summer allowing organizations of tenants the unemployed Indians and Metis and anti-pollution groups to express their problems "

We without what yardstick was used by the government in deciding that it was important for these individuals to publish their viewpoints on public issues.

And that these are the groups whose problems the Prairie Fire proposes (according to the release) to express. Why are they so special? Who has decided and on what authority that these problems are not sufficiently aired by the Leader Post and other publication's provincial and national available to the people of Regina? And are these groups not represented in city council the provincial legislature and the federal Parliament as other citizens are?

We're getting a bit tired of the seldom-challenged assumption that the problems of these groups outrank those of others.

Why is it right to subsidize the point of view of the unemployed but not the thousands of employed persons who help foot the bill for the former? Why is it more important to public to air the view of the tenant than that of the landlord, who, heaven knows, has lots of problems? And how do we know such a newspaper will actually eradicate itself in the causes aimed, in whatever this is only a front to enable them to express certain political views at the expense of the taxpayer?

The term involved may seem like a small thing to gripe about, but it is up a short step from a small subsidy to state-owned, state-controlled newspapers and the end of press freedom for all.

Danger in prose privilege

intervenor, March 15 1979

Freedom of the press is not and should not be the privilege of those who happen to be in the publishing or broadcasting business, but a simple and logical extension of freedom of speech that is to say that it is lawful to make a certain statement of fact or opinion to friends acquaintances, a stranger on the street, or to the policeman on the corner it is and ought to be lawful to say the same thing a print whether through a circular delivered to a dozen people or through a news medium reaching out to all it is and ought to be lawful whether disseminated by the publisher through his prerogatives by the individual citizen writing a letter to the editor of a publication or by an individual in a group of individuals using a paid advertisement.

In our opinion, special privilege simply invites the next step: the licensing of persons who may gather and disseminate information, and that would be the end of freedom of the press and eventually freedom of speech.

Freedom of speech and of the press are indeed in jeopardy but they are best protected by safeguarding existing rights with a logical base — not through special protection of the media.

Dangerous to no all

intervenor, April 12 1979

As publisher of the Review I am free to write as many editorials as I wish during the advertising blackout favoring or opposing any candidate in a most unreasonable manner and the affected candidate would not be permitted to by space as rebuttal to reply.

That is freedom of speech?

Think about these things carefully and ask yourself whether end incursion upon freedom of speech in reality in the national interest, and how extremely (these days) more enacted

Granted, election advertising becomes tiresome and if we simply cannot stand it for one weeky let's put down on the official election period To trespass upon the freedoms of individuals and groups to advertise a minor business is dangerous to us all

The Gem Community web offset press on which the Review and about eight other southeastern Saskatchewan weekly newspapers are regularly printed

2. Weyburn, Saskatchewan

A disheartening beginning

For a few seconds I could cheerfully have killed the little old man smiling — leering, I thought — at me across the heath cubic at the old Naughty Pine Restaurant

It was fall of 1958, with the dust blowing as I had never seen it blow (but had heard it described many times by the oldtimers who had lived in Saskatchewan during the Dirty Thirties) I had only been in Weyburn for a few months, and had come here in spite of dire warnings from Irene a brother Eugene Derksen that we were going straight to the dust bowl

It was a busy Tuesday morning, had as if the unbelievable that wasn't hard enough to take Edward G Quick my predecessor as publisher of the Review, had chosen this morning to come in had asked me to join him for a cup of coffee across the street. I had protested that I didn't have time, but he had insisted it would do me good Not wishing to offend the quiet, mild-mannered gentleman I had agreed

But like the proverbial hoose hal to water I couldn't be coaxed into the comfortable, carefree mood one associates with coffee break. Instead I looked gloomily out of the window at the gray blizzard which almost obscured the buildings across the street

That a when Mr Quick smilingly asked. "Well, Ernie, what do you think of it now?"

That's when I genuinely hated him for a few seconds That's when I could have strangled him It's all right for you to sit there smiling, I felt like saying. You've unloaded the Review and I'm stuck with it and this godforsaken little town that gets lost in dust storms

I replied as what I hoped was a measured tone: "Mr. Quick, if I had ever seen anything like this nothing could have induced me to come here."

He gave a little chuckle had and with a twinkle in his eye "This is nothing. You should have seen it when I came here."

For the first time that day I took my thoughts off my troubles and did some thinking had calculating

I knew Mr Quick was 72 years old I knew he had owned the Review for 25 years I knew he had four children I knew Mr Quick had been dusted out of a little town called Youngstown in Alberta And I mean dusted out. He hadn't even been able to sell his little weekly newspaper He had just closed the door presumably after selling his old press had typefaces for what little they might have been worth, and left with his family for an obscure somewhere.

The transplanted Englishman, a journeyman painter, had operated the Youngstown Plan-dealer for almost two decades before being turned by drought and depression to close his doors. He was 50 years old, had a wife and family and little else, and the year was 1936—still the depth of depression and drought in Weyburn — when he took over the Review from an Ontarian who had seen enough and wanted to get the paper Weyburn and Saskatchewan all his hands.

Unable to pronounce them address I asked, "Mr Quach whatever made you do it?"

Still smiling his little smile he answered in his soft voice "I knew this was good country I knew it would come back."

I suddenly saw this man in a new and awesome light. Here was a man who had taken his chances on Weyburn and Saskatchewan after his own setback at age 50 with a family to feed. And I also realized at that moment that it was no coincidence that he had invented an gazing for coffee with me on this dark morning.

That kind compassionate man had realized what doubts must be assailing me and had gently led me to the lesson of his own experience. I have thought gratefully of the incident so many times in our three decades in Weyburn decades that have been kind to me and mine but which inevitably have seen their share of drought low grain prices, crop failures, grasshopper infestations, overproduction and the many other reverses that come up to bedevil dryland farmers and those whose living depends on their fortunes.

After 17 years

Originally July 10 1975

This will always be a very special time of year for me for July 2 1958, was the day I took over the Weyburn Review.

Even in an unusual year such as this the first week of July comes through with scenic pretty hot days, so the weather itself serves as a reminder of my first days of trying to fill the role of editor in a community where I didn't know a soul.

That was a hot, dry summer, 1958 with booms and ditches turned up raw and unproducing, even before I arrived. Streets were unpaved except for two or three of our downtown blocks, and even on days without a breeze gravel dust hung heavy on the air.

I had left my then-small family behind to dispose of our Manitoba home before joining me in Weyburn so it was a pretty lonely young man (in those days you could be over 25 without being counted in with the aged and infirm) who woke up on his first Sunday in Weyburn in an overdue clothes-hound room to the dull prospect of having to seek out a place to eat breakfast instead of down in the kitchen with bacon and eggs waiting.

The first few days earlier and left me with the impression of Weyburn as almost a carnival-type of place and the real joy of this city on the first Sunday in July with one-third of the population away on holidays, and another third at the lake was it had settled down. I confess to a Mr Tuesday-like feeling that I had moved into a ghost town after most of the population had moved out.

I might very well have cut and run had I not been slightly buoyed by the enthusiasm for Weyburn I had found in Alan Moffet whom I chanced to meet during the first week. Alan as I was then rather new, and I sometimes wonder how many people discouraged by first impressions of a new home find their spirits fired and hopes restored by the boom town loyalty of the Allan Moffets.

If anyone anywhere reads this and happens to be embarking on a new venture and is disencouraged as I was 17 years ago this week take heart. Keep at it and things will work out.

Of course Mr. Quach was right. This is good country, and it does come back.

The foregoing will establish I am sure that my affection for Weyburn could not be called by any stretch of the imagination a case of love at first sight. Weather conditions and the me of pioneerism engendered by them didn't help, nor did the feeling of strangeness at being in a community quite different from my previous experience.

Growing up in a small town should have prepared me for Weyburn and in many ways it did. Yet there were fundamental differences between Steinbach Manitoba, and Weyburn Saskatchewan that did not make for quick assimilation of course ten years of living in big cities also had left their effect.

While Steinbach had a unique nature within the context of the overall Canadian scene, Weyburn, in contrast, always strikes me as a microcosm of Canada; more particularly, Western Canada. The Mennonite community a village sixty years after it was settled, prided itself then as in isolation — culturally, religiously and ethnically — from its host environment, discouraging its young citizens from seeking fame and fortune. Weyburn, by contrast, drew first and foremost from North American people and confidently thrust itself into this society and offered its young to the building of the young nation.

Weyburn was a product of what has been described as the greatest migration in human history, the settlement of the North American west. Like most Western Canadian towns it grew at the turn of the century around the commercial magnet of railway depot and grain delivery point, and in a few years — in 1903 — qualified for and was granted a charter as a town. Only ten years later, fed by the boom of western settlement and the general prosperity of the times it was ready to be chartered as a Saskatchewan city. Whether Weyburn actually had the required 5,000 inhabitants has been questioned and likely would not have stood close scrutiny but the people built well upon this foundation, and the community has always been respected among Saskatchewan's group of small cities.

Granted the establishment of a large provincial mental hospital here in the early 1920s its dominance as a local industry and the stigma then attached to the presence of such an institution, did affect how the city was perceived elsewhere in the province. Many people imagined life in Weyburn to be a virtual and constant bedlam.

However the hospital also contributed very substantially to Weyburn as a community integrated with the Canadian level of sophistication. Innovative programs introduced and developed at the Weyburn hospital earned it respect in the North American psychiatric community. As well the hospital's need for professional help and the transient nature of imported professionals exposed the young community to greater diversity of culture and opinion than is common to small towns. The associated training school for psychiatric nurses also brought in students from many backgrounds many of whom remained here as hospital staff or married into local families.

If mention of innovative programs seems presumptuous, I'll mention two that have been felt throughout the continent, and indeed the world — for better or for worse. Witness that the first experiments with the hallucinogenic drug LSD were carried out here by Dr. Humphrey Osmond, administrator of the Saskatchewan Hospital Weyburn, in the late 1950s — together with his wife, and his brother-in-law and colleague, Dr. Ian Chassey. Another was the resettlement of the Weyburn hospital's population into halfway houses in their own communities in the mid-1960s. By approval of these particular measures may be qualified but it must be admitted they were not the parochial efforts they were world class.

World War I, with its drain on both human and material resources, slowed things down temporarily as it did throughout the nation. The Roaring Twenties ushered in a decade of optimism, opportunity and progress, only to be brought to an abrupt halt by developments as New York a Wall Street which precipitated a continental depression that effectively took care of most of the 1930s. In the Palliser Triangle which surrounds Weyburn the depression years were accompanied by a severe drought with effects that went well beyond the decade.

The advent of World War 2 quickly drew the people of Weyburn into a partnership with the rest of the country in the prosecution of the bloodiest war in history. Local men and women quickly responded to the nation's call and served, often with distinction in all branches of the Canadian armed forces.

Two things probably enhanced Weyburn's credentials as a closer partner in the war effort than the average community. The establishment of a Secondary Flying Training School as part of the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan just outside the city gave the people of Weyburn direct exposure for much of the war to hundreds of young men whose families were pronouncing war at first hand. This exposure could not have helped but fine-tune the city's natural identification with the war.

Then, on a fateful day in August of 1942 units of the South Saskatchewan Regiment took part in the Dieppe Raid which has variously been described as a colossal strategic blunder, as a necessary prologue in the eventual opening of the second front, and as a tactical probe with a secret missions of great sensitivity. Whichever it was, it took a heavy toll, since the SSR consisted largely of men recruited in Weyburn Estevan and other communities in this corner of the province.

Yes throughout Canada and for several years once Canadian forces were drawn into action the telegraph of regret became all too familiar in Canadian communities large and small. But few small centres were introduced so suddenly and tellingly to the realities of war. There was probably no one in Weyburn who was not personally acquainted with a number of the men who died, were wounded were captured or who distinguished themselves at Dieppe and nearby villages. On the seven seas, in the skies over Britain and Germany, and in the battlefields of France, the Netherlands and Germany, men from the Weyburn area distinguished themselves as well, and too many did not return to enjoy the rewards of the triumph of freedom and democracy.

'Green Beach'

ERNESTLY August 5 1976

One of the most fascinating books I have read in many years has to be "Green Beach " by James Lamar

It was brought to me by Rev Jack Jones of Weyburn, and I have to confess, that I wondered until I got into the book just what the exercise was all about. Ministers in case Mr Jones doesn't know it after half a century in the service are always suspect to the their members and this instance was no exception. His hunches it of course and knowing owners far better than I know clergymen, probably took it for granted that I would read the opening and closing chapters and when I then tell him on the first appropriate occasion that it was wonderful and inspiring, and that if only the Lord and more such people in His service the world would be a better place

Well, surprise it was a that kind of a book and I read the whole thing with fascination. I pondered the description for a long time because my first chosen "suggestion, necessarily out-of-place in 1976.

The book was a blow-by-blow account of the Dieppe raid on August 19 1942, where as many Weyburn Estevan men boys lost their lives in World War 2 — a raid which many have justified as a trial run for the Normandy invasion two years later, but continued by as many others as a wasteful slaughter

But all that aside, a few years ago a news feature in the daily press revealed for the first time that the Dieppe raid — at least the Pourville portion of it and that in where the SSR was involved — was tied in with a cloak-and-dagger mission that would defy the imagination of fiction writers today

The story was confirmed in "Green Beach, which while taking into consideration and fully explaining the broader purpose of the raid also gives us vivid accounts of the personal adventure of one Jack Nissenthal an RAF radar expert who donned a Canadian uniform and was ashore with the SSR to get what information he could on German radar expertise

What book fits case to bizarre was that he was accompanied at all times by a data it all SSR men assigned to protect him and assist him in every way but to make sure that he did not fall into enemy hands being my accumulations because of his knowledge of British radar technology The fact that he was Jew at a time when the distinction was accurately an Iron Cross qualification as Germany did not make the mission much less or for the RAF flight-sergeant.

Besides the charm of the whole story the fact that the tale included so many names of people that I have since met or read about in back copies of the Review — Empringham England, Kelsey, Mosher Merrin Orme Quinn Pick Stinson — gives it almost a personal signal cance even though I never saw Weyburn until December was already inched me the city a history as deeply and as painfully as it was in the history of World War 2 itself

Nissenthal came to Canada a few years ago to help the author research the book, and in a personal note noted on the epilogue is as own sentimentality on the way lines cross:

> we were in Regina Sask roughly 1 400 miles west of Ottawa to meet SSR veterans and Jack and I hailed a taxi to take us to our first appointment. As we climbed into the cab the driver heard our accents and asked I we were English We said we were, and he gave us Iran name — Eric Empringham — and cry acted that he had landed with the South Saskatchewan Regiment at Pourville

" You know one thing?" he went on "There was an English guy there, a radar expert. Now some of our people were go up in short turn I these was my risk of his falling into German hands. I have often thought about that I wonder what happened to him?" "

Well the book tells the whole story

A Royal Canadian Navy frigate the HMCS Weyburn, further attained the city a identification with the war Three were numerous contacts between the ship and the city and there was a real sense of loss when the ship went down with heavy losses of personnel even though none of the ship's crew came from Weyburn.

Having represented Weyburn as a microcosm of Canada and particularly Western Canada I must qualify this with the seeming contradiction that Weyburn was not a typical western Canadian settlement.

A high percentage of prairie towns were settled by people from one ethnic background as another who were dedicated consciously or otherwise to isolating and insulating these groups and then traditional lifestyles. Weyburn by contrast was settled first by Saskatchewan people from settlements along the CPR main line, then by a large contingent of eastern Canadians, followed soon by an emergence of American settlers lured here by the available free land and other inventives. Europeans who migrated here directly from the Old World tended to come in families or as individuals to homestead, to hire out as farm laborers or housemaids, or to work on the railway. Often they joined relatives already living here. While there surely must have been little ethnic pockets they were generally too small to be noticeable, or to have manifest leadership and independent political and social directions.

Churches which often draw aprons of apartness around distinct ethnic groups may have done the opposite here because the major ones were not dominated by individual ethnic groups. The Roman Catholic Church for instance had parishioners of French, German Polish Dutch, Hungarian and other backgrounds including some of the American and Ontario settlers. The Lutheran Church mustered its German and Scandinavian immigrants, as well as to English-speaking Americans of the same origins. The United Church of Canada formed through union of the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches shortly after World War 1 became a catch-all for many Protestants whose religious were not represented here strongly enough to build their own churches.

So this is the Weyburn to which we came a baker's dozen years after the end of World War 2. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that this is how it is impressionist my mind out of original impressions tempered by the hindsights of over 30 years of exposure to the community and its evolution, perusal of local histories (combines as quasi-cities, proofreader as press typesetter), personal involvement in a numerous historical sections, and reading countless stories in back issues of the Review.

World War 3 had been over long enough to permit confidence in agriculture the long-range weather gestures and in a strong national economy that might even support this part of Canada. All this was tempered with some caution and distrust on the part of the ubiquitous pessimists but there was no gainsaying the dollars from the recently discovered Weyburn oil fields beginning to find their way into local coffers through diverse routes.

Distinct residents still included in 1958 a strong sprinkling of the rugged individuals who had settled here area, and whose characteristics helped to shape the community. A book just on these personalities would have been a challenging undertaking for a local writer. I have been able to touch on just a few of them.

He sold Southeast Saskatchewan

a FEATURE April 9, 1959

You can say Pete Hurst sold Southeast Saskatchewan and you'll only be exaggerating the slightest bit, for if there is anyone in this corner of the province to whom that witty garrulous — and skewed — raconteur hasn't sold something there is a good chance that he a sold something for him.

Seventy in July and with probably more than a thousand amateur sales behind him Pete has sold everything there is to sell and a lot of things that usually aren't — like hundreds of acres of fish which he claimed they swam a good Liberal and kept for sentimental reasons.

It is said, and Pete admits it, that he can spot a bid before it's out of the bidder's mouth and once a successful customer even claimed that all he and Jean ever took on eyebrow at Pete, and the next thing he knew was "Sold!"

Calvin H. Hurst, who is known as "Pete" by nearly everyone in the territory is justly proud of the popularity which he means took to a lifetime of fair dealings with clients and bidders alike.

"Friendship stops when the sale starts," he declares, and highest bidder takes it. I've never played favorites."

The secret of auctioneering, says Pete — and he can give it away without fearing a flood of competition — is to keep things moving with a flow of chatter and a quick answer to a disparaging comment. "And you listed to hold your tongue" if you can't control that you can't control a crowd.

But the greatest factor in the success of a sale he mentions, is the popularity of the owner

"I can tell with the first bid" he avers "how the whole sale is going to go, and how we I bid the numbers. If he's popular I a good sale if he aint, it isn't."

While Mr. Horst recalls a fabulous day's commissions he can remember equally well countless sales especially during the dirty thirties, when he didn't take home a cent. With always a soft spot in his heart for people down on the luck, he refused to charge widowed mothers or others whom he considered down and out.

Recalling the first cash sale, he says it was for a woman whose husband was not in hospital "I went to the man and he asked me for advice on the terms I said cash was the only thing, and he just shook his head"

The funny assignment after learning his client expected to get only $2 000 out of the sale persuaded him to agree to the cash sale. After the sale he returned to the hospital put on his courtroll expression and went into the man's room

"Well how did the sale go?" he asked me. Not very good I told him. Not good at all. "That's what I figured" he told me and asked how little he dreaded

"Why he wouldn't believe me, when I told him it and brought him $3,500 — $1 500 more than he'd hoped for "cheerio Pete — "And with my phone ever busy Every auctioneer in the province called to ask me him I'd made out with the sale

Pete a love for auction sales dates back to his study boyhood and as a very much responsible for his migration to Saskatchewan from his native Huronia Ont.

He used to play hookey from school to go to auction sales, and the old auctioneer who taught him some of the tricks and let him auction off the buggy whip, and odds and ends used to tell him to go west.

His chance came before he expected it for his rates caught up with him Tired of expelling him three times a week for playing hookey the teacher made it stick and Pete found himself at home early

Undaunted although broke, he decided to go west, and was beckoned to the municipal secretary a office by a sign that said "Loans

"It meant farm loans" chuckles Pete "but I didn't know that, and anyway I talked the secretary into giving me fifty dollars That took me to Weyburn, where a number of local folks and learned I got a job on a farm and was able to send him back the money to the end of the summer

Pete worked to whatever came along until the first war when he enlisted as the 46th Battalion He went overseas but never reached France as a severe attack of influenza hospitalized him for months He underwent two returned operations before finally being sent back to Canada

After the war his brother Stel an R.C.A.F. Burnt farm a few years ago dean of the University of Toronto College of Pharmacy Introduced Pete to a well known pharmacist.

"I said my head must "Be insane "And the man said I would have made a good lawyer But I was too old to start study ng law Had suggested the profession or a travel ng salesman but not their rang who I

"What are you interested in doing?" he asked me, and I told him I had always wanted to be an auctioneer Don't ever change your mind, he told me, and I never have

After attending at a few he a pounds and a small auction sale a Ontario "Just so I could tell myself an auctioneer." Mr. Horst returned to Weyburn hung out his shingle and has been following his trade ever since.

The biggest job of his career came when the federal government engaged him to sell a quarter million dollars worth of crown lands in Saskatchewan at a fee of about $300 per day

How true the utmost everything in his life those was more than met the eye, for it was a Liberal government and Horst always was a strong Tory ("Why I was once the only Tory in Weyburn")

After having been assured by local Liberals that he had very little chance of getting the job, Pete relates he wrote to Ottawa, described himself as a man who thought the right way and himself got the job and signed the name of a local Liberal He got the job.

Besides being the only auctioneer a Weyburn for many years Pete is exactly for keeping up a steady chatter wise him may a job as conventioneer such to as the livestock parade as the Weyburn fair Knowing each farmer within m es he would add a comment about the meat himself and in turn, as he passed with his prize-winn ng stock

In the days before radio and television brought the news into people's homes daily a was the Review a custom, on occasions day to hook up with a wire service and set up a public address system outside around which huge crowds would gather to hear the latest national and local returns

In the basement the telegrapher would hand the to letters a Pete who would read them over the loudspeaker

He won t soon forget the time when, contrary to his hopes, the Liberals showed an early land and he trouble to contain himself except into the mike

Don't tell me the g——d——— Greats are taking it again!"

As a man whose life and livelihood has always been closely interwoven with that of the farmers, it was natural that he should show a deep interest in their links such as that of the Agricultural Society. He was on the fair board from 1923 has been its advertising consultant chairman auctioneer for the calf club for ten years, and is still an honorary director.

Blessing his Waterloo home in life than mess. Mr Hurst married Bertha Tubs in 1926. There three daughters and all in Weyburn although the youngest 13-year-old Brenda fathering an artistic bent may go to Vancouver a summer for training in figure skating. The elder two are Hazeldean (Mrs John Evans) and Ethel Lou (Mrs Mervi Dean)

With the end of this year Mr Hurst hopes to retire from the wearing business of auctioneering. At 70, he certainly deserve the rest, but those who know him well believe it when they see it.

A brochure brought him here

APEATURE April 16 1959

Early in March in the Regina business area Weyburn a tired heart quickened as an old man watched the passing landmarks that were to familiar to him in the pa m of his heart as he was borne nearer to a place would his name a synonymous with "pioneer" and "community builder

For George Beischel, among the first abroad of the region and associated in the years and he mixed with every major project which made Weyburn what it is today. It was the end of the road for at the age of 88 and after eight years of retirement in the kind climate of Nevada...he had resolved that the city wh ch he had helped to mold was the place where he would like to spend the twilight years of his life

And with every family ir ness and every familiar contour of the country he passed on the way home came a memory of the joys sorrows, triumphs...frustrations, smiles and tears and not an integral part of a long life in a new city a new province, and a new nation.

Born in Jefferson, Wis., the son of one of the best blacksmiths in the state Mr Beischel spent most of his early years on an Iowa farm as the elder Beischel and m give up his trade for reasons of health when George was only six, and moved in a farm in the Baraboga State.

There he might have stayed, helping his father run the farm, and managing a threshing outfit of his own but for a railway trip in a nearby town in 1901 that banded his own life, and may have altered the history of a good deal of our province of Saskatchewan, especially the city of Weyburn.

S tting in the coach, he eyes was caught by a printed pamph et lying on a seat. He picked it up read it and was immediately sold on the western Canada and in underdeveloped expanse which was described in such glowing terms as the real estate circular that closed with the immortal "Go West, Young Man.

"I'm going to Canada," he announced the same day to a friend who managed a resta in the town he and travelled on.

"When?" the banker shared in leave

"Just as soon as I've finished two or three more threshing jobs I have to do," Mr Beischel told him and immediately won an enthusiastic partner for the trip

As he had planned Mr Beischel completed the fall harvesting around the threshing outfit visited his friend that he was on her way and together they came to Weyburn and bought several pieces of land in the Fil mont district.

Mr Beischel stayed here the banker remains in use what the Saskatchewan winter climate was like then returned to Iowa to prepare for the move In spring he came back in Weyburn, bringing with him a herd of 30 white-faced Hereford cattle believed to be the first of the breed imported to this area.

Mr Beischel cannot recall that part of his life without pondering for a moment on the memory of the two dogs, which seems identified to him a unselved the ol time.

It seems that he brought with him from Iowa but dogs, a mongrel collie which was an well trained that he was Mr Beischel's pride and joy However as money and the dog have got on the train waited he began to act strangely...cowering and whimpering and refusing to eat.

The bottom the door of the sedcar was opened in Weyburn, he dashed out, crashed under a house not far from the shared and beton of making failed in bring him out

Mr Beischel gave up finally deciding that once he was half a mile out on the prairie the dog would come bounding after him He didn t and the cattle, arousing the absence of the dog, did everything but co-operate and after a few frustrating miles Mr Beischel was fully prepared for a secret packing trip.

Suddenly out of nowhere a dog streaked by him got the herd in line and came back for a sign of approval Mr Beischel thought at first it was his own dog but when he came closer discovered it wasn't

He gave the animal a pat on the head as we l as a some material reward in the form of a sandwich and a new partnership was formed He and the dog the years often wondered what and come over but town dog and where the new dog and come from but never found out

"And I wasn't trying hard to find out," admits Mr. Beschel. He believes the dog was accidentally left behind when a handful of settlers made a stop at Weyburn.

At that summer Mr. Beschel hauled lumber and supplies from Weyburn to Pilmoor over what later became known as the Big Arbel Trail and by the time the first snowstorm came in fall and a bonus finished and ready for plastering inside of his 16 by 24 homesteader.

After several years Mr. Beschel moved to Weyburn, Saskatchewan where as horse trader, realtor and farm implement dealer he first became one of the area's leading businessmen. His first shop was built where Weyburn Motors now stands and he later moved across the river to the present Home-Saskatoon location.

Dealing in everything in the implement line Mr. Beschel recalls how eg a stock of 50 2½ horsepower outboard motors in 1912 and selling every one of them.

Mr. Beschel was more than a businessman, he was a community builder whose support and talents were volunteered for every worthwhile project undertaken during his active life.

When the old hospital (now Mount S. Mary) was built, Mr. Beschel, who owned the and left the council chambers and asked the aldermen to name their own price on the parcel and whatever they decided would be okay with him.

When the race track at the fair was built, Mr. Beschel's aid was sought again so he recruited two helpers, hitched a scraper to two ponders, and in two and a half days Weyburn had a race track.

He was official starter at the first races held there and at first for many years thereafter. He was also on the fair board for numerous years.

Long a member of council Mr. Beschel stayed from local as provincial and federal politics although unsuccessful in both attempts.

His defeat a the 1908 election on the Conservative ticket was certainly not for the lack of support from the press for the old Weyburn Herald came out with two-inch head lines urg ng the electors to "Vote for Beschel" and almost every front-page story was on his opponent ranging from politically critical to downright libelous.

One story was headed "Liberal Candidate a Dismissed Official"; decided" ——— Lone ves Goose Lake People" and a third "An Attempt to Steal the Seal." One story, which sounded as though it might have been borrowed from the Calgary Eyeopener accused Mr. Beschel i opposion of having four planks in his platform: "Vote against Beschel because he is an American; 2 Vote against Beschel because he is a German; 3 Vote ag nst Beschel because he is a Catholic; 4. Vote against Beschel because he is a Protestant."

Mr. Beschel a second attempt came a the 30s when he joined countless other Ilussuc followers in defeat under a Liberal, undidate. His comment on his political career a hard "I was a fool."

Of the long eventful life behind him Mr. Beschel wistfully says he would love to live it all over again, basically adds, "knowing what I know now."

In up to of his a ght year absence Mr. Beschel finds it hard anything but lonesome, for all hosted have not forgotten him. When he arrived he was greeted by a group of acquaintances who had appointed themselves as a welcoming committee and were on his room at the Royal he a near-door neighbor at several of the oldtimers who were here with him when the Soo L ne country opened up.

Weyburn has changed since the day when George Beschel took his white-faced Herefords off the train but still always he home and will always welcome back the man who built it.

Western Wire and Cable had been here a years in the hangars at the airport, vacated when the war was and down. Western Christian College had moved into airport buildings at about the same time. There was a plan a that other industries could be ac acted in as other available hangars and a few individuals — notably Tom Lang — worked tirelessly toward this end.

On the civic scene, council had approved a long-term program to pave most of the city streets but found a prerequisite was the replacement al many of the water and sewage mains, still in plank from pioneer times. The short-term consequence was a lot of mud on the rare wet days and a lot of dust on the more common dry and windy days.

Negotiations were underway to sell the old power plant operated by the city and mostly in need of modernization, to the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. This was accomplished in the following year, amid political turmoil that resulted in the resignation of Mayor Jim Staveley. The city received $2 million for the electrical facility. Not only was the city relieved of further concern with the operation and modernization of the utility, but what was then still considered a princely sum could be set aside to finance future capital expenditures.

A few weeks after our arrival in Weyburn, the city police force headed by ex-Mounte Jim McCardle observed its first anniversary. For years before that community policing had been handled under contract, by the RCMP.

Until the mid 1950s the education of Weyburn's children was handled by the three original elementary schools, Assiniboia, Souris and Hugh but the city's growth demanded expansion, and a fourth public school Elgin had been added as well as St Dominic Savio School for the recently organized Roman Catholic school district About this time too, Queen Elizabeth School was built for rural children reflecting a growing trend toward centralized education. A private kindergarten was introduced in the early 1960s and in a few years this became part of the elementary school system

Predestined victim of the century

AFRATURE November 12 1999

Fifty years ago the newly-built century schools of Saskatchewan stood as proud symbols of the progressiveness of the 20th century — a progressiveness that demanded distinction for the children of the pioneers, whatever else had or be sacrificed to school it.

Turkey stalking into a wood-chinked neglected background the deserted little red schoolhouse is a victim of the same century's pace which builds them quickly destroys in favour of smaller, easy-forward

Within by eg memory those schools were built by farmers whose homes drew the lumber over muddy roads to demand building rises and made happy gatherings out of days of hard work.

Such a school was Manvera Five miles east of Weyburn and the recollections of its former students and the people who built would be like the story of dozens, offered hundreds of little schools in the province which have faded from the sphere of usefulness

Built in 1908, it was named after Manvera, Ont., where many of the district's pioneers came from and classes were held months every term from that year until the centralized school district was introduced At one time there were as few as seven students enrolled and as many as 30 in another term.

It started with an elected school board which had the burden of all the day to-day tasks as where to buy the lumber, and whether borrow the money to district the building until enough money was raised with a the district Later after the school was built, the trustees had to hire a teacher and to decide on his or her salary

The school was the centre, a community centre as it was used for students meetings socials and concerts and a church Christmas concerts and other programs were put on frequently to raise money for a worthwhile project and everyone in the community joined in and gave a hand.

Most of the work of cleaning in the days of the country school fell to the teachers not students. Teachers had to do their own janitor work, such as making fires, washing windows, sweeping floors and burning trash

One of the happiest times for students was the district preparation for the Christmas concert No school work would be done for at least two weeks and those selected by end of laughter and gaiety

Streamers put up and be hung from the ceiling, and the daring "big boys" selected climb on the piano to do it

If you asked any of the oldtimers of the district as roll of one incident connected with the administration of the school, they probably referred invented the time the trustee made a motion that "O Canada" not be sung at school It seems he argued it was a French hymn, therefore unsuitable as a Canadian national anthem. Hilarious was not seconded.

It wasn't all fun and games at the school however and several near-tragedies resulted from lack of games equipment or from work done by unqualified people

In 1935 a faulty furnace gave off fumes which nearly asphyxiated pupils and teachers School was closed for several days while the furnace was repaired and the vacuum recovered There were no serious after-effects

In 1954 a fire district in the school when one of the students built a fire in the furnace. Unable to get the fire started he but soaked it with gasoline. The one district to burn and fire spread to the building when he was unable to get the conflagrate and out

A making monster noticed the students pouring from the school and he saw the smoke He rushed to the nearest neighbor to phone the Weyburn fire department which soon and the fire extinguished. There was little damage to the building, although the school were badly charred

The school had quite a turnover as students at a family moving even a few miles would be in another school district Often new families moving in would, be Ukrainian immigrants, whose children spoke not a word of English

Ex-students recovered wonderingly that despite the language barrier they never had any difficulty playing local games and conclude that hide-and-seek, pussum e lause red light and other children a games are international

All grades were taught in one room by one teacher as it was no wonder that the students felt like one big happy family Birthday parties and the like were not complete unless the whole student body was there

To the younger children, the vases of the school inspector were something to be dreaded, as he always looked in work books and test books at see if they were neat And he always sent students to the board to do drill work. The older students enjoyed that work — if those books were to indicate that they knew their work.

But the entire class was always on best behavior on these days.

Everything related to the operation of the school was looked after by the local elected section of trustees until the larger unit came into effect in 1945. Many people thought the change was a good idea, but there were many against it although no one actually put up a fight.

The main objection was that they felt the school building the city should belong to them.

School terms have been a change from the first year the school was opened. At first the term was from April 1 to December 1 with two weeks holidays in July. Gradually changes were made until the school reached at present September-to-June schedule.

Another thing that changed was the teacher's salary. In 1905 wages were $50 per month. Every year they gained a little until the 30s when they dropped sharply almost reach ing the 1905 level.

The larger school unit unit came debated long ago, and although accepted with misgivings is now performed by most.

But people of the district must wonder as they pass the empty schoolhouse whether something process was not lost when they changed over to the easier more practical modern methods

The Weyburn Collegiate Institute, opened on the day of Weyburn amalgamation as a city, still stood with the community a secondary educational needs although with some additions to the original structure. Two junior high schools, school addit ions and a comprehensive high school are on a larger area than just the city was at that time but in the future.

By the time of car arrival, the automobile had fully taken over as the standard mode of transportation. Hitching rails had disappeared from city streets, and livery stables were no more. A last reminder of the horse-and-buggy days were the horse-drawn milk wagon operated by Gordon Miles then a city alderman and a future mayor, and Herman Kochanik a familiar dray driven by a unmatched team of horses.

Television was slowly creeping across the nation and with the opening of a Regina station, antennas began to find their way onto Weyburn rooftops to pick up fuzzy signals of wrestling matches and puppet shows. Distances between urban centres being what they are in the part of the country, it was only a few years later that a cable television company erected a receiving tower almost 1 000 feet high on South Hill improving the quality of reception, increasing the choice of stations available and removing the jungle of antennas from the rooftops.

Also, long Weyburn into the 20th century ascendancy of instant communications, a local radio station CFSL, had been on the air for just a year. References to the station in the opening chapter almost as a villainous rival should be read as reflecting mutual goodwill on the part. The Review and CFSL have been competitors but complementary to each other have enjoyed excellent relations at all times and have worked together in many ways for a better Weyburn. The founder and president Tommy Laing commanded our deepest respect, and he taught me many valuable lessons in my initiation to the business world.

A number of local organizations had joined forces in an initiative to establish a park in the perimeter of the water reservoir formed in the Souris River northeast of the city at what was then known as Seven-Mile Dam. A lot of work had been done with much effort not visible and for a while it looked as though the whole project might be abandoned. Certainly the council of the day was pointedly uncombustible about it. I like to think that the Review had a hand in keeping it alive until the provincial government's regional park zones two gave the recreational area a new name — Nickle Lake Regional Park — and a new lease on life. Today people of the area could not imagine being without it.

The horse isn't having any

EDITORIAL September 12 1963

You can lead a horse to water, but you can't make it drink" the old adage goes, and we must confess that the union of the city the R.M. of Weyburn and the R.M. of Lonsdale for the purpose of improving the Weyburn Community Park reminds us very much of a horse that won't.

Although the Review has been campaigning for a regional park agreement for several years we have never expected miracles from the arrangements Neither however were we prepared for a completely negative approach.

When the city first reluctantly explored the possibility of joining with rural municipalities in form a regional park authority council showed its enthusiasm by appointing at its representatives the aldermen who and expressed the most opposition to the park

When finally a spate of themselves the three seems to appeal to proceed (we use the term loosely) they are men appointed to the governing body are asked only one person who and ever shown any interest in the park The other five have five records of community service and we have no doubt that we we received full value, and more, for every cent entrusted to them.

But unless they have become fired with enthusiasm since accepting these appointments we are not likely to see big things happening in the Weyburn Community Park

Council of course, furnished the ball when it failed to get commitments from district clubs and organizations which started the project before even agreeing to it themselves by (repeated) park.

But as we we said if the right were it is just won't.

Another regional park which has become important to Weyburnians as well as to people throughout the Southeast was born also at the week I arrived This Dr Maimprise Regional Park was established to honor Mildale minister doctor who had been many things beside leader to the community

Goals and rewards

EDITORIAL June 16, 1959

Men have set as their goal the acquisition of a million do lars — or a billion — and have reached that goal only to wonder whether it was worth the trouble sacrifice and hard work.

Had someone half a century ago named young Dr William Graham Maimprise opened his practice in Melville prescribed for it in the course he has fol lowed, and promised it as a return a park named in his honor it may be assumed that the doctor would have turned down the offer of a moment of glory in return for a lifetime of sacrifice

A week ago, when southern Saskatchewan turned out, three thousand strong, to dedicate the Maimprise Community Park Mrs Maimprise the woman who and been the doctor s partner in h s dedicated existence indicated quite sincere y that they had never wo their reward in the friendship of the community and that the naming of the park was a glorious generous remin

There were not empty words just as the naming of the park was similar empty gesture

To the members of the community which presented the park its name came naturally and unmistakably were unanimous approval. It was merely the gain of an idea which caught their fancy: it was a full-blown thought that needed only voicing to win enthusiastic approval. It had its origin in their general love for a man and his wife; which was the essence of what the Maimprises considered their reward for their work

Which brings us back to goals.

What was Dr Maimprise s goal?

We can safely guess that it was the knowledge that he was doing the very best he could every day and under all circumstances.

There were too many times when he might have said "No" and no one of the shortest judge that he was being asked to do the impossible

But being his own judge made it more difficult, and the thousands who saw him accomplish the im possible must regard it great man and loved him for it

We believe as you do Dr and Mrs Maimprise, that you have your reward But we don t know whether anyone is at all how much it is worth

It is difficult to impress on anyone today the dilemma faced every summer by parents in the days when polio was still a constant urban hot weather threat Who wanted to deny a child the treat of an afternoon at the park just because there was an infinitely small chance of contracting the crippling disease? Yet who wanted to expose children to the dreadful consequences of polio? So children for the most part, swam and took part in other group activities, while parents anxiously watched for the fearful symptoms. Then in the late 1950s along came Dr Jonas Salk and the oral vaccine that wiped out the disease on this continent and removed in least one source of parental worry

Tommy Douglas, who had used his pastorship in Weyburn s Calvary Baptist Church as a springboard to becoming eventually Canada s first Socialist premier was still a familiar figure on city streets and particularly at community functions. He had first been elected to the old federal Weyburn riding to the House of Commons for the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF) finishing the seat until 1952, when he had resigned to take the leadership of the provincial party. In the 1944 general election his party was swept to power and he never forgot the city that gave him his political start, and the people — his congenial personality and persuasive powers had gained him a large following — who had given him their unstinting support

It was only a few years after our arrival that an old dream of Tommy Douglas' universal free medical care and hospitalization was introduced amid great controversy. By this time Douglas had accepted the national leadership of the New Democratic party successor to the CCF and there was a commonly held belief that the Saskatchewan medicare plan — Canada's first — had been hatched along just a bit to strengthen the Douglas image nationally. A tribute by the medical profession engendered anxieties and hatreds that left their mark for decades but the plan became the model for a national medicare scheme. Few Saskatchewan people today would stand for its removal and politicians of all parties make very rare they are firmly on the side of the angels on this question.

Hockey and skating in Weyburn were still limited to several outdoor rinks and the old Leahy Arena Rink with its unreliable natural ice. The curling rink also with natural ice was attached to the Arena Rink.

It was also in the late 1950s that an organized effort was begun to build the Colosseum and a new curling rink with artificial ice for both on the fairgrounds. It wasn't long coming to fruition and brought junior hockey in the form of the Weyburn Red Wings to Weyburn.

Recreation was still unco-ordinated in towns and small cities in the 1950s. It was in 1959 that Al Herron was hired for a one-year trial period at Weyburn's first recreation director — at a salary of $5,000. When you look at the recreation department empire today it is difficult to see how anyone ever managed to have fun in less organized recreation-starved times.

Rev. Shaun Herron, who later left the ministry in favor of writing newspaper columns and fiction was making United Church and downtown life interesting in those days with his fiery sermons laced with humor and scorn. Instead of one his favorite targets were the "money barons of Main Street," Weyburn's power establishment. Between his sermons and his brief entry into the political scene as a city alderman he probably ripened some cases of worms that needed opening, but he didn't choose to stay long enough to savor the results if any, of his crusade. His successor Ross McMurtry was pastor of the church for almost thirty years, and was also known to wear some hackles but his hang on rather i totally confident in the advice he was passing along, at as his ability to come up with new sermons suitable for the times and guaranteed to provoke thought.

Speaking of characters it seemed that the small town business world in those day was dominated by characters. A book could be written just about the individuals who ran the butcher shops, drug stores, garages and conclusive shops of a few decades ago.

Although gravel highways were still very much the rule in the late 1950s Highways 39 and 6 between Weyburn and Regina had received some sort of surfacing — perhaps oil — about in 1948. This may have been a plum for putting Tommy Douglas into the premiership. When I arrived these highways had already been blacktopped and Highway 13 most to Stoughton was being prepared for surfacing.

Traffic between Weyburn and Regina was still relatively light probably in part because people still tended to equate the trip in their minds with a two-hour drive on dusty gravel. The two-car family still wasn't the norm and even single-car families had not yet developed the compulsion to eliminate walking which for a period seemed to be part of the North American psyche. In the two years that the Review remained in the Mitchell Block after we came to Weyburn, for instance, I was the only staff member (out of sixteen) to drive a car to the office. A few others owned cars but used them only sparingly during leisure hours. Twenty years later, when the second Review move was made to the East and Ninth location we provided parking lot with spaces just about equal in the number of staff members, and even then a few always parked on the street.

Some time during the next twenty years blacktopping of Highway 13 from Stoughton to Carlyle was completed, giving Weyburn residents easier access to their resorts at White Bear Lake and Kenosee. the same highway was soon also regraded and surfaced from Carlyle to the Manitoba border, providing all-weather access to Winnipeg.

The International Parks Highway Association which promoted a one-numbered (36E) good-quality highway from northern Saskatchewan (through Weyburn) to the Montana border and beyond probably helped bring about oiling and blacktopping of Highway 35 from this city to the U.S. border and later some form of surfacing north to the Prince Canada Highway. The 36E organization faded away somehow but more recently has been replaced by the Ameuca Highway Association promoting a north-south highway system better geared to creating traffic patterns and roads

In the mid-1970s the Red Coat Trail organization was founded to establish an alternate route from Winnipeg to British Columbia following Highway 13 through Saskatchewan This group helped bring about straightening of Highway 13 west of Skaunavon to the Alberta border and connecting it with a new stretch of highway on the Alberta side Thus and construction of the Weyburn mall, also led to blacktopping of Highway 13 west beyond Tecumseha and oiling or surfacing of other western sections

Easier access to distant cities has been a mixed blessing. The good roads are a boon for the travellers but less so for the small town merchant who sees his customers making off to Regina and other cities. Weyburn's mall, a product of the late 1970s was a countermeasure to this trend purporting to offer district people one-stop shopping under one roof without going in far-off cities This battle of course, has yet to be won

The local airport, a legacy of World War 2, also affected Weyburn's contact with the world bringing in small aircraft from other throughout the continent

Oil fields developed in Southeastern Saskatchewan in the 1950s gave a new dimension to the economic base of the district and the city and again injected new blood into the community

Thus, perhaps as "through a glass darkly" is a glimpse of the Weyburn we found in 1958, and I hope the editorials columns and features reprinted herein and hereafter offer an insight into the Weyburn of the 1960s through the 1980s, the people of the community and their collective aspirations and initiatives

What's happening?

EDITORIAL March 23 1961

"What's happening in Weyburn?"

About a gbt thousand people asked themselves this question last week after learning one morning that the city police force had been manhandled by a mob of youths whose utter contempt for constituted authority left witnesses to the incident aghast.

It was difficult to believe this thu was a prairie agricultural community — town by the standard of any province but Saskatchewan — for the attitude of the gang was that of a group which had enjoyed immunity for so long that its members were enraged by the interference of the city police

It is doubtful, too whether the issues of law and order was helped by the fact that a score of civilian adults simply looked on while those appointed to protect them were fighting a los ng battle.

The situation was fina ly brought under control when members of the RCMP appeared on the scene But a lo interesting to note this the Mounties didn't seem roughly-handled. They carried night-sticks — and didn't even have to use them.

Strangely however the bonnet were anything but subdued after they had been locked up n cells at the police station They continued to laugh, shout and taunt their captors, and what the morrow might bring appeared to be the least of their worry

Even n police court next morning, they were hardly the picture of wayward youth normally facing punishment The courtroom was filled with their buddies and until the moment of judgment none seemed to be unduly worried

It was brought out in court that most of the youths involved had previous convictions But they were continually causing disturbances and that the work of the police force was constantly being hampered by the fact that they were constantly having to check the same persons in all hours of the night Raids on dances in neighboring villages disturbances in restaurants, and extreme misconduct at local teen dances have also come to light

Sentence has been passed and the case n now closed — except in the minds of those of us who are wondering in what sort of community our children are growing up. One father was heard to express the fear that his son is away n university n used to be the other way around with the small town father worrying about the evil that might befall his son in the city

The police and the courts have served notice that this sort of thing will no longer be tolerated. Prigit-sticks have been ordered for city policemen and Magistrate Mitchell n handing out prison terms to last week s defendants warned members of their gang that that should give them a picture of what to expect.

But the police and the courts must do only so much They can maintain the laws but they cannot, alone, create true respect for law and order. For this they need the support of the public - and especially the press.

For instance, we are doubtful about how much good does a six months sentence — to any other sentence — will do the youths whose parents are already going around expressing the gang's sentiments that the police are pick-up on them. What law-abiding citizen finds the police picking on him? They've got too many things to do. Magistrate Mitchell disposed of this argument very ably when he remarked that "the police have every right and it's their duty to question any stance who continually is out of his home deemed midnight until o'clock in the morning."

Of course, we can expect a true and maybe first time disavowal of the pot of force-ones like night-sticks. This will be labelled promptly as "police brutality" - but it's up to us to stand by the police in these efforts to effect a clean-up.

And, incidentally, we might suggest that the police should feel free to ask for assistance.

Experiments and the public

EDITORIAL October 1 1964

During the past year or two, the Saskatchewan Hospital in Weyburn has been engaged in a research action program which has drawn the attention of the psychiatric profession across the nation.

The net result of the programs — which will be more comprehensively explained in an article by a hospital staff member — is that the patient population has been reduced by several hundreds. The discharged patients, whose condition is considered to have improved to a point where they are temporarily or permanently capable of getting along without hospital care, are in large in the community although still under observation by hospital staff.

This has led, inevitably to an increase in the number of former residents to which Weyburn has been host since the establishment of the Saskatchewan Hospital here some 60 years ago - but which citizens generally have accepted with good grace.

Possibly because of a lack of communications between the community and the hospital administration - a annual occurrence of sensitivity has been building up particularly in recent months over the nature and number of these incidents — or alleged incidents.

If the present program turns out to be unbeneficial to patients, is unfair to the community in both we have no doubt it will be scrapped or modified as the findings suggest.

We need not permit ourselves to be incensed upon but let's be fair in our criticism helpful by reporting conditions which may have escaped the attention of hospital authorities and the police, co-operative in helping to assess the worst of the program and let's give full marks to those who are doing their utmost to break down formidable barriers in the fight against mental illness.

Bathing

EDITORIAL December 17 1964

We were most disturbed by the attitude displayed by two to three members of city council at last week's meeting, with regard to continuing to underwrite the Weyburn Festival of the Arts to the extent of $1,000 per year.

One alderman was of the opinion that the festival was of interest to only a handful of people and another obviously sharing that view, came zealously to the defense of taxpayers money which he felt should not be used to finance "pussywillow clubs."

The entire question of government involvement beyond necessary administration and legislation is often at issue, and we too are frequently frightened by the degree to which the several governments and their agencies think for us plan for us demand from us, give us promises us and provide for us.

But within the context of existing trends and philosophies, the negative attitude toward the festival strikes us as bewildering.

In our publics year the provincial Festival of the Arts was brought to Weyburn and proved such a success that a local group decided that a regional festival would be both feasible and desirable.

A municipally sponsored arts council was established by a city bylaw last year and specifically charged with the responsibility of holding an annual arts festival. To this end city council guaranteed to underwrite the 1964 operation in a maximum of $1,000 (an amount matched by the Saskatchewan Arts Council).

Starting from "scratch," the new organization working against a demanding deadline, produced a festival which was also hailed as outstanding success.

To say that a suggested to only a handful may reflect a lack of interest on the part of some aldermen in the programs for which they and authorized funds.

The arts and crafts exhibition had 300 exhibits and entries were turned back because interest exceeded the arts council's financial capabilities. There were hundreds, and perhaps thousands of non-exhibitors who visited the exhibition.

Hundreds of people were introduced to ballet through the visit of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet a group which probably never would have come to Weyburn except for sponsorships through the arts festival. The Regina Wind Ensemble provided another treat for hundreds and attendance at several annual events such as the fall meet fair probably was increased through being tied in with the festival's promotional efforts.

Most of these things it might be added, were self-supporting, but sponsorship might have been difficult for any organization without some guarantee from a central organization. In fact the city grant can fairly be said to have been used chiefly for expenses involved in actual organization and in promotion of the festival (as wholly rather than on the subsidization of special interest projects. The fact that the council survived its first year on that limited assistance speaks well for its good sense.

Beside bringing outstanding experiences to that "handful" of several thousand Weyburn people the festival brought many visitors to Weyburn as participants and spectators earned the city more publicity throughout the province than $1 000 could ever hope to buy and provided encouragement to people in every walk of life to put increasing leisure time to creative use.

We do not believe council a obligated to guarantee an annual grant in the festival for all time to come. A year or two of experimentation may guide the arts council to some venture so profitable that it takes care of several operational and promotional costs.

But to pull the rug out from under a fledgeling, city-sponsored organization which has done so out standing a job is as unreasonable as it is baffling.

Like a glove

EDITORIAL May 28 1970

Not surprisingly the Weyburn Mineterial Association has submitted a Viewpoint" for this week a Review which is not 100 percent enthusiastic about the new industry which is coming to that city

Indeed the most hard-headed supporter of the distillery would probably find it strange I local churches held special thanksgiving services to mark the advent of a factory which will turn out a product which admittedly but dimly more harm than good throughman s flirtation with it.

The people who set on a year or so ago to bring new industry to Weyburn were not looking for a distillery in particular but for any industry which fitted our community s needs and resources This as the Ministerial Assoc ation must be aware was what was meant when it was in d that the distillery fitted Weyburn like a glove.[1] The industrial development committee and c ty council would have been equally elated if they had succeeded n bringing to Weyburn a Bible publishing house or church pew manufacturer and so say that those industries fitted Weyburn like gloves would not imply that the people of Weyburn are more pious than the people of other communities.

On Weyburn's death

EDITORIAL June 13 1974

In this space last week, we reprinted a Saskatoon Star Phoenix article by Eric O Hurt, a resident of Weyburn many years ago who expressed his dismay at the pending death of Weyburn and other Saskatchewan communities

While we would agree that fine depot facilities so Weyburn are a far cry from what the travelling public heighten roundsby expect — if the bus company hopes to tempt more of us to use this mode of transportation — we would ask Mr Hurt to take heart. f there are symptoms of death, there are also symptoms of survival

The very corner from which Mr Hurt made his glum appraisal testifies to a measure of progress, at least. Both to the optimistic years of pre-depression boom and business Hotel Block didn't use a business until the past decade, when the downtown area expanded n that direction Today the block houses a number of that estates, including a restaurant next door to the bus depot, where that travellmr can and de stop for a snack to meals

While Mr Hurt a closing sadly about the "baby stinky — the co-op store , the credit unions and the NDP" — is attributed to an Estevan source as the major cause of the flu in that city the county is such that one cannot that in that assumption is included the rest of the problem to other towns and cities mentioned

The NDP Mr Hurt might be reminded governs not only Weyburn Estevan, Melville and Watrous, but a the government of the day for all of Saskatchewan — aven Saskatoon

The co-op and the credit un on are indeed strong and thriving in Weyburn but they still leave room tha three supermarkets three chartered banks (with a fourth more than sl ghtly interested in moving in) and a host of other privately owned outlets providing competing services There are also thousands of co-op and credit un on members who will resent the insinuation that membership in these institutions brands them as soc alists

Perhaps one day other Mr Hurt's personal fortunes enable him to retu n Weyburn under circumstances that will permit him a wider vista than that afforded by a 15 minute bus stop he will discover that Weyburn of dying will be survived by schools, churches, skating rink curling rink library playgrounds swimming pool museum and many other modern facilities built since the days of Mr Hurt's gallant striving there Weybcrter Weyburn.

His efforts may not have been completely success Or somebody s

'Injured' stray dog

EDITED BY December 4, 1973

During intermission at the Weyburn Junior High School band concert last week, I was attracted to the entrance hall by an air of excitement that currently existed in unmistakably.

A group of students was clustered around a re-sibling, no-fella-zared yellow dog, stroking him gently and making comforting sounds. One of them explained that the dog had broken its leg and that a veterinarian had been called

I thought about that one and something about the whole thing didn't look right. From what I have seen of injured dogs they are more inc ined to snap even of their owners when touched rather than lie n-compla nently while n dozen strange youngsters however well-intentioned are petting him.

This dog also had n b eutiful look on his face that demanded acknowledgment with the sight of a broken leg and the shock of the accident which must have caused it.

I finally decided that it was one of the first cold nights of the winter and that the dog had come seeking warmth hopping on three legs as dogs will when their feet are cold and found sympathy beyond his dre ms and were simply basking in the warmth and tender care heaped on h m so generously by the Good Samaritans of the Junior High school

I couldn't let the matter go without testing my theory so I called Dr Nicholson and day to ask if an injured dog had been brought up h re from the junior high school the night before The dog had been brought n t night but I gathered it was the healthiest dog he had ever treated.

So I guess my theory was c lse out

But th an age where people pass by injured and dying human beings, it is good to see on young people show concern for an injured stray dog even if he is shamming

"Who has seen the wind?"

EDITED BY November 10 1977

Finally made it to the local theatre Friday night to see W.O Mitchell i n "Who has seen the wind?" It is been a long time since I've spent two hours so enjoy ably

Admittedly I'm prejudiced By the time you have lived 20 years in the town where the author lived as a boy when you have met the author personally as well as the director and some cast members are familiar with the movie s setting, and have visited the location on while filming was in progress you would have to have n chip on your shoulder not to go to the movie with the intention of enjoying it.

I and m ostly feeling of being part of it during the funeral scene, for I was in that church once less than two years ago for the funeral of a good friend of mine. He was the pall bearer f r the Arcola Sun-Standard, whose building provided the backdrop for a number of scenes.

Even the congregation and n family ar look about it, probably for the very good reason that since the scenes were Arcola people many r f them probably had attended Chris Leibel's funeral

The gopher drowning sc enes was another that brought back memories as it with the most fellows who grew up on the prairies. That penny we had looked pretty good especially n winter when you permitted yourself fantasies about how many hundreds of inch you would harvest and the delightful things you would do with the returned wealth

But summer came and w th it the realizat e of the situation you had to let near a source of water and one gopher hole could hold an awful lot of water and the canvases do have back doors Anyone who was in flush out a gopher without finding the back door and blocking it off as't go up to take many gophers I've known them to have three ex its, and there was one smart rascal on a vacant lot across the street from my the school home who and a drain lead ng into an abandoned well a few feet away We poured n ot of water down his door before he e ge out

I remember too getting sentimental about the little beasts, and grabbing one to take home and raise as a pet. My intentions were neither understood nor appreciated, and he bit my finger sharply That was the end of that notion

Another scene that brought back memories was the birthday party

I was at n party like that since

My friend was the o dest of three children in an immigrant family His mother was some dour and never went out of h d company The father was fluent in a ex ept more languages but and suffered a serious head injury n World Wa r I and was left bitter eccentric and irritable and co d hold no discretion; only to low-paying jobs offered as n kindness The family lived in a shack on a quiet wooded piece of land at the edge of town

The boy wasn t really n close friend of mine, but I won because our own economic niche on the totem pole didn't rate as nearly my instinct that I can n afford to turn any down.

We spent the afternoon running from the house to the front yard gate to gain status in the eyes and wonder f the distant figures approach ng were some of the other invited guests. They never were. No one else showed up.

When the appropriate time came we all — five family members and one guest — sat down on the blanket that had been spread under n shade tree to partake of the homemade sandwiches cookies and birthday cake so lovingly prepared. Nobody ate much and there wasn't much conversation. Tears were just below the surface.

I don't think my friend asked his mother for a birthday party again.

But back to the wake:

It may not win an Oscar, but it was and done with good acting, especially on the part of the youngster who played Brian, and anyone who is a prairie background should enjoy it — if you can put up with a few cuss words used not by every member of the cast but by a few "characters".

Endless Q, Shanty 0

EDITORIAL November 24 1977

The speaker was a man whose powers of persuasion have swayed judges and confounded opponents.

But last week in Weyburn, when he attempted to postpone the cleaning of banquet dishes he met his Waterloo: the ladies in their wisdom

"Gentlemen, you will just a few minutes until I conclose my remarks" implored the speaker

"Take a 10-minute break until we're through" was the suggestion from that kitchen.

"What's more important," countered the speaker "10 ladies washing 10 matchine or that whole auditorium?"

"We've been here since early morning and we want to clean up and go home," was the final verdict.

The speech went on and so did the noise.

Ladies in the kitchen: 1 Mr Shermanicher more.

We have every sympathy for a speaker who comes from a distance to entertain or instruct or to find himself interrupted by the dish-cleaning crew!

But let's see the point too of the ladies who make our various banquets possible. They are volunteer workers doing their bit for their organization and their community and they work at it harder than most of us suspect.

The secret to avoiding this type of collision may be scheduling.

Officer and gentleman

EDITORIAL September 15 1982

When the word "pioneer" is used in connection with Saskatchewan it evokes an image of men and women filling the soil behind oxen fighting the elements of inadequate shelters and labouring long hours to provide for their children firmhold and freedom in an emerging Canadian territory.

Such an image is apt and every town we become known as from churches throughout the province the dwindling survivors of that era are hunted out our living links with that period of time are further diminished.

Not only farmers however were required to open the province. Merchants, tradesmen and professional people were needed to make life viable for those who worked the soil the organizations and institutions which are an important part of life had to be created and developed the innovations of new technology had to be mastered and brought into service.

Those who were the prime movers in bringing these necessities to the frontier — and fought when necessary to preserve them — were also pioneers to every sense of the word.

Last week, with the passing of Harold Kempton, Weyburn and Saskatchewan lost a giant among such pioneers.

Coming to Weyburn the year before Saskatchewan became a province, Mr Kempton, with his brother established the book store that still bears their name.

A bold and daring young man, his courage in fighting fire and flood became part of Weyburn lore.

Enlisted by the flying machines that began to swing in the skies he soon became an amateur and served overseas in the Royal Flying Corps in World War I, at times without a pilot's life expectancy was a few weeks. (In the next war he was to become commanding officer of the South Saskatchewan Regiment although he was not permitted to accompany it to Dieppe.)

A few years later he became the first amateur to Saskatchewan to make a free-fall parachute jump.

In the mid-'20s intrigued by the wizardry of radio, he was involved in a quirky legal broadcast from Radio Station 4AI Kempton Bros. an outcry the authorities quickly brought to a halt.

He dedicated to public service guiding him to charter membership in the Weyburn Rotary Club, and to membership in many other organizations devoted to community betterment.

For all the daring-do of his youth Mr Kempton matured into advanced age with dignity. Those who knew him for the past few decades will remember him as a person of great honesty, dignity courtesy innovation thoughtful neat, into figures and integrity but in his eye there was always the sparkle of humor and mischief that told of the youth in his heart.

Col Kempton was a officer and a gentleman

Those sweet onions

EDITORIAL November 16 1983

A few days ago I chanced to have a lengthy and informative conversation with area pioneer Sheridan May still pretty chipper after over four score and ten years on this earth.

That is an typographical error. The gentlemen is several years past his 90th birthday and he instantly proved any Pioneer Place soon to satisfy his family that because he felt he could not look after himself

Among the reminiscences Mr May shared with me was an occasion in World War I, when he was serving with the Canadian army in Europe.

Presumably the end of the war was nearing, and rumors were flying about the maintenance of armistice.

Can I blame the boys for becoming optimistic but in the eyes of the commanding officer this attitude evidently did not make for vigilance. So he rallied the entire company parade and told the men in no uncertain terms that the war was not over and until he was notified that it was ended he was taking the attitude that "we came here to fight a war and that's what we're going to do."

The reaction of the troops was disappointment, and in essence is, some of them shout the O.C.

This didn't sit well with the O.C. so he ordered the men on a route march with full pack.

Certainly it is true when most of the men were convinced that hostilities were about at an end, this discipline did not find favor with the men and they decided that if no one showed up for the route march who was there to make them do it?

The ploy worked to the extent of cancelling the route march but of course they didn't get off scot-free. For his part in the shenanigans young May drew two weeks of confinement to barracks, with two hours of extra duty every evening before retiring.

The extra duty consisted of pushing two boxes of shovel every night.

As he told me about it, I thought Mr May was going to complain about his hard taken-pecking was on the spot. But instead with an exultant mischievous look in his eye he said "We sent lots of rations in our time but those two weeks "Then realizing that the statement was not be 1-explanatory to one who and not knows the dispensations of war he added "Choose sort of odd flavor to food you know."

Then got about the afterwards serving read more than a few novels about recent conflicts. I've read about a number of incidents where soldiers forced great satisfaction in perishing — noteworthy at considerable risk — "deliverers" which civilians back home take for granted, not as deliverers but as exploits.

But here almost 70 years after the fact, a veteran could still remember the returns as well that he could almost taste them, as they added delightful flavor to the simple monotonous food they were allotted.

Some now thing to read about treasured moments in life regardless of how seemingly unimportant but another to here and see someone in voting about decades after the fact.

Once again, there a no substitute for experience although there are a lot of experiences we can cheerfully do without.

Last Friday I imagine thousands of similar episodes and escapades were exchanged with some embroidery by veterans meeting on Remembrance Day to honor fallen comrades and to renew acquaintanceships with comrades of a youth some of them will ever forget

Are you blushing, Weyburn?

EDITORIAL January 29 1986

Two to three decades ago when Weyburn a first subdivisionist north of First Avenue N (Highway 13) were being told what many of the families moving to what was then considered the boundaries did so with the assurance that by the time the family's toddlers or at least the gleams in father's eye had reached school age they would trudge off to a facility as it could not reside for that purpose north of Douglas Road

This was back in the days when the human tendency to multiply was considered about as sure a bet as death and taxes and what on earth was considered prudent at set aside land for expanded school needs, particularly in communities with ambitions for growth.

Thus came the yet - and city fathers and the school board of the day in sheer pessimism or optimism depending on your point of view decided new schools for future generations were about as needless as blacksmith shops and livery barns. The result was that the land reserved for the school was subdivided and sold for residential consumption.

Even when Assiniboia School was demolished to make way for a supermarket there seemed to be little concern for declining enrolment (or diminished expectations) in the numerical school left ample room in the facility for the displaced Assiniboia students.

Something must be happening, ended the pill is not as effective as expected or the race's progenitive instincts are stronger than anti-pesta credited

Whichever the case the Weyburn Public School Board recently took steps toward preserving land, and, however belatedly, the construction of a new school for Weyburn's north end.

If this sort of retrogression continues we may soon begin to speak coyly again of "blessed events."

Weyburn loses a booster

EDITORIAL September 9 1987

A community must have people

A good community does have good people and strong leaders

Once in a while, a good community is stricken it truly and is given an outstanding leader one whose vision, courage, determination and energy inspire confidence, respect, support and action

Such a person was Thomas George "Tommy" Lang, former mayor of Weyburn, president and one of the founders of the Sask. Basic Broadcasting Co. Ltd (CFSL and CISL), and president of the biggest private-hauling company in Canada.

Ever a fighter for reason he believed in — his community but brashness his provision — he resisted least those on self-congratulation when one of his besties succumbed and and time on self-pity when one of them failed. He simply set new goals and priorities and went back to work

Time could be courteous or brave as the occasion demanded; he was friendly but not overwhelmingly so; he praised generously or withstood sharply depending on when produced the desired results, he drove a hard bargain but listened to the views of his adversaries, he was a keen competitor but not them to the rights of others, he was an ardent party enthusiast with an instinct for knowing when it must not mix with business nor when the interests of the two intersected.

A product of the depression, Tom might have settled in years ago in a level of success envied by most but the driving force in and demanded that he go on to greater challenges.

To the end, he was an unabashed "booster" not out of a narrow parochialism which other characterizes such people but as a world traveller who and made his own comparisons and found they supported his instinctive loyalties.

Tommy Long who died and week will be missed.

Parade of interlopers

EDITORIAL January 5 1968

Many attributes come to mind to describe the pioneers who built our community. If one allows the time to consider what faced them in the trackless wilderness and the particular spot they chose for the declaration of their lives the investments of their youngest years, the expenditures of their energy and the dedication of their progeny

A few that come to them are courage, optimism patience perseverance dependency dedication, hope stamina, love, integrity these are probably quite a few more.

If that sounds like a gallop of the fifty put yourself in their places.

You have probably seen, in past weeks or months persons on television from miserable brashness hopeand settlements in the Third World, and have asked yourself how anyone could have to face a lifetime to these living horrors.

And the answer that offered itself to your mind probably was that these people didn't know better as they and no hope for comparison — except perhaps beam years with a bit more food in the stomach.

For the most part, the majority of those who built our community knew better in the sense that they came from some part of stability and civilization where already existed most of the amenities they would have to face through first brave

So resigned those standing here on central Saskatchewan with summer heat scorching the earth with fall winds stalking the world with cheer, with winter gales and Arctic temperatures showing them Saskatchewan's permanent face, or with spring's sense of mud making a joke of cultivation, yet saying, "Here we shall form our city."

They built, and it wasn't easy

Like ourselves, they did not come naturally endowed with all the good virtues attributed to them above. Many yielded to their limitations, went back to where they came from, or pressed on to meet simpler demands that perhaps were easier.

Others remained and developed or enhanced the qualities that brought them encouragement and endowment then

All this we have inherited and as we prepare to celebrate Weyburn's 75th anniversary as a city — one of the earlier milestones of accomplishment — we humbly acknowledge that most of that our legacy is inherited

Humility is appropriate but it is not sufficient to assure our community today as to the future

The problems challenges and opportunities that the shared demand of as many of the same qualities that gave us our fairly

They exist, often dormant within us, waiting to be summoned by the same spirit that lived in our forebears and which we must also accept as our legacy

Ceremony can symbolize

EDITORIAL May 11 1968

Every ceremony is inherently symbolic, in that it involves the participant or the onlooker to look beyond what is obviously taking place and to consider it in the perspective of the past the future the nature, the greater community or whatever the event significantly touches upon

Thus when a handful of adults and a fairly large number of children gathered Friday on the banks of the Souris River near Government Road to take a significant step toward beautifying those banks and making the Tatagwa Parkway a parkway in fact as well as in name there was really more than a bit of symbolism involved.

First of all there is strong symbolism in the fact that the project ties into the landscaping of the dykes to which Weyburn has fallen heir through the long-term flood prevention program funded through federal and provincial treasuries generally regarded by most of us as more than slightly far-fetched

But rather than pouring with revulsion on this questionable inheritance, Weyburn is using the dykes to enhance the overall beautification program making in effect, a silk purse out of a sow's ear

Secondly there was an important message which the participating children may look back on when they recall that the ceremony took place during weeks so strong that they needed no bibs when everyone away

When the children grow up and ahead the memory of Friday may impress upon them that it is but only during seasons times that a progressive community as battle but that even during the weaknesses — climatic, political or economic — we must continue to build for the future and that building includes not only the functional but also the number

Meet a student

BRIEFLY September 7 1968

Highway safety campaigns constantly warn at her to become a statistic. We know what is meant of course, carelessness or even a momentary lack of caution can cost human lives. And for the world at large we are simply calculated into the cold statistics the number of fatalities for a particular day week or year

Even as we tend to think of the term as an anonymity "How we talk some we "one I remember a someone when the only life I have but ended? Surely to family friends and acquaintances I cannot become just a number!"

That's true but it isn't always the total picture Take the fatal accident that occurred several weeks ago at the hazardous intersection just west of the city We have been complaining about it for years, had pondering that sooner or later it would claim more lives

Let us suppose that the victim had been a local young woman Her death would have sent a shock wave pulsating through the community and wheels would have been set in motion that would have kept the family in a state of uncertainty for weeks.

From the minute the family learned of the death, inquiries would have radiated out to relatives and friends drawing them to the home to offer their condolences and alerting hundreds of personal plans in order to arrange possible attendance at the funeral

Former school mates would been wept in each other's arms as they shared their sorrow over the untimely and horrible death of a friend. And whenever people met and discussed the tragedy there would have been expressed bitterness about the bad intersection and as predicted, rubbed yet another notch on our community or life

Now most of these things happened but not in Weyburn They happened in the little town of Churchbridge where the victim whome was All that is except the it harrows about the intersection become people there didn't know about it, and simply wondered how it could have happened

But in Weyburn shocking as I was it was the death of a young woman from another world: a nurse, an age and a home town mentioned in news reports had a photo caption. Yes there were conversations on coffee row and elsewhere about the terrible misadventure, but they lacked the indignation that would have been triggered by personal loss We didn't know her as you see the incident upon her death, a statistic.

So meet a statistic!

Meet Shannon Fern Mary Dressler... who met her death just outside our city in the early evening of Friday August 12 less than two weeks before her 23 birthday, had who was buried a few days later in the town in which she had been born

Russell Hanchuk of Yorkton Shannon's brother-in-law sent me a copy of the order of service and obituary received by people attending the funeral service at Trinity Lutheran Church in Churchbridge

Shannon grew up on the farm by farm most and her elementary and high school education in Churchbridge, and was enrolled in the University of Saskatchewan College of Education learning to be a special education teacher Shin enjoyed work ng with children and had given much of her time to teaching Sunday School and vacation Bible school and to working at the Kinsmen Ch hdren's Centre with children experiencing communication disorders.

She was interested in music and studied organ for many years and taught at the Academy of Music in Saskatoon in her spare time.

Shannon was described as a well- liked person with quick wit, strong-willed and determined. She probably and to be strong-w lled because she was born with congenital heart defect and had to undergo open heart surgery when she was eight Her strong will helped her overcome the difficulty "and her health blossomed "

Shannon is family had friends been established in interested fund in the promoted to the Saskatchewan Music Foundation "in memory had gratitude for Shannon is life making use he by committee heart surgery

On the day of her death she had worked at Hay at her summer job at International Mineral Corporation at Esterhazy and then had left for Rockville to visit her university chum Helen Larsen recently returned from a year in France

Helen, who disturbed Shannon as her best friend, and confirmed all the good things mentioned about her said Shannon had been very excited about the year abroad had about the career she was going to pursue

Listed among the honorary pallbearers was Kirsten Jewitt whom many of our readers met last August She was the tall friendly blonde journal ism student who interned at the Review in early 1968 Kirsten said she had been surprised to see the mountains wearing bright, happy colors as the festival until the remembered that Shannon had always told her family that in the event of the death, she did not want people to attend the funeral – dark sombre colors. They remembered and honored her request.

Perhaps I have taken the whole thing a bit more personally than I might have because through sheer happenstance I was at the accident scene taking pictures as police and ambulance people worked frantically to free Shannon from the wrecked vehicle. I saw her lung badly broken and bleeding carried on a stretcher to the waiting ambulance.

See there is your statistic

Only I cannot think of her as a statistic. But as a scout friendly human being whom I could have admired, respected and grown fond of. I hope some of you now feel you know her a bit and that you too will feel indignant about the sad circumstance that she cut her life short and which now silently awaits its next almost.

By the way Shannon probably did not drive through the stop sign at the intersection without stopping as originally reported. An eyewitness driving a few hundred feet behind her told me came to a full stop then crossed when she saw a van eastbound on Highway 13 crossing from another side.

I guess neither she nor the van driver saw the approaching posse. The van made it Shannon didn't.

A fitting finish

EDITORIAL September 14 1988

It's finally over!

After two years of planning by the city's scouting committees and others, months of work and preparations feverish last almost adjustments and perhaps more than a few silent prayers, the celebrations of Weyburn's 75th anniversary as a city culminated last weekend with a birthday party that offered something for almost everyone.

There were many historical of the various events that were particularly fitting and worth comment.

It was fitting for instance that our new lieutenant-governor — the representative of our sovereign — commended to come to Weyburn to make her first official public address since her installation last week.

It was particularly fitting that in view of her annual commitment to working for the betterment of children her address was to hundreds of Weyburn school children gathered in Jubilee Park and that in her remarks she reminded them that they too might aspire to the highest offices of the province and the nation. Her reminiscences about seeing King George VI and Queen Elizabeth in Melville during their 1939 visit to Canada reminded almost all of us whose memory goes back half a century of being trucked off to the nearest centre where it was possible for us to get a glimpse of the royal couple.

While on the subject of Her Honor it bears mentioning that she seems to be not only a fitting if not representative of the crown, but will serve as a fitting representative to Saskatchewan people for the foreseeable half of the population for the thousands of people of Ukrainian origin who have given so much to our heritage in every possible area of activity and achievement and for the Saskatchewan scientific community whose contributions to our nation have been substantial.

It was also fitting that the survivors of the FH/CS Weyburn hold their reunion in our city over the weekend. No minds during the war many of the airmen received some day to visit the small city after which their ship was named, but sure y most Weyburn people hoped some day to meet the heroes who represented us so directly in taking up our quarrel with the foe.

By the time the war ended, however everyone's first thoughts were of a return to peace and normalcy and there was little contact between city and crew until several years ago.

The 12 survivors and their wives brought us a human dimension of history and it is to be hoped that they also left with new affection for their adopted and adoptive city.

It was fitting that the Ormsbee Singers whose honored excellence in making them a legend in their own time took center of the anniversary banquet through the decades with costumes, dancing and especially song.

It was fitting that our represented zoom were remembered with the old time harvesting thanksgivings in the Rev Medonell home; that our religious heritage was observed with special services for all at Knox Presbyterian Church that the performance of the Canadian Armed Forces stage band reminded us of the warm and friendly relationship that one exits in a democracy between military and civilians.

It was fitting that the afternoon tea at the Legion supplemented the importance of simple informal relationships and customs in our community life.

It was fitting that the Young Fellows Club, a product of our city and the contributor of so much behind a better Weyburn, made its presence felt both in the sponsorship of the anniversary ball and in serving at the dinner.

All in all, the event was a fitting finish to a wonderful summer of celebration.

The birthday party

BY ANDREWS September 9, 1958

It was my honour and privilege to address Weyburn's official 75th birthday party. I include my remarks herein because I sense that in them I caught something of what I feel about the community in which we have spent the better part of our lives.

Your Honour Mayhew Lieutenant-Governor etc

I am sure that I need privileged to be able to say a few words on this important occasion in the history of the community most of us fondly call home. Admittedly there have been times for all of us, such as when the sky was grey with dust or the grasshoppers ornamented underfoot when the refreshening became a bit strained but genuine affection is not built upon good experiences alone

Mayor Shields asked me to say a few words about the history of Weyburn and I said to ask myself where does it start and how does one condense into a few minutes something about which volumes have already been written?

Since the community was only settled around the turn of the century and received its name about that time that seems to be the logical place to begin If you want antecedents about dinosaurs covering up on the slopes of South Hill or tales of what the natives were doing when the waist of Assiniboine came tumbling down you might contact James Minchour

Much of what is usually called history Weyburn shares with other prairie communities settlers came in live here they and their descendants saw bumper years and hard times the railways came two world wars were fought depression and drought were endured and were well schools and hospitals and churches and clubs and parks and libraries were built and the technology and prosperity of the past four decades changed all our lives

That just about sums it up, doesn't it?

Without demeaning the many facilities we are so proud of I suggest that I we take the same description subtract a mental hospital — or am I crooked care fully — and add a coal mine and power generating station, we might as well be talking about Estevan — heaven forbid!

So, however profound the influence of national and regional events on ourselves and our communities there have to be other powerful ingredients else our communities would be as alike as peas in a pod and the very notion of that a difference to most of us.

Then what is the difference?

Tommy Lang, who left us just one year ago and who was the dynamic mayor of our city of several terms and generally recognized as an unabashed Weyburn booster was fond of saying that people make the difference

One thing that sets Weyburn apart from most Canadian and even Saskatchewan communities is its fundamental racial cultural national or religious mixture, in whatever you prefer to call it

Pierre Trudeau when he was prime minister of Canada used to talk about the Canadian mosaic and indeed you don't have to travel far in most directions before you encounter the pattern of communities with distinct ethnic flavors Belgian French German Scandinavian Polish British Rumanian, Hungarian and so on Individual ist al groups even divided into separate communities based on religious differences.

Weyburn a earliest settlers however were a group of farmers from the main line settlements around Indian Head where, presumably homesteading was still becoming scarce. They were soon followed by fairly heavy migrations of Ontario families — especially from Grey and Bruce counties — and joined just after the turn of the century by hundreds of settlers from the United States

It was probably the racial-cultural mixture of these Americans and certain Canadians and set the tone for Weyburn a make-up, and as immigrants came here from Europe and elsewhere and from ethnically identifiable communities throughout the Southeast one or y never seems to have been divided into ethnic or studies Instead it has been the type of melting pot usually identified with the U S

Even the French-Canadian contribution fundamental to Canada seems to be most conspicuous in Weyburn through its absence If you check the telephone book or city directory you may be surprised by the generous sprinkling of French names. Yet if there is an identifiable French-Canadian community in Weyburn I've never been aware of it Whether this a good or sad story depend on your own individual ideal toward bilingualism and bicultural ism, but regardless of that, that is how things are

But even if we take it as a given that Weyburn a ethnic mix somehow makes it different I the town what really makes it special is the individual people who have l ved here and whose character and nature have become a part of our legacy

Let's just remember for several minutes almost a few known to most of us, at least by reputation I make no attempt to name them in any particular order

Remember Ed Cugnet?

By now there are many of us who never knew the man, but there are very few here who have not heard of Ed Cugnet a famous weather forecaster.

Whether he got the formula from a prairie chief or a Hungarian priest has become a bit murky over the decades, but it is generally accepted that by studying the weather and when several phenomenon in certain

12-day period in December he was able to forecast the weather month by month for the following year

How right were his predictions?

Some people swore by them and planned their crops accordingly but most there are even people who believe Environment Canada. Manz importantly people throughout southern Saskatchewan awaited the forecast every year and they became as important part of Weyburn lore. Revived them, and Weyburn is southern Consider Joe Warren, a former Weyburn mayor and a retired personality by about whom enough material could be collected to fill a book.

We arrived in Weyburn after Mr Warren a time but ten years later visiting Canadian Armed forces in Germany I was sought out by a Canadian general who had learned there was someone from Weyburn in our group.

His purpose? He just wanted to hear stories about Joe Warren

A friend of his had been a commanding officer of the Royal Air Force training school in Weyburn and the Canadian had heard so much about Mayor Joe Warren that he wanted to meet someone who knew Joe Warren met could tell him more. He was quite disappointed there I told him I had never known Mr Warren

Imagine! This was more than ten years after Joe Warren a death and more than twenty years after the RAF officer had been stationed in Weyburn.

Of the many Warren anecdotes I have much a favorite of mine was told me by the late Lloyd Shrigley for many years our city engineer. Lloyd was I ving in Yorkton and and applied for the advertised Weyburn position.

He was telephoned by Mayor Warren who brusquely commanded Lloyd to present himself in the lobby of the Hotel Saskatchewan at a certain time for an interview. All the way to Regina Lloyd worried about how they would know each other. When he arrived at the Saskatchewan he found the lobby crowded with people and this did nothing for his peace of mind. Naturally he had arrived early so he had many minutes to wait to this his fingernails had nearly everyone in the lobby wondering if it was Joe Warren.

At last appointed hour no imposing figure shouted the hotel strode to the centre of the lobby and shouted at the top of his voice

"SHAAAAAAK?"

So you see there was really no problem at all

Would Weyburn really have been the same place if there had never been a Joe Warren?

Only half a year after Weyburn's inaugural ceremonies there was born to the wife of Weyburn a pioneer druggist, a son William, now known internationally for his radio series "Jake and the Kid " had for many humorous television shorted plays and novels

Many of his stories have rural Saskatchewan settings, humorously but sympathetically portrayed. In these literary works, the name "Weyburn" does not appear but it has always been accepted that the "Crocus of Jake and the Kid" represents Weyburn had certainly any Weyburn resident who reads How I Spent My Summer Holidays feels very much at home in the 1930s setting of a little Saskatchewan community near the headwaters of a small river flowing by a mental hospital

If you set W O D tchell fans anywhere in Canada, just you are from Weyburn they accept you as being from Cronus Saskatchewan or the other little towns of his Saskatchewan-based tales

Thus however the detail s have been altered Weyburn surely served as the inspiration for the fictional town, and as fictions drew from Weyburn as also the and city drew from the fictional one had in thousands of minds one is inseparable from the other

It it seems not so why would we have celebrated Crocus Days in June had it years gone by? Certainly not because we thought W D was wrong about North Battleford.

Would Weyburn be the same if there had never been a W O Mitchell inspired by the sloopy town and the characters of his oft libbed, and who preserved these memories and garnished was for countless others? I think not

And then there was the Idaho Kid.

Was he real and did he ever shoot up the Waverley Hotel?

The story has been told so many times that we almply have to believe it And anyway who wouldn it want to

According to Isabelle Eaglesham a version in "The Night the Cat Froze in the Oven " the drunken gunman shot holes in the ceiling of the hotel s barroom, frozen into a shock several citizens had announced that he was taking over the town. Can't you just see him?

A leading citizen suggested that the mayor know the man since Constable Larry Lunt of the North West Mounted Pol ce was away in Halbrite

"Why should I?" asked the mayor

"Because it s your duty as chief magistrate had I can show you the act where it says so "

"Oh no you won't," replied the mayor "because I won't look"

Mayor Sheldon you are heir to proud tradition!

Anyway someone went Constable Lunt who flagged down a freight, came had arrested the Idaho Kid and locked him up in a room at the Royal Hotel

It has been said the Idaho Kid settled down and took out a homestead and that his descendants live here still. I know it I hear them tearing up had down our street all more every night

But regardless of whom truth ends in the story of the Idahs Kid and where fiction begins Weyburn wouldn't be the same. That arrogant Yankee hadn't invaded the town, or the soul matter of Constable Lute and not lived up to Moosnic tradition by calmly stepping in to get his man.

Tommy Douglas.

If I just have enough to be told much about the young Scottish Baptist clergyman who arrived in Weyburn in the early 1930s...saw his adversary in the political arena and swore on to become First the Member of Parliament for Weyburn, then Premier of Saskatchewan for almost two decades — and representing our riding — and finally Leader of the New Democratic Party in the House of Commons. Always tall, he was a pioneer of broad reform in our province and in our nation.

When we came to Weyburn, T.C. was and premier of the province, and it was not at all uncommon to see him in town, because every announcement with a special celebration would invite Tommy to be the guest speaker. He obliged whenever he could, and being a masterful orator with a sharp wit, he was more entertaining than any professional performer who might have been brought in.

When Tommy told his story about the fat and and the skinny cats you could see in your mind's eye those nasty fatties I eating the cream off their whiskers and growing fatter and fatter while the poor lean cats looked on sadly — and still kept stealing the smidgens to Ottawa.

Historians may regard T.C. s few years in Weyburn or as non-pertinent interludes, a casual stepping-stone on his march to history.

But he accepted a pastorate in the city of Winnipeg, for instance, or is a small village, or one he came to Weyburn 10 years earlier or 10 years later, or had he come when he did, but to a suburban area, a cake-man, I doubt if the same Tommy Douglas would have emerged.

It was in the early 1930s that drought, a world depression and 20th century agronomics collided, and where but in a small prairie agricultural city would a person get an understanding of the consequences to mankind blue and white collar workers small business and even the bobos who rode the rods throughout the nation? And, who but a sympathetic clergyman would have been supposed to all of them?

And if it is fair to say that T.C. Douglas would not have been the same person without his sojourn in Weyburn, it follows and Weyburn would not be the same place and Tommy Douglas not ministered here and represented none Ottawa and Regina.

I have to confess that would be true. I was not among the faithful but I strongly believe that if he were living today I would be one of his ardent supporters.

At least I think so.

You see, I have it on the best authority that if Tommy Douglas were alive today he would be a member of another political party. (Tory Premier Grant Devine had been saying publicly that a zone would Douglas would most likely be a Progressive Conservative.)

Who in Weyburn hasn't known — or at least heard of — Sadie Bowerman?

Hundreds more I fully otherwise of Weyburn children, over a number of decades, learned respect for education and fear of the Lord under the guidance of Sadie.

By the time our own family was proclaimed through the system, Miss Bowerman was officially retired, but I remember at least one time when one of our lads stud, barely holding a mark that the class would be having a substitute teacher and day I would tell they were expecting a ball.

After school the child came in with a sort of dazed expression and said in a tone of reverence "We and a substitute teacher. It was Miss Bowerman. She knows what she a talking about."

Although I didn't go to school in Weyburn, I see had the benefit of some residing from her.

I and been in Weyburn for perhaps a week or two when a woman neighbor into my office waved and would a copy of the Review under my nose and declared, "Young man, McGill is way in an old Weyburn sense and if you expect to run a newspaper in this community you had better learn to spell it.

I and and Sadie McGillivray Bowerman

I never Sadie and I can spe I McGillivray — forwards backwards, sideway and upside-down. If I seem it in French or German or Spanish, I would run across up with any of those across or certain those in containers. I would write it or you might me and or God intended.

Would Weyburn be the same place. I we and seem and the benefit of the guidance of Sadie Bowerman?

And remember Bill Montgomery?

Bill was a machinist turned successful a dentist and his combination of mechanical genius and homespun common sense helped many a pensioner of a friend. He also set and built a few in spirited souls.

Bill could fix anything mechanical even if it meant fashioning a new part, and it was not unusual for a harvesting farmer to interrupt Bill's Saturday night card game to get his help.

The story is told and on one occasion Bill made a new part and the customer felt the price was a mas high. "No charge" announced Bill and tossed the part into the Souris

On another occasion, if in and, Bill welded a part and the customer complained and 25 cents was put in such to pay "No problem" said Bill took a sledgehammer to the part and removed it to the smith town in which he and recovered it.

Once many years ago, I went to Standard Garage to sake photos of some used cars for an ad. Bill took me across Third Street to the used car lot and held me back when I failed to see a Ride Savings car hurtling down on us.

"Careful," he cautioned. "That guy looks like he wouldn't bother stopping for us. It's sort of a disgrace to get killed by one of those little buggers."

Bill liked a gag now and then, and I understand that when he was confined to hospital he was even allowed to bring in a hockey. I have heard he got special dispensation from the pope. Yes, I know Bill was Anglican but if he wanted something badly things got ecumenical in a heck of a big hurry.

Bill too has a representative become part of the fabric of Weyburn.

People individuals that's what it's all about isn't it?

When you feel nostalgia about or affection for our community you grow thinking of buildings or streets or businesses but it's individuals who and in influence on our city or on your personal lives.

I've mentioned just a few of the many people on my list. I haven't even touched on hundreds of heroes such as the HMCS Weyburn crewmen, our town Weyburn boys who fought our battle in two major wars, and countless others who made tremendous decisions to do important things to make ours a better city in a better province, nation and world. They are all our legacy and our history.

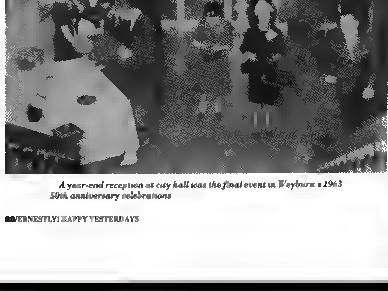
You each have your own list of individuals who represent Weyburn to you and without whom Weyburn would be diminished. Each list is different and I am certain that each one of you here is on someone else's list — perhaps on many — as a vital part of Weyburn.

But these lists must be preserved and updated for while some individuals have become a part of ecumenical history, the memory of many, unfortunately fades as those who remember them pass from the scene.

And this is our challenge as the years ahead to continue to develop individuals — through our homes and schools and churches and organizations through the freedoms and principles we safeguard and embrace, and through encouragement and example.

If we succeed in this many other good things will happen for Weyburn and when people of our city forgather 25, 50 or 75 years from now as we do today, perhaps someone will say about your children or grandchildren or of mine, "Weyburn just wouldn't be Weyburn if it were not for them."

Ladies and gentlemen I would like you to rise now and join me in a toast to our wonderful city and the people who built it and made it what it is today.



A year-end reception at city hall was the final event in Weyburn's 1963 50th anniversary celebrations

3. Politics, drought and curling

The 'most Canadian' province

The community is not conceived and grown in a vacuum. The influences — human and other — that contribute to a city's or town's development and which in turn rely on its central resources and services, radiate outward from and converge inward toward the lines that define corporate limits.

Similarly reciprocal influences exist between the collections of communities and districts that constitute the greater divisions, the provinces and territories of our nation. In Weyburn's case Saskatchewan.

So let us take a look at this Saskatchewan as we found it, or as we perceived it to be when we found it.

In truth Irene and I came not joyously into an adopted province. Both of us the youngest of immigrant families which had settled in Saskatchewan in the 1920s and had been compelled through personal or economic circumstances to move to Manitoba, we both had learned at mother's knee, and almost in the same breath, the horrors of the Russian Revolution and the climatic and environmental hostility of Saskatchewan.

As for most Canadians of our mother's years, mention of Saskatchewan evoked three images: monotonous prairie with unkind weather patterns, the Dirty Thirties of drought and depression, and hatred of North American socialism, not so much in the image of Tommy Douglas but as embraced by the pugnacious rhetoric of the Regina Manifesto. Accordingly, when early in marriage we set our sights on acquiring a weekly newspaper we agreed to follow our inclinations wherever in Canada opportunity might take us — except Quebec or Saskatchewan. Quebec of course was ebuttied because of language, and Saskatchewan because of the prejudices we had grown up with and which had been further fed by general Canadian prejudices.

Frank Mountjoy, a fellow employee of mine at Moore Business Forms in Toronto, probably capsulized our own opinion and one prevalent in postwar Canada when he told me that in the army if a man said he was from Saskatchewan it was usual to ask him whether his parents were bohunks or worked on the railway. Aside from an assured pay cheque issued somewhere in the east, there was obviously no incentive or excuse for anyone to live in Saskatchewan, except if one happened to be a ragged-penniless bohunk — the term, in this case embracing any European not of British or French origin.

Those then were the prejudices we had to overcome in shopping to make a pile of our modest winnings and risking them at one turn of pitch and toss. Heaven help us in Saskatchewan.

Arriving here we were quickly disabused of our patronizing opinion of what we remembered the ragamuffin member of the Canadian family of provinces. We smiled and still slightly wary, yet but also proud independent politically sophisticated and assertive and referring in itself part jocularly part wistfully but also with unshakeable confidence in itself as "New Ivor Country."

The Saskatchewan we have come to appreciate finally ruminatingly and even jealously was recently described by Dr. John H. Archer, O.C., as "the most Canadian of the provinces." This was an opinion I had formed myself but which gained provenance coming from this noted Saskatchewan resident historian archivist, agriculturalist and humorist.

In describing the Saskatchewan we found I rely partly on opinions drawn on years of exposure to Saskatchewan born as revealed by its natives and as gleaned from history recorded in Saskatchewan wackiles and elsewhere but also as guided, confirmed, redirected and clarified by Dr. Archer in his introduction to a seminar moderated by him a year or two ago at a convention of the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association.

Some of the assessments here contained are my own conclusions confirmed by Dr. Archer and which I might have similarly articulated myself were I not already preempted by his scholarly and lucid interpretations, and others are insights that lean entirely on his studies and summation, although confirmed by everything I have seen, heard or read.

I have used italics to identify sentences or phrases taken with permission directly from Dr. Archer's remarks but this does not exempt others from reliance on his findings. The reader would probably be safe in concluding that any error in fact or opinion is mine while scholarly insights are hers confessed by him.

The stock for the brew that makes Saskatchewan singularly Canadian was the early waves of immigration from Ontario and the United States and to a lesser degree Quebec. These people were both schooled and steeped in the principles and practices of democracy and self-government. They brought with them knowledge of the parliamentary process. Many were social reformers seeking to found a new and better society based on the old ways cleansed and purified in the untrammelness of the new.

If anything, they found Ottawa a distant overlordship foreign and offensive, and their approach to politics was confident and assertive in contrast with the apologetic entry into politics of people unfamiliar with the democratic process.

While soon roughly half of Saskatchewan a people were of origins other than British or French many of these had their roots in provinces remote from central government in their native countries and where authority tended as is perceived as protection of privilege and the status quo rather than as an agency for the enactment and administration of just laws. "Caesar" to them was the power which taxed their meagre incomes punished and deterred any independent initiatives and took their sons to fight in distant, meaningless wars. For them it was prudent to live as invisibly as possible on their isolated islands and archipelagos.

Their children and grandchildren however saw the elephant of democracy from the perspective of Saskatchewan usage and assertiveness came to them naturally further consolidating the provincial trend.

Overseen by the North West Mounted Police early settlement of Saskatchewan was peaceful and orderly, not characterized by the Wild West excesses of the westward migration in the United States. Settlers came into a region wherein the basics of law, survey, homestead grants and projected rail lines were known.

Peaceful and orderly and without the excesses of the United States? Undoubtedly as it was remembered by most pioneers of the Canadian prairie provinces but while the early settlers were digging in and establishing the ways of the east on the new frontier, the indigenous people — Indians and Metis — were making a desperate attempt to seek redress for wrongs inflicted upon them by the encroaching Europeans.

Manitoba-born Louis Riel who several years earlier had presided over a defiant provisional government in that province came to northern Saskatchewan and assisted in the initiation of hostilities in what was to become known as the North West Rebellion of 1885, and which wrote names like Frog Lake and Batoche into Saskatchewan and Canadian history.

Today Riel, who was hanged in Regina after being convicted of treason is widely regarded as a martyr. Yet the Royal Canadian Mounted Police successors to the North West Mounted Police mobilized to put down the rebellion still walk tall in the eyes of most Canadians particularly Saskatchewan people who saw their fine performance as peace-keepers and dispensers of frontier justice in the pioneer era. The Saskatchewan need has been difficulty with these somewhat anomalous conditions. It is still fair to say in any case that for most settlers of Saskatchewan the process was peaceful and orderly to an extent that even today seems unbelievable.

In 1966 the Review proudly printed a diary never before published written by Staff Sergeant Walter Hamilton of the NWMP who chronicled the rare Canadian adventure in this province from the time of his enlistment in Ontario to the day of his discharge in Toronto after the conclusion of hostilities. The rare manuscript was lent to the Review by a grandson of the sergeant from Edson, Alberta, then a student attending Western Christian College in North Weyburn.

The steamer Northcote one of several river boats deployed on the South Saskatchewan River in combatting the Riel Rebellion. The sketch was part of the Batoche Journal printed in the Review in 1966.

The agricultural character of Saskatchewan settlement also bored natural rural instincts of neighborliness and co-operation. One settler could not fight a prairie fire by himself — a community could. And neighbors together could build a farm, form a beef ring, set up a rural telephone company. Working together for mutual betterment, they also viewed school boards and municipal councils as a personal delegation of voice and authority to do through an elected body what was too distant to be done personally unlike the residents of the cities of the east who often saw even local government as an unbridge or even downright hostile "they" In the same sense the provincial government was seen as a not-so-distant extension of local council powers

Drawn to the west and its thousands of eligible and potentially successful bachelors female teachers added their own noticeable influences on the developing society As they married and became mothers, they added sophistication tradition and culture to homes that might in lacking these have impeded social development As a result it is not surprising that Saskatchewan was among the leaders in fostering militant women's organizations, and one of the first provinces to grant the franchise to women.

While many aspects of the Saskatchewan mould-as-came thrust are credited to the CCF and NDP governments the basic Saskatchewan character seems to have been reflected even in the 1920s by government activity in areas not then considered the traditional responsibility of government. Underneath it all was a developing sense of responsibility for the unfortunate the rejected the needy Such people as Matt Anderson encouraged, indeed brought about a system of municipal health. Concern over T.B epidemic diseases child mortality brought an emphasis on construction of hospitals training of nurses and provision of doctor care

Saskatchewan was Canada s fastest growing province and probably the most promising in terms of potential prosperity and the good life when it was all brought to a screeching halt by the great depression and the decade-long drought that compounded the misery of that era in Saskatchewan

The reaction to this major setback probably says something too about the makeup of Saskatchewan s population that those to stay through this numbing decade or had an inherent

Throughout history regions have suffered severe reversals and their people accepted these without picking up and leaving for other parts Home humble though it may be, seems sacrosanct in times of adversity The people of Saskatchewan of the early 1930s, however except for the young, were the same people who had settled the province They had memories of other regions that represented home to them and by the thousands they went back to places of their origins the United States Ontario or Manitoba, or went west to British Columbia. Of those who remained then, and they were the majority many must have had confidence that good times would return

Many had no real choice but they had alternatives to entertain For most of the thousands of European settlers then living here there were often harsh political economic reasons or both that ruled out s return Even for the Anglo-Canadian American population in truth alternatives were limited as economic conditions elsewhere in the country were not inviting. What this left here was a people who had witnessed at their own firsthand the rigors of pioneering the high of boom times and the shattering losses of the 1930s. They made the decision to stay and this had to make a difference in their collective character

The war brought both an end to drought and an injection of revenue as all grain grown was absorbed by the war effort. The British Commonwealth Air Training Plan brought flying schools to numerous Saskatchewan communities and this also injected dollars

Even as times slowly improved, Saskatchewan people were not quick to forgive the perceived eastern cabal of railways banks mortgage companies, line elevators and machinery manufacturers they blamed for many of the ills of the depression Add to this the siren song of Tommy Douglas and his vision of a New Jerusalem here in Saskatchewan and it is not altogether surprising that in 1944 voters here shocked the nation and elected the first Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF) government as a way that made its opponents despair of ever removing it from office. Even tweaks such as upgrading of highways, common throughout the nation by then, were here seen — not without encouragement — as products of socialist policy. It was not uncommon to hear a rank-and-file government supporter speak fervently at a political meeting of the day when all Canadians might enjoy such benefits of CCF imagination and achievement in rural electrification.

Innovative legislation a concept neither foreign nor unwelcome to Saskatchewan voters, honest government the Douglas charisma and postwar prosperity combined to entrench the CCF

By the time we arrived, and particularly as the years immediately following, there were signs that the intense almost religious loyalties were suffering some strain. Fears about Medicare and the departure of Premier T.C. Douglas to lead the CCF's successor, the New Democratic Party (NDP) at the national level set the stage for the first defeat of the party by Ross Thatcher's Liberals.

Also a contributor to voter-alienation in some educated quarters, was the government's initiative toward creation of the county system. The larger municipal units envisioned made enemies of hundreds of officials of the rural municipalities as danger of dissolution and these rural mandarins, some say, helped bring about the 1964 defeat of the CCF. So when that rascally maverick-Socialist-turned-Liberal Ross Thatcher swept through the hustings and exhorted listeners to join him in ranting "that old Liberal song This Land is Your Land" (long accepted as a CCF hymn in Saskatchewan) what could they do but sing it lustily and say like Ado Annie in "Oklahoma", "I couldn't say no!"?

Since then the province has gone to alternate NDP administrations and governments by the traditional parties with the provincial economy probably playing a greater role in the fortunes of incumbent governments than their political flavors.

In 1958 although oil had been discovered and was pumping millions into the Saskatchewan economy, development of the province's vast potash deposits was hoped to do for Saskatchewan what oil had done for Alberta. A decade in more of reasonably good crops had restored a degree of confidence yet the Saskatchewan personality was still out of optimism restrained by great caution. I compare it to a lad who has been given a treat to compensate for a severe thrashing: it may taste ever so good but it does not purge the sting from the postscript nor the moral lesson from the consciousness.

For agriculturalists and those who depended upon them, the future had to be evaluated in terms of a new set of rules dearly learned in the 1930s. Pioneers who had come here and applied traditional approaches, and their sons, had to evaluate the future of their industry under rules not recognized in time that the traditional half section could not be looked to as a viable economic unit nor a mechanized world, that light soils and high winds must be seriously considered in land management, and livability itself must be evaluated against the probable drought cycles of the future.

Like the rest of the world Saskatchewan has changed over the three decades of our life here but looking backwards what dominates is the constant fluctuation of economic, climatic and political cycles, and the constants of the rural nature of the province. These and cursing mark the unique and singular nature of Saskatchewan.

The following reprints purport only to offer a glimpse of the Saskatchewan of our times.

Definitions

EDITORIAL February 22 1961

Since the verbal duel in the Saskatchewan legislature between Premier T.C. Douglas and Opposition leader Ross Thatcher we have wondered how many Friends the latter made for himself and for his party with the statement attributed to him in the daily press, that a socialist is a person who has lost all hope of becoming a capitalist.

Despite being an insult to many CCF supporters who have both the ability and the means to die as well or under for themselves under the free enterprise system, Mr Thatcher's statement, by implication ridicules millions of people in the free world who have no hope or desire to become capitalists but who believe unswervingly in the free enterprise system and what it offers to every class in our society.

Mr Thatcher's statement might almost be classified as self-incriminate, for should he continued to mean he was a socialist only so long as he saw for himself a role as leader of the movement and when the dream faded, or when he saw an opportunity for personal gain with another party he conveniently switched politics.

No Mr Thatcher we submit that the majority of the Canadian people reject elements without entertaining any real hope of becoming capitalists.

They are amply convinced that the free enterprise system offers better opportunity for all through permitting the individual a maximum of freedom to achieve whatever may represent success to him.

They do not even disagree necessarily with the convinced that someone socialist hopes to achieve for all, the they without most people can achieve these things for themselves in and course by setting a goal and striving to reach it.

In other words, they believe they will travel faster and further by walking, than by sitting still and watching for free ride and may never come. and workmanlike regarding as common the fortunate few who pass them on bicycles, they regard them as pace-setters and semi-labourers who will show the way to greater progress.

In fairness to Mr Thatcher his address, as the whole was in this same vein but leaders of partners supporting free enterprise should refrain from making statements which appear to give sentiment to the elements promoting class-hatred.

Death of the iron horse

EDITORIAL April 21 1961

Less than a century ago, the westward probe of steel told the story of the gave sentiment of Canada's west. Nowhere else in the world is the history of a people so closely linked with the miracle of the 19th century. the iron horse

Villages, towns had cities on the Canadian prairie sprung up in the path of the rolling had with everlonliness had there only Towns and were missed by the rar way because of a change of plans by the railway or because of a wrong guess by the settlers. died as quickly as they had grown.

To be designated as a railway centre was a community apparanse for a bright future And few sentiment would have cared to take a chance on a community unless the coming of the railway without removed.

How times have changed!

Last week, the announcement by the Board of Transport Commissioners and discontinuation of passenger services on the Sear Line had been approved had few people cheering their fingernails

Perhaps the reasons for both the discontinuation had public apathy is related to the news story of the week— the Russian man in space. For it is not surprising that a railway line is unable to attract travellers when a man circles the globe in an hour and 48 seconds by offering the same standard of services that existed years before airplanes had been invented.

However, the base for argument is past. The iron horse as a means of travel, is dead. We can only salute he mourner be grateful for the beginning it gave and that its passing does not mean our end, as it might have 50 years ago.

Rebuttal

EDITORIAL November 16, 1961

In our issue, a Letter to the Editor from Mr Cecil T Bailey of Weyburn when the Review to had for last week's editorial at politics in municipal government.

While Mr Bailey's views on the subject are ably intelligently and logically presented, the Review finds itself unable to withdraw substantially from the position taken to the editorial in question

The argument on semantics in Mr Bailey s first paragraph is not well taken. Today's usage of the word "politics" obviously has no basis to do with the Greek origin of the word as October 31 Shakespeare have to do with the meaning of "Hallowe'en." We submit that when we used the term "party politics," every reader knew precisely what we meant, even if he didn't know Greek from interferment

As for "tacitly accepting as a good thing" party politics to a higher level we simply accept as a necessary evil a situation which leaves much to be desired

The only change we might have wished to those in the final paragraph is to qualify out "it appears to emanate from nothing more nor less than an insatiable greed for power

While political parties at the grass roots level of government might be justified (if unlikely) as spontaneous movements originating from municipal problems, this does not justify downward organization from the provincial level which we can see no benefitting only the party and not the local government, furthermore we fail to see how the "left" and "right" principles apply on the municipal level although we confess to some apprehension at the thought

Mr Bailey suggests our editorial did a disservice to "honest men who would serve their communities within the framework of their political beliefs. We simply do not acknowledge and there is any need for these political beliefs to cause any many municipal issues had when there is them still is no need for any label — not even "independent."

"The investing public"

EDITORIAL November 30 1961

Last Thursday Premier Woodrow S Lloyd foster his first Weyburn appearance since assuming leadership of the government in and province. When he spoke at a political banquet to support CCF-NDP candidate Dean Rennie

It must be conceded that even in a constituency represented for 17 years by Premier T.C Douglas and opposed an countless occasions to the eloquence,

Premier Lloyd acquired himself well. While Mr. Lloyd backed the evangelistic zeal of Mr. Douglas (which was heightening to some fairly thin sayings) his evangelical restraint delivery built a favourable impression on most who heard him.

In fact, Mr. Lloyd was so frank that intentionally or accidentally he neglected to use any of the noises (whether whimsical or referring to matters financial) or

Raising an incident which concerned neither Premier Douglas and he had made a trip to Toronto to sell a recent issue of Province of Saskatchewan bonds, Premier Lloyd referred to the prospective purchasers as "representatives of the investing public."

This indeed, is what they are. Thousands of Canadian working people, business people and professional people entrust their savings into investments which enable industry and government to finance their capital expenditures — to the benefit of both the investor and the borrower.

In between the two there is another group which represents the interests of those thousands of actual investors, and sees to it that they receive a fair return for the money they are investing to the care of others. These men depend on one a norm of view may be called either "Hunt-hearted Hay St. money-changers" or "representatives of the investing public."

For our part, we prefer the latter expression, and are grateful to see this term used by the premier of our province. Perhaps it is used only when the opinions in question are buying Saskatchewan bonds and merits support to be named, but it helps to know that Mr. Lloyd and his colleagues know in their hearts what the facts are

Keep our doctors!

EDITORIAL July 12 1962

Saskatchewan is now into its second week without the normal services of the medical profession and it is an understatement to say that antipathy and tensions are steadily mounting.

Anything at any time may produce a crisis for which the people of the province might have to pay for many years to come.

As perhaps never before in our province's brief existence public opinion is reflected in the editorials of the nation's newspapers is much more divided on the doctors' stand than it is here. Perhaps the medicare legislation looks less poisonous to people who are not ruled by a government dedicated to the destruction of our democratic system.

While then action is described as a strike — and we contend that this word best describes the situation — there are still a few outstanding differences. Not the least of these is the fact that any individual doctor still has the right to work under the plan if he chooses to do so, without fear of disciplines from his association. We would hold that any disciplinary action taken against a doctor for exercising this right would be fundamentally wrong.

It must be remembered, as well, that at no time have the doctors refused to render services under the conditions which have proved satisfactory to patients and the profession for many many years and they stressed simple warning that they intended to take the stand they are now taking. It was the provincial government which refused to send the handwriting on the wall or to recognize that until Canada becomes a police state, certain fundamental rights exist which if ever denied by a large enough or strong enough section of society have the effect of nullifying despotic legislation without breaking the law.

The medicare premiums as charged by some of dissenting its patients. Does this charge then not hold equally true for the many critical who feel justified in expression in Jess Carson or Fiske at countries often desperately short of medical practitioners? And does it not apply to the doctors whom the government of Saskatchewan is recruiting from doctor-poor Commonwealth countries with offers of higher wages?

The fact of the matter is that for centuries another have been serving the public regardless of war political and economic or other unrest, and it seems a shock to all that they chose to reverse their traditional stands on a point of principle.

Perhaps the doctors' wisdom in taking this course is open to question — but despite to a large extent on your point of view — but the fact remains that they did it for something they believed in and at greater sacrifice than most of us can ever realize.

The only possible solution at the time and is to remove the cond i ons wh ch have forced heli doc ation restore normal medical services " the prov nce, and provide the quiet negotiation of c flonstructive in an atmosphere free fraught with threa and counterthreat, and so shall the hope born of pol tical expediency.

Railines

EDITORIAL February 6 1964

Considering the important role played by the railways in developing the Canadian prairies only half a century ago, it is strange how apathetic most of us are to the rai l ne abandonment plans of the CNR and CPR. Provincial governments of the three pra ne prov inces and many of our representatives at the municipal level are deeply concerned but by and large, the rest of us react as though it wouldn t he happening unless it were inevitable

Perhaps it is inevitable. An operations as far-flung and complex as a railway system whose problems confound experts, is not easily understood by a laysions, and we would not attempt to dispute the claim that business economics indicate the abandonment of certain lines. That is unrelated to anything but pure business factors: the indissolution may be unnecessary.

The background of the Canadian railway system becomes, in such a complexity of issues, restrictions subsidies, monopoly control — every conceivable manner of artificial balance and counter-balance — that the industry is far removed from any semblance of the free enterprise basis of supply and demand. Some of these have probably been important factors in the railway dilemma today: subsidization but had to disregard for cost in some instances and control has been threatened for disinvestment in others.

Whatever the reasons, today we are faced with the loss of several thousands of miles of rail line and from the viewpoint of the present economy it is a prospect with far-reaching consequences and ramifications bearing in mind again the history of the railways, and its relationship to the development of the west, we have not only the right but the responsibility to exert every effort toward finding alternatives to abandonment.

Subsidization is the first one that comes to mind, but might not be the only one.

One might be the outright purchase of marginal lines by the government. The lines roads then be balanced and by the government, and the railways charged a toll for actual use. In this manner it might be possible to separate investment in the outworn interest from the responsibility of the railways to operate at a profit.

With millions being spent on civil unrest, on circumstances such as that might be justified simply from the standpoint of keeping fishermen open against a national emergency. This on top of the savings to grain thriving costs to individual industry who eventually must recapture these costs from the consumer.

Unbelievably the railways and government do have been making discussions but they may look just a bit harder if we, the people, make it amply clear that we are demanding a solution.

A northern fishing trip

a FEATURE July 21 1966

All my life I have been in love with the image of the country office who, paper in hand, thinks the brass door and hangs out a sign, "Gone Fishing."

In practice such a philosophy has I discovered upon which I shall not dwell. However it is difficult to finish week into week, year after year to the tall tales of returning fishermen without developing a fondness to learn what it is all about. To make a long story short, I went and done it.

To go fishing with the particular group which I accompanied to an adventure long before the trip begins. Planning of the following year a trip starts when our trip ends leaving a full 12 months to study maps, folders and annual photographs of isolated northern fishing camps which promise isolation finished only by the statistics.

The sense of adventure, which last perished during the last few days of feverish gear-gathering and borrowing takes a sharp nose dive as our line night when the alarm terrorizes you into your worst 'bed to alarm 3 3/4 — half minutes before departure time.

The reason for the early start is that we have an aircraft chartered to fly us out of Otter Lake 50 miles or so past La Ronge, annul inaccessible. While we leisure quickly that nothing a guaranteed in the Canadian north for the customer to show up five minutes late might well be considered jobs cause for cancellation of all reservations and arrangements.

If you are too young to remember the gasoline roads of the 20s and 30s a trip to Somerset Saskatchewan compensates very nicely. Blacktop now indicates to Waskesiu but from there on "Roads to Mongolia" seem designed to protect those structures at all costs. Five hours for the 150-odd miles from Waskesiu to Otter Lake was a good average for fast chassis this June. On our return trip we got stuck — in the middle of the "highway" — in a hole left by a tractor which and spent the night, unable to pull itself out of a soft spot to the road bed

As I have already hinted however circumstance had not yet dedicated itself to the proposition that the customer is king. Although our reservations and flying arrangements had been confirmed, reconfirmed, checked and cross-checked, we arrived at Otter at the appointed hour only to discover that our chances of being flown to our camp that day were laidaire zero and 50 percent.

Lacking accommodation for us in Otter, the camp owner had no alternative but to put us up on with the town and we and several hours later — until past suppertime — we were delivered to the custody of a nonexistent pilot for delivery to our camp.

That I say assumed. Perhaps I have shaving for to from two years and with our boat clambing a map of the town, and the other fumbling nervously to the instruments he got us almost to our destination. (Turned out he knew an acquaintance of mine — an "elderly chap who flew base in World War 2.")

I say almost to our destination because he decided, for reasons never clearly established to set down not on the lake for which we were booked. Instead he dropped us on the dock of a camp on a lake passed to our lake by a narrow channel several miles long.

Here we sat. Loaded with gear, under the coldly unsympathetic stares of a group from Colorado who impressed us as the most hostile representatives of a usually friendly people we had ever encountered.

Introductions were for the Americans; gender to take a host of us to our camp in one boat, to fetch our own boats and return for the rest of us and our gear. The Yanks excitedly put with the guide until he and finished filleting their day's catch but catching our apprehensive glances toward the setting sun, and otherwise not of mind to suffer our company overnight, they re-mount ed to let us use one of their boats and find our own way to the other lake. We didn't have long to postpone.

About 45 minutes later, whom the guide had finished his filleting, he took the rest of us and the remainder of our gear. We arrived at the camp at the same time as the first boat, which had fi n ished and since at twilight before finding the connecting channel.

What was to be our home for the next three days was a tiny island cabin perched on a massive rock which sloped down and out into the lake. We quickly discovered that the camp operator, when he warned us that the stove wasn t "good for baking," was not lying. He hadn't mentioned, however, that it wasn't much good for anything a so either. When we finally got a fire going in the old iron monster the heat went straight up the chimney pipe which was not equipped with anything at all to stop it.

The three boats that were part of the deal were theirs, and there was no shortage of motors but by the time we had snatched a few table fuel tanks with motors we had two usable boats.

Each boat was equipped with one lifebelt presumably on the theory that if accidents must happen, at least there should be a survivor left to tell the world what had happened.

We returned to our sleeping bags early the first night, so as to be in shape for an early start. We woke however to a cold, chilly rainy day and it took several dozen n most breakfast out of the stove with what little fuel (and thoroughly soaked) firewood was around the campsite.

About half of us headed up as the an Arctic expedition, braved the elements and brought in the first fish of the trip and lunch for the day.

By dinner wood and r n a had increased to the point where any thought of fishing and to be put out of mind and restored our attention instead to keeping out the cold.

The area within easy reach of the cabin it turned out and long been picked clean of firewood, and we had to chop down dead trees on the far side of the island. This was really only a few hundred yards, but some time past for fun try carrying an armful of ten foot lengths of wood through trees about six inches apart with rain pelting down as you and your branches slapping you in the face. It is very relaxing, for it takes your mind off business problems completely.

As it turned out we were confined to our 10x15 cabin from noon of the first day to mid-afternoon of the second and that's where your choice of companionship tells. You can be stuck with people who cry to high heaven about their misfortune, or people who make the best of it.

Our group quickly became engrossed in a dice game which combined poker hands with the ability to lie and bluff. Naturally I lost but the game kept us happily occupied until the noise had died down and we were able to take to the boats.

It was still chilly on the water that afternoon but properly dressed and with a few nibbles on the line minor discomforts are quickly forgotten.

On the final day of the operation we rose early so they taken right out in a travel brochure. The sun which barely dips below the horizon at that far north in June was already high in the sky there was not a breath of wind and the lake was a shiny blue mirror with the spruce down world of reflection looking as perfect in detail as the real world around us.

The silence was broken only by the drone of the motor, the occasional shout from one boat to the other, the cry of the loon and the occasional splash of a gulf jumping on his prey.

That's when even the novice who has gone with tongue in cheek becomes an ardent fisherman as the wink of an eye — at the tug of a line.

That is when you come to understand how — if not why — it is possible to spend 10 or 12 hours on the water without tiring of the sport. There is the sharp sensation of expectancy as you find a little sun-baked bay where you just know a school of big northern pike will be lurking between them just waiting for your bright Bonny Maid to spin by there. Then there's either the exultation of having hit it right or the frustration of being dead wrong. Sheets of sheer joy as you reel them in or delight and determination as a spunky trout fights you every inch of the way — or a sigh of resignation as you turn the boat and your hopes toward the next bay or cove and reel in.

That's when you savor the satisfaction of lunch on a rock far from camp, a pan of fresh-caught pike fried in a golden brown on a fire of twigs, with beans and bread and cheese and a pot of strong coffee.

That's when your thoughts inevitably turn to the unbelievably rich heritage of ours. this vast wealth of untapped lakes, hallows of evergreens which manage to also left out of the more than pure rock, and fills of sunlit snow which seem to symbolize the beautiful and challenge of the north.

That's when you find out what a northern fishing trip is all about.

Suddenly it's all over time to head back the camp pack your gear, clean the fish and sit back and wait — one hour, two hours three or four hours — for the plane which will carry you in the pike accompanying back to civilization, a term which by then includes the most comforts of Otter or La Ronge.

Unbelievably, dirty smelly of fish you have up your stamen wagon and head for home way down south. Soon road-weariness takes over and you wonder if anything can be worth the long drive and especially the bumps and ruts of the Lac la Ronge Highway

Is it?

Post try me next year!

Dedication of Gardiner Dam

EDITORIAL July 27 1967

If federal politicians ever doubted that the South Saskatchewan Dam meant a lot to the people of Saskatchewan, the most distinguished audience ever which gathered at Outlook on Friday July 21 for the assistance of Premier Diefenbaker Lake must have been convinced by the size of people who had joined them in the historical ceremony.

An estimated 25 000 brought to Outlook by thousands of private cars and scores of STC Saskatoon and Regina buses sat uncomfortably for several hours under a blazing sun to see the faint most of a dream of men of vision, the coming true of a desperate dream of their fathers and grandfathers who had watched for decades the runoff from the western mountains sweep through the prairies only to spill into Hudson's Bay, with hardly a drop diverted to relieve the parched prairies.

Leaders of Canada a three most prominent political parties were platform guests and speakers of the occasion, and for good reason.

Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson was there ostensibly as the country's leader to mark the completion of one of the biggest engineering projects in history with a ten-figure price tag and one which will bring economic benefits to Saskatchewan and Canada which stagger the imagination.

Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the Rt. Hon John Diefenbaker, was there to receive recognition as the prime minister whose appreciation of this province's problems and lack in 1958 to quick approval of the agreement between the governments of Canada and Saskatchewan for the Saskatchewan Dam projects.

most too and speaking with the eloquence and drama for which he is well remembered in this province, was Saskatchewan's former premier the Hon T C Douglas now national leader of the New Democratic Party. Mr Douglas not only signed together with I.C Nollon the 1958 agreement on behalf of the province, but sounded as Ottawa about 30 years ago the first resolution possessed to the House of Commons with reference to the harnessing of this great river

The Hon Ross Thatcher as present Liberal premier of Saskatchewan also took part in the ceremonies and couldn't resist putting in a plug for assistance for Saskatchewan farmers, who that year are experiencing the type of weather conditions that first caused the people of this province and their leaders to turn their eyes toward the mighty Saskatchewan River

For such a gathering of old political foes, there was a lot of back-slapping and friendly banter with generous recognition remaining party lines.

In the unusually congenial atmosphere which pervaded the occasion, even the weathermen seemed to want to join in the fun When at the opening of ceremonies, the chairman the Hon J.J Green federal minister of agriculture asked for a real Saskatchewan welcome for the distinguished guests from all over Canada the first response was a deafening clap of thunder from a black cloud overhead which till then had not emitted a crackle

The spirit of goodwill carried on at the city and Chamber of Commerce-sponsored banquet Thursday evening at Saskatoon where the same slate of speakers couldn't resist in banter and repartee putting on a show for 400 appreciative guests which would have got an banter any floor these personnel by the best comedians of Hollywood or Broadway

Asked by Saskatoon's Mayor Sid Buckwold to smoke the traditional peace pipe with him, Prime Minister Pearson not only puffed away at the pipe, but then on impulse stepped a few feet to his right to offer the pipe to arch-foe Diefenbaker Mr Diefenbaker accepted it with equally good cheer

The prime minister circumvented on his warm welcome by the people of Saskatchewan and he and concentrated a under humanitarian a Diefenbaker day before; his wife however and added "Then why didn't they vote for you?"

It can't happen here

EDITORIAL May 22 1969

The people of Weyburn were shocked to learn last week that the body and been found in a nearby farm field of an elderly patient who had been missing from the Saskatchewan Hospital for over two months without a hue and cry being raised

The situation was inevitable if hospital policy is still to be implemented to as several years ago by a person that is indirectly that after a missing patient has been absent for a certain period, he at no longer class fled to existing, but rather as having rehabilitated himself. The theory as we understand it, was that if a person and been able to get by in society for a while without getting into some sort of trouble or difficulty he/she contended must use contra-indicated.

Not only is such reasoning nonsense — particularly when applied to the hard-core type of patient now found at the mental hospital here — but the whole procedure smacks of calculated perfidy of keeping the evil away in the dark about possible shortcomings in the operation of a public institution with utter disregard for the well being of an individual and for the public might to information.

As because man might be written off as an error of judgment or an oversight (however serious), but we have experienced other occasions where the public right to information was ignored by the authorities.

Some years ago, an Indian chief died in the north during the night shortly after being placed in a foster home. We were in first denied any information about the death, ostensibly out of considerations for the foster parents, but more likely to avoid embarrassment on the part of the welfare department.

More recently a young woman died undernoted in a farm house. No inquest, or information from the RCMP and our questions about it evoked unbelievable indignation.

We are sorry.

Not many years ago in Texas, a man declared by a coroner to have died from natural causes was later determined to have been foully bullets.

It can happen here?

It sure can if we continue to pursue a course of keeping the public ignorant about such things as missing people sudden deaths and the related policies and procedures of the authorities.

Fox Valley Hutterite Colony

FEATURE November 13 1969

I had some misgivings about how these simple-hearted people would feel about five dozen newsmen prowling and poking cameras at them but I soon saw that to most of them we were as big a curiosity as they were to us.

I tried to pass two little boys in their old-fashioned garb with finding the moment I got off the bus which delivered us to the Fox Valley Hutterite Colony. The dog however would have nothing to do with a foreign-looking devil like me and in the few moments I tried to exercise the charm (with dogs that is) on which I pride myself the youngsters and lads turned on and fled.

Equally shy but finding courage in numbers, a dozen or so of the colony's women and children peered at us from behind the long assembly hall building on which we were able to enjoy the hospitality of this strange sect. They were obviously excited about the host of visitors with strange clothes and manners — perhaps they even felt reassured by the fact that a few of our humans were also beautiful but the moment a camera was pointed their way, they would run for newer, modest shelter, of delight at their own daring-do, and with a flurry of ankle-length skirts.

It became sort of a pony for the few minutes at least, with much less self-consciousness on their part than us ours. But they won; I didn't get any pictures of them.

The visit to the colony of a men which has clung to old traditions probably more successfully than any in the country was part of a two-day tour sponsored by the Saskatchewan Power Corporation to familiarize the press with the extensive use of natural gas in several industries. The foregoing statement may seem self-contradictory but I'm sure you that however unsuitously these people cling to their customs, for anything to do with production any conclusion that provides greater efficiency is acceptable.

Now because of our heavy schedule and the fact that from we arrived at Fox Valley at 4 p m we were still four hours and seven from the supper table the SPC had arranged with our Hutterite hosts to provide a coffee break.

I m sure our SPC guides were as astonished as most of our colleagues to discover that "coffee" in old German usage goes well beyond the a mere meaning of the word. Coffee is a mid-afternoon meal by itself (though probably it is right our but nevertheless one from which a famished traveller can those well satisfied

Piece of all though whom we because the consumed dining hall in which the entire colony of 85 people share their meals we were served rhubarb wine. This too came as a surprise to those of us not familiar with the Hutterites for they are noted for their opposition to the use of intoxicants strong drink. As I understand it now however strong drink does not include beer or the wine on which they pride themselves

Setting the pace for this dispensation however was the fact the our generous hosts cups were filled by the colony administrator (who would also be the religious leader) out of reconstituted cans which were replenished from gallon crocks in the kitchen I got the impression on that this was a function that was reserved by him whenever the occasion was proper I become too that the bonging knock and open thorn of a handful of revellers were ignored

Coffee, when we sat down for it at the long tables runs start of fried potatoes (shaped like French fries but not deep fried) abundant quantities of home-made bologna and boiled home-cured ham sauerkraut (the German double-pocker buns traditionally made for the weekend) with huge bottles of coffee to wash it down.

Sitting with us through coffee were Joe Mandel, a talkative good-humored man of about 35-40 with the traditional down and Peter on it's early 20s, to whom shown as a spokesman in the no one world in fluent English, spoken with a broad German accent and a curious lilt which seems to be another trademark of the sect they tend to best they could to field the many questions thrown at them

Everyone from the administrator to the low that down on the colony they explained is elected to the position for an indeterminate period.

Joe, for instance was a change of the chickens. When asked if he had previously shown any special inclination for this type of work he looked puzzled

No, said he, he and simply been elected to do it.

"What if you didn't do a good job?" I inform and he explained with a shrug and a grin and in such a manner would be elected to some other job. Later when I was a member of the colony — as observed on the others — making the allotted five hours with the honey wagon, I couldn't help wondering whether how was a man who had been elected out of too many other jobs.

One of our group expressed surprise at the fact that Peter was clean-shaven, mentioning and it was a general belief that the Hutterites, like the Old Testament black chosen and hairs are an integral part of the religion No, and Peter it was entirely a matter of conflict that the custom was very strong. He compared it to the sweatsuch already mentioned which they and enjoyed for centuries

Asked whether young people are compared to leave the colony if they desire higher education (government-supervised chosen to Grade 8, are held on the colony), his said weekend burning an eye, that the question had never been.

"Kids don't like school," he explained. Give them a choice between driving a tractor or helping with the house or against attending classes and they'll choose the former every time. He refused to speculate on a hypothetical man as the whole idea of a child wanting to continue school was too ridiculous to entertain. That book was closed" but firmly.

In the modern, gas-serviced kitchen which we visited after the meal and where all meals for the colony are cooked we were shown a menu which would make 100 people of those in at time. Everything else, including ovens and a walk-in refrigeration room was proportionate. Most of the equipment was made or assembled by members of the colony as every purchase became a carefully examined as to the most possible savings if house labor can be utilized

The brethren we met were openly proud of the gangrous hospitality the colony to its brief existence. The administrator Joseph Entz, said 16 pictures of land had been purchased about three years ago....and 14 could foter 15 families moved in from the colony at Cyprs Also By this time the new and completed all the buildings including the numerous barns and house it should utilized in thousands.

The colony keeps 7,200 laying hens, which yield 5,000 eggs daily. The hens are kept, four to a small cage, in a barn which never darkened. The creatures end lay eggs day and night until their top productive period has been passed after about one year Then of they go to someone's supper table.

Thousands of hogs are contracted yearly and hosts 100 cows are kept. Dairy products are kept for the colony's own use as there is no convenient market. Fox Valley being literally miles from anywhere. Maple Creek is 40 miles to the house and and is the only sizeable community anywhere near and east

Wheat, oats and barley are grown but Mr. Hutt said 7,000 acres of land was not enough for the colony particularly in that men of the province

Everything in the colony is communally owned of course as has been the practice of this sect for centuries. Come anyone use into the year's earnings are divided (for computation purposes only) among the working members and tax repaid accordingly

My encyclopedia says about the Hutterites that "they have become highly mechanized, to the neglect of their work habits, the customs governing personal conduct, family relationships, and community life have changed very little since 1528 when their an ceslors were forced to flee southern Germany and Switzerland because of their belief in communal living pacifism and unaccepted protestantism. After an odyssey of centuries through temporary havens in Bohemia Hungary and Russia she sent migrated to find freedom from persecution "

Germans as well as English would aught at colony schools had the former is the official church language

Another interesting fact mentioned is and "few Hutterites have ever been mentally troubled to mental hospitals, jails or required public assistance to meet personal economic or social problems The relationship of cultural and psychiatric factors to the mental health of Hutterites was the subject of a research survey sponsored in 1949-52 by the member of Mental Health of the United States public health service.

Where ghosts walk at night

APEATURE. September 24, 1970

Ghosts walk in eight feet in island burial ground, across 200 yards of water which separates them from the white chums that towers imposingly on a precambrian shelf jutting into the waters of the Churchill River

They are the ghosts of Cree Indians — the number varies according to the teller of the legend perhaps there were 30, perhaps 300 — who died in an influenza epidemic almost half a century ago were buried in a mass shaft on the top ever island and were return to worship in the mission church where their fathers were introduced to the white man the ways and the God.

So two dozen more health men were told, anyway hents they visited last week the isolated Indian villages of Stanley Mission and Pinehouse on the eleven point tour of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation this year to tell us — and show us — the Northern Saskatchewan Story

Perhaps you don t believe in ghosts, but I felt them. Not only the ghosts of the influenza victims, but the ghosts of a whole race reconciled to a changing world living or about towns which are drifted, littered institutions of what was once a culture but can today be described only as dismal, though endless lines are cities and without end streets to them.

I would like to stipulate at the onset that as a flying visitor of a few hours all ages did not turn me overnight into an expert on Indian affairs and that I set out attempting to blame, defend, condemn or justify, but simply to share with Review readers a few of what I saw and heard during what was an unique experience in my life.

As our twin-engined Otter aircraft taxied up to the dock of the village of Pinehouse, children by the dozen were already lining the sandy enclosure to witness what we were told were probably the largest invasion of strangers the settlement and area experienced.

One of the few white people who live there told us that Pinehouse, with its 100 families totalling about 700 people, is self-supporting and that only about eight families are on welfare. The figures are impressive but not the standard at which the rest of the community supports itself through fishing and trapping.

The only thing that moved the village from an appearance of classical destitution and blindness was the scores of brightly painted bungalows installed by the Department of Indian Affairs, and which now houses a high proportion of the population. Some of the residents it seemed to me preferred the wigwam beside the bungalow. While the neat looking houses seen from a distance angered well for the bottomless pit of misery that accompanied broken windows seen in many of them at closer range foretold another destiny.

Those not fortunate enough to have a bungalow literary shacks as wretched and tiny defy description.

But back to the children.

I believe that every youngster under 12 and old enough to walk composed our entourage as we walked about the village. They were shyly friendly and inquisitive, bashful when blondness individually in the tongue still strange to them, but unabashedly familiar as they grabbed your arms while walking beside you as they might with a favorite uncle.

The happy hordes looked reasonably well fed; some were dressed reasonably well and some like scarecrows, and houses all were dirty in a way that so exceed not merely the natural affin ity of children for all things grimy but a thoroughly unhygienic way of life. Scars of diseases were also visible.

While every move we made was the subject of intense curiosity and conjecture on the part of the little people—I thought I would be attached to the press as I kneeled on the ground to consign films — adolescents and adults, for the most part remained hidden interest for the first hour in their venturing out only toward the end of the day.

The focal point of the community — a street sign erected by some civilization-oriented soul identified it as Pine Street — was a sandy trail that ran from the docking area to the fairly new public school. It was barely the width of a car but since one truck constituted the village it enjoyed automobile status (not counting vicious belonging) that ensures no problems. Secondary rows of houses are served by meandering footpaths which may take you through the front yard of one house, past the backyard privy of the next, and beetly bypass by the annual campaign fire of the third. That you in girl think might pose a garbage collection problem, but it doesn't because garbage simply collects itself — automobiles, that is — however it happens to develop. I don't think there was a square foot in the settled area which did not have a tin can or two of an easy beer or pop bottle, candy wrappers and the other blessings of our civi lization with which nature cannot cope.

Two buildings not many yards from the dock were obviously the social and economic centres of the village. One was the Co-op store and the other (the old Co-op store and still quarrying the familiar sign) God bless turned into a pool room.

The Co-op store was clean with the refrigerated meat and produce counters fair bar to all of us. Though the selection of meat and produce was limited — understandable in a place where hunting and fishing is a way of life — the shelves were well-stocked with most of the canned goods and other commodities which we expect to see in our own stores. Business in the candy counter was much in the day I was and been mail day and cheques of some sort abounded.

Next door the pool room a two hobby were in consternation. Everyone looked proficient with the cues, from young tweens to little fellows who could hardly see over the tops. With not another recreational facility in the community this is perhaps understandable.

The pool room, as one of the two public hangouts, houses no one hitchhiker. Though we were hustled after our early start from Lac la Ronge, I was difficult to enjoy our food surrounded by scores of curious eyes and watching mouths in for the most part we ate what we needed to sustain us for the rest of the day then handed out the rest of our box-lunch sandwiches, cakes and soft drinks at eager hands.

It is noteworthy that through the entire two or three hours that we wandered through the settlement with our knee high following, not a mother came out looking for her three or four-year-old. Discipline within the group was administered frequent y and generously by whatever child considered himself strong enough to thrust out with impun ity.

In al I was a fascinating and enlightening sojourn but I confess that I want t all that sorry to see the plane that was to take us away from a primer example of what we complacently call the Indian problem and for which I defy anyone to come up with a pat solution

Our next stop, of course was the viele to Holy Trinity Church better known as Stanley Mission, which I have already mentioned, and which stands like a guardian angel on an woody promontory overlooking the settlement half a mile away by boat.

Nature by we asked the obvious question. Why was the church built so far away? We were told the settlement had originally been near the church but after the influenza epidemic in which I have already referred, superstition and fear drove the inhabitants to what they considered a safer site.

Construction of the church, Saskatchewan's oldest man-made landmark, was begun shortly after the Rev Robert Hunt of the Church of England was sent to the area in 1850. Built by the Indians of whip-sawn lumber from nearby under the missionary's watchful eye, the church was completed in 1856. Hardware and the stained glass windows were brought from England through Hudson's Bay

There is a new church now in the settlement, where a native minister Rev. Philip John Charles holds two services every Sunday for his Anglican flock. Rev Charles is 72 years old, and served the parish as a lay minister until his ordination two years ago. Services are conducted in Cree

The old church although it is certainly picturesque enough is rarely used now except for the occasional funeral

Back at the settlement a group of us were invited to the well appointed cabin home of Minnie and Mary Harbricht who have taught there for five years and are two of the nine white people who make their homes at Stanley Mission

Population of the settlement is placed at 650 but Mr. Harbricht estimated that about 1,000 people call Stanley Mission their home. But at any given time there are hundreds away trapping, fishing, hunting and guiding

Don Beaseberry newsman originally from Fraude, finds it easy to make friends with the youngsters of the Saskatchewan north

The Hatfield-Ile-Ile progress was being made with the Indian people although at a rate which would exhaust the patience of those who expect to see a quick breakthrough. I gather one of the problems is that there's not unanimous opinion, by any means even among the Indians as to what is best suited.

A state-of-the-art railway to the La Ronge-Otter Lake highway only 16 miles from Stanley Mission. It was begun a few years ago as a Winter Work project. However when one worker suffered a bodily frozen fate, construction was abandoned and the partially cleared road by now has regressed to nature.

The real instance as I grasped it in that while a white community of the same size and similarly located, would not for itself had access to the outside world the Indian people see far from certain that they want to be so closely and so our way human.

The Mission settlement also has a well furnished and stocked Hudson's Bay store.

The purpose of the press 'ver of the northern villages was to acquire at its with the northern electrification program being carried out by North-Sask Electric Ltd. a subsidiary of the SPC. Since its incorporation 18 months ago North-Sask has built or purchased distributions and generating facilities at 13 settlements to serve more than 1,000 customers. More power stations are planned.

Before formation of North-Sask several of the isolated northern settlements had electric lighting plants to serve the school a store and possibly one or two homes. North-Sask enlarged the generating facilities and the distribution systems to serve all the population. The new stations have generating capacities in the range of 50 to 200 kilowatts.

Building transmission lines from one station to another is one of the question because of the distance and terrain. Constructing the power stations was not without problems either of course a race with no highways all much navy buildings had to be materials are transported over winter roads or by lake barge.

The most unusual problem facing the company right now is that of communications between head office and the remote power stations. Various methods of emergency communications systems are being examined and there are high hopes of holding the problem before winter.

Under the existing method of operation if trouble should develop at Pinsuanik for example the plant operator must travel 50 miles overland to Stiffle-Narrows to reach the nearest DNR radio point. If the plant operator is able to analyze the problem a mechanic at Prince Albert is then flown directly to the settlement with the replacement part if the operator can't pinpoint the trouble then of course two trips are necessary.

In keeping with a policy of involving local people in the operation of the company North-Sask's board of directors includes people of Indian and Metis ancestry as well as representatives of government departments with special interests in the administration of the north, and representatives of local industry.

Proponents of the northern electrification program are quick to point out too that the project does not entail simply to bring low-cost subsidized power to the Indian people but that it is an essential preliminary to opening up Saskatchewan's vast and rich northland.

Maybe some day, at the efforts of North-Sask and people like the Hatfields bear fruit, the Indians of the north may reap the rewards of technology and industry while still living in their beloved, wild, beautiful surrbund

A multicultural approach

EDITORIAL May 4 1972

All we think I have enough problems the Saskatchewan Association on Human Rights is now calling for "a multicultural approach to education that would enable persons to choose the language of instruction in schools."

According to an association release "Language and culture are unable to survive without each other and that therefore it is imminent to promote them for political convenience."

If the group were speaking on behalf of the Indian population here long before what all any nationality there would be moral though not economic sense to the suggestion.

The association claims to speak however on behalf of the 52 percent of Saskatchewan people of ethnic origin other than English and French.

Most people of non English or non French origin came to this country in the full knowledge that they were migrating to a country with a language and culture other than their own. While most these groups understandably sought to perpetuate their cultures here as best they could and have not been denied that right government encouragement of our country's fragmentation would not only run counter to the social agreement and policy of the provinces, but might indeed be instituted by many to be distrustful turney toward young Canadians whose participation in the life of the greater community might thereby be restricted.

We would agree that it might be desirable to enable communities with large non-English or non French groups to encourage instruction in their languages for an hour or on a day in such courses standard textbooks for use particular language might be used across the nation

But to permit instruction of all or most subjects in other than the official languages could lead us into a frightening jungle of educational standards or educanatively impose on the province the cost of transhoing standard seats in all subjects into each of the languages of our many cultural groups

Fifty years ago when ethnic communities could and did exist in the country almost completely isolated against the world around them it might have been possible and even desirable (from the point of view of the future and without the benefit of crystal ball) to permit instruction in those non-English languages

To introduce such a practice today would create confusion that would thwart the Tower of Babel episode scene by everyone in a minor problem in communication.

When thieves fall out

EDITORIAL November 28 1974

A battle royal is shaping up between the province of Saskatchewan and the federal government over the loot each may seize from the oil and mining industries in this province

But doesn't that bring at have to the provincial government's annual announcement just a few weeks ago that it intended to siphon off 25 percent of the Saskatchewan potash industry's gross sales? Is that not also an invasion upon ownership and control?

There is no odd saying that when thieves fall out, good men rejoice There is little rejoicing, however, for the good man lying stunned by while the thieves are fighting over the contents of his wallet and arguing over the best way to dispose of the body

To the oil company or potash company it makes little difference whether the profits are being confiscated by the gang in Regina or the gang in Ottawa. There is nothing left for the company then the company ceases to operate.

Successor to Mr. Klinax

ERNESTLY June 9 1977

It must be about 15 years ago, if memory serves, when Mr Klinax the huge "walking" dragline went into operation in the Klinax coalfields

With a bucket capacity of some 40 yards it was thought of in that time as the eighth wonder of the world

Now at Coronach where work is rapidly progressing on the Poplar River power project and the strip mining operation which will fuel the power station, a dragline is being assembled which with a 90-yard bucket capacity will more than double Mr Klinax anywhere

The dragline will have a twin boom 366 feet long and will weigh about 100 tons The completed load on the boom will be about 23 1 tons.

The dragline will be capable of walking at a speed of one-sixth of a mile per hour, powered by four 500 hp electric motors In the walking process, the dragline lifts itself on two rectangular shoes (each 72x14 feet in size) moves ahead eight feet and then settles down on the base This cycle is repeated until the monster reaches its destination

Like Mr Klinax the dragline will be used only for removing the overburden from the coal seam buried some 50 feet below the earth's surface Sensitive machines are used to extract the coal itself

I spent most of Thursday afternoon browsing around the project where the mud for the power house is pretty well up the dam and the spillway under construction and miming operations scheduled to begin some time next summer

At the campsite the chef and cooks were working frantically to serve their first meal to a possible cooking and dining facility designed to serve 300 men (I should say "persons" but there being fewer 499 men and one woman would be more accurate.)

The Poplar River coalfields will probably be one of the first to go into operation with reclamation of land built right into the master plan. A test plot has been planted to determine what type of growth will best be supported as the reclaimed topsoil which will be replaced as soon as mining of an area is completed. It is only right that proper that the generation many times removed create the land to a fruitful condition rather than leaving ugly scars of waste

It is difficult however to escape the vagrant thought that all the same policy prevailed during the depressed thirties, people punching pennies to scrape foul coins might not have been altogether pleased with the idea of paying a few cents more per ton to preserve the aesthetics of some remote area

However that's something we'll have to come to grips with of course ever get but difficult again In the meantime I'm all for the reclamation program Eventually I understand there will be four power plants in the Poplar River site

As the SPC men said as long as permit request fights in turn on when they pass a little cents it's got to come from somewhere

The Poplar River system incidentally supplies water to Scotia Mout. just across the line, and there was some anxiety about pollution on that score This seems to have been settled by allowing one of the rivers two branches to flow unimpeded into Montana, which the other is held back for power generation.

Buried in Saskatchewan

ERNESTLY April 19 1979

Just finished reading "The Last Convertible" a novel which might be summed up as a very readable explanation to the young idealism of today of how their parents managed in spite of their own high ideals and intentions to let the world slip even farther into a mess

You may agree or disagree with the writer's pol-blind and social views, and sympathise with or reject his gentle feelings, but if you are between 45 and 60 years of age you will find the book not only nostalgic but reassuring in that it tends to confirm that things really were once very much as you remember them.

Some contemporary writers have almost succeeded in convincing us that except for a few preachers and all-round humbugs, social and sexual mores were always very much as they are today, and that what we remember is really the result of mutual memory if I may coin a phrase.

However I couldn't help chuckling about a passage on the novel

> The story a protagonist, a rebel of liberal minded convers, had succeeded in convincing a young friend that serving in the Viet Nam war would, on the long run, be preferable to some of the options such as jail or draft-dodging.

The young man now back from the campaign was in resentful mood of the advice he had been given

> Well rationalise his advisor maybe it wasn't the best advice but you'll have to admit about spending half your life burned in some damn place like Saskatchewan.

Well, gee whiz, thanks a lot, sonnie

As a transplant there have been times, admittedly when I have wondered how mercifully I had considered all the options but after a five-month winter capped by a copious snowfall during the first week of April I don't recently mine for bothering telling me that slithering outside in the jungles of Viet Nam with people trying to kill you was, at intensely preferable to being landed in Saskatchewan.

We may be crazy to live here, but people would leave us the dignity of ignorance

Four of depths

ERNESTLY October 7 1981

In this age of flying cushion everyone has come to grips with the four of hearts that seems to be part of most middle-aged mortals. People who have all when they have to look down from a be girl of more than 30 that sat back with complete equanimity in a jetliner travelling at an altitude of 30,000 or 40,000 feet.

Many of us still find a slight trembling in the tummy as a chill running up the spine as take-off but once the craft is airborne we're as comfortable as though we believe the ship is running along and held aloft by an overhead cable.

So if you want a new kind of kick, see how you make out with four of depths

Aside from a few visits to scenic underground caverns — which gave me an extra fast leg and a sense of relief when the boat was over — I had never been lower than the basement level of large buildings. so it was with a sense of adventure that I s gared up at our scenic newspaper cameraman in Saskatoon for an underground tour of a potash mine

The sense of adventure heightened with a touch of extreme shyness in when at the office of the Cominco plant in Vanscoy we were issued coveralls, hat in power packs, miners lamps, cyclonous and hardhats By the time I had struggled into the cumbersome gear and learned that the underground temperature is a constant 89 degrees Fahrenheit (or something close to that). I began perspiring in anticipation. Only pride kept me from resigning on the spot. I knew my wife would never chicken out, so how could I?

Twin elevators like workers and waitress times as the mining, and 3 500 feet — more than half a mile — below ground level. When our cage goes down, the other comes up, one acts as a counter-balance for the other. The trip takes only two as three minutes but that is long time when you're wondering what it would be like if something went wrong and the cage dropped all the way

A Cominco officer captained later that the system and its from as four safety mechanisms are checked out every day and are just about foolproof I had a lot better going up and down that elevator than on the ones in most Saskatoon buildings which are standard perhaps every few months ?

Stepping out of the elevator at the mining level reminded me a bit of stepping in Hawaii to Mexico, as the first sensation a blast of unexpectedly warm air hitting your face That, of course, is where the similarity with a holiday mecca ends

Once accustomed to the warmth however, it wasn't all that uncomfortable down there. Fresh air is constantly being pumped into the area, so is the cold but air is sucked out

I had heard of the miles of roads in potash mines, and was formed a mental image of wide underground thoro...probably complete with fast food outlets and drive-in movies.

Well it wasn't exactly like that.

The roads are mostly drifts, the square tunnels created by the mining process, and they run parallel to each other for up to four or five miles from the main shaft. We were driven in a Landrover for a mile of nearly five miles to the end of the line where the mining machine was chewing away at the cobalt

It was a rough ride, for while the floor of the drift is perfectly smooth when it's cut pressures from the side, probably aborted by traffic cause considerable heaving. If the heaving gets too bad the road way may as be levelled, but until that time the Landrovers scoot across the bulges at a fairly healthy c.p. We hung on to our seats with one hand, and to handlers with the other and I'll tell you that five miles seems a long way under those conditions

Except in the working area, the only l ght came from our miners lamps and the headlights It was noisy. Occasionally we'd meet another vehicle and the Landrover would have to edge to a widened portion that the other is pass. By the way stand towns: may has found outlets or drive-in movies in the widened portions ruinne. Just pozzah. above, below and on both sides.

I'm glad they didn't tell us until after we were back on the surface that the ducts usually collapse within a few days after mining is completed. Actually this is to some extent contrived because the cave-in relieves the stress on nearby drifts being worked and makes them safer. There are in some instances man-hauled caves as but there are a number of signs — such as cracks in the walls to caving — that warn of this danger. These drifts are then abandoned long before the collapse occurs. The Cominco plant actually has had several hundred days without a lost-time accident, and most of the mishaps that occur really have nothing to do with mining to working underground.

All in all, it was one of the most interesting places I've visited in recent years and I was never really terrified, but nevertheless relieved when I stepped out of the elevator and into the surface once more.

And next summer, when similar tours are being put on for our terrified convention and understanding that the mines can accommodate only a limited number of visitors, I shall re-acquaint myself with and yield to our guests from media provinces.

Community viability

SASKATOON Decembre 9 1981

A month to two ago I reviewed a round of articles from a group known as the Saskatchewan Committee on Rural Area Development (SCRAD).

The articles are abstracts of a number of background papers prepared for the committee by the University of Saskatchewan. They all deal with the viability of communities in the 200-to-2,000 range and are intended as the stimuli for local study sessions sponsored by community exchanges throughout the province.

Presumably local groups could tackle the problems affecting small town growth, take the necessary steps to remove the obstacles and live happily ever after in thriving, growing towns offering their residents good services of every imaginable type.

It is not surprising that many of the causes for small-town stagnation be identified more correctly identified. After all you could assign to any high school student to essay on the effect on Uranium City on isolated one-industry town, of closing down its only industry and you'd probably get an assessment not too widened from one prepared by a Ph D in economics.

The experience of Saskatchewan's small communities has not a most instances been be quick to an unmitigable for any one generation of residents. But the long-range effect the cause has been very much the same

MACKENSTY! HAPPY KENTUCKIANS

The first requirement the settlement of an area is usually (at least naturally) the presence of some reason by which people can extract a living from the area's resources. Once people have settled there quickly develops a need to supply them with goods and services necessary to their survival.

In Saskatchewan, most people were drawn to settle here by free land on which they might grow enough grain and livestock for their own needs, plus most left the marketing or trading for things they could not produce for themselves.

Farms were small roads returns meagre, families large roads almost non-existant and short-distance transportation dependent upon horse and buggy to wagon.

Villages, hamlets and towns sprung up quickly within eight or 10 miles of each other scattered by game the very points that obvious y and to be within farmers reach. Each vil age needed a general store, blacksmith shop hardware and dry goods stores, bother post office, school churches hotel restaurant, drug store bank livery stable and perhaps a dozen other services which gave the community viv and self-sufficiency. Each service needed to be brought another family into the settlement and increased the economic base

The motor car and the consequent highway system, changed all that forever. The depression of the 1930's gave things a little shove in that previous by closing down businesses that might have lasted a few more years and by increasing the viable farm size earlier and with less disparity than might otherwise have been necessary. Decreasing family sizes, more cash in the raisns of individuals regionalization of health and educational services, and other factors have contributed to the stagnation or demise of small urban communities but mostly the community base disappeared with the horse and buggy

And considering the fact that there is no wave of immigration which might strengthen each of the remaining communities just where are they going to get the basic resource for growth — people? From each other? From the large cities?

Significantly the SCRAD papers do not come up with any answers unless you accept the suggestion of one that community pride be developed through the arts

"Fun (as a small town) often consists of getting a case of beer and racing down the roads knocking over mail boxes. Getting drunk is far more a way of life. Where once the family, friends and neighbors gathered around the piano he brought out the fiddle and created their own entertainment, they now tend to stay at home and stare at the tube. yet I would venture that somewhere in every town in an area of some note He/she may do wood carving write poetry to play the fiddle but they have no outlet to demonstrate their abilities"

Well maybe an annual exhibition by the local wheeler or a monthly recital by the local fiddler in the community could have saved Hanse or Ralph, but somehow I doubt it.

But what I missed. One of the brothers done flirt with a notation. It is entitled: "Regional Planning for the 1980s."

"The use of regional planning to co-ordinate economic and social activities in communities is necessary for efficient land use and for energy conservation. But it does not insure achievement of stated objectives unless municipalities change to compete for industrial commercial and housing developments. The economic disadvantages for a municipality of an industrial growth or even of no residential growth have to be suffered possibly by means of tax base sharing.

Somehow I suspected all along that if I looked closely enough I might find Big Brother lurking in there somewhere."

Kaiser Bill Street

ERNESTLY September 9 1981

Canada, and in particular the prairie region is often referred to as a cultural and leisure mosaic as opposed to the more traditional melting pot of the United States.

In the Weyburn area probably due to the American "dynamic early in the century, the mosaic concept is not so clearly defined.

In central Saskatchewan, where a greater proportion of the settlers came directly from Europe the unusual was more distinct, and signs of the original culture survive sometimes in strange ways.

I discovered an interesting example of one but week when I was motoring from Brandon to an appointment in Yorkton.

Just a few miles north the Saskatchewan border I found myself driving through the town of Langenburg. For some reason the highways department did not bother bypassing this little metropolis and as I crawled through the restricted speed area my wandering eye fixed on something and almost made me lose control of the car even at 40 km/h

It was the street sign on what appeared to be one of the main streets.

It read Kaiser Wm Street (Or maybe Avenue." I was too stunned to make a distinction.)

Now old Kaiser Bill of World War I notoriety may not have been quite the rascal he was made out to be in the war bond posters and cartoons of that period, but I couldn't help wondering how the name had survived the hysteria of two major wars with Germany.

I was tempted to stop right there and ask a few questions of the natives about the background of the name, real possible controversy during the war years. However as mentioned, I had an appointment in Yorkton, had about 50 minutes to travel 45 miles, find a meeting place for which I did not have the address and meets person I'd never seen before.

I telephoned the town office learned and the village and have settled in 1886 by Germans from Langenburg, Germany and their folks from Langenburg, Sask. recently visited Langenburg, Germany and were well received. As to the street name I was referred to a local historian.

The gentleman, who had a British accent months imported and I should even find the name strange. "These were German people settling here and they simply honored the Kaiser by naming the street for him don't you know."

He said and there may have been some second thoughts about the name during the first was but those and never been a public outcry.

When I asked: If it was permanently called Kaiser Street, Kaiser Bill Street or Kaiser Wilhelm Street, he said, "Why we don't call anyone. This is a small town you know, and everybody knows where every body else lives, so you never mention the names of streets."

Fair enough. Some day perhaps I'll drive through a small Transer-American village and find it has an Ayatollah Khomeini Street.

Next year country

ERNESTLY March 18 1981

Although I missed by six months being a native Saskatchewanian, was exposed throughout my formative years to the ill influences of Man Jobs, and wanted a decade in the villi kitchen of Toronto Vancouver and cities south of the border my nearly 23 years in Weyburn have burnt enough to allow some local characteristics to rub off on me.

One of these is the tendency to feel guilty about the beautiful winter we have enjoyed so far.

Th n symptom may be a legacy from the pioneers who were constantly fighting the weather in a many violent and vengeful forms as they tried to eke a livelihood out of the harsh and uncompromising prairie A touch may have come also from the failure my generation which got it tile help from nature while struggling to survive a world depression and agricultural mechanization.

Give us a stiff west wind blasting powdered snow into our faces at 75 kilometers per hour, and we grin, spit out a snowball and mutter cheerily to that this is nothing like any one of 10 storms in the winter of 1942 or thereabouts. No sir they just don t know anywhere like they did when we reckoned wind velocity in miles per hour

Drop 10 feet of snow on us and we reminisce happily about the winter of 1946 (or was it 1947?) when a locomotive was lost for several months because t was buried in snow on the Radville line.

Not give us an icy fir winter with little snow or cold and hardly even any wind to speak of and we're not at all comfortable with it.

Every morning when I wake up to sunshine and above-zero temperatures do I throw out my chest and exclaim how wonderful it is to be in Saskatchewan in the winter of 1980-81? I do not. I sit there gloomily churning my toast and wondering how I am going to face the two Ostriches in the news department who were faced with the distinct understanding that they were loving themselves in for winter conditions guaranteed to make men out of them.

So what do we get? Weather that's mild enough to have a serious effect on the Florida tourist trade.

It wasn't as mad in February when we could still tell ourselves and others that the worst Saskatchewan snowstorms often come in March and that there was time enough for as much and weather like this until weeks of January and February might be no more than a passingly memory by the time we dug ourselves out of the snow some time in mid-May.

But here we are in the middle of March, just a few days from the first day of spring and still mild weather and I smile himself felt (I wrote it a Monday morning and while the weatherman is predicting snow per cm tomorrow I'll have to see it to believe it.)

The way we gamish ourselves for the gentle tantrum you see, is to predict thin droughts and grasshoppers to the summer.

"Exactly like the spring of 1931," our veteran of the last cold era triumphantly the other day. Those who heard him heightened his perceptibly feeling immediately shriven from the guilt of a winter without frostbite or the expense of a trip to the south

For those who find the name I have a word of encouragement. There is ways next year

Next year the wind will howl, the snow will fall and the frost will crackle — starting on Hallowe en night and not letting up until Victoria Day

Then we ll feel better

Dirty Thirties? Baloney!

EDITORIAL May 13 1981

Presumably since the beginning of time and until the end of time this part of the country and experiment and will experience dry cycles. And every time the cycle rolls around, just as inevitably as pop art of the ground after a rain, the ghostbusters slip out of the cracks of the parched ground and croak dreadly "The Dirty Thirties are back. The Dirty Thirties are back!"

Nonsense

The year 1931 is 50 years behind us on the calendar and it will never return.

Last year after a near-moreless winter and an unusually dry spring and early summer the sky was saved by late summer showers that produced crops and I beyond the expectations of even the pessimists But only after the pessimists and cried "The Dirty Thirties are back!"

Light snow that past month again and left soil conditions somewhere between the most desirable level and according to the latest report of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool only one crop district in all of Saskatchewan actually and poor seeding and germinations conditions

Admittedly some segments of the agricultural industry such as cattlemen are suffering and to compare today with the 30s is no more than self-pity

In the 1930s many farmers and to give up their acreages under different conditions Many of them would have and to give up their land in a few years anyway — albeit with more dignity — but since mechanization was demanding larger farm units

In the 1930s we were in the middle of a unsaid depression and what grain was being grown did not enjoy a market as anywhere near full grain Today every farmer knows that all or most of the grain harvested will be sold at something approaching reasonable prices

